phemous mafs. O let not that be your god, which mice- worms can devour. Behold I call heaven and earth to re- that it is no god, yea, the fire confumeth it, and the moift- caufeth it to mould; and I take Chrift's testament to elf, that it is none of his ordinances, but a mere invention en, and a snare to catch the blood of innocents; and now God hath fhewed it unto you, be warned in time. O give old customs, and become new in truth. What ftate fo- your father be in, leave that to God; and let us follow the fel of his word. Dear mother, embrace it with hearty tion, read it with obedience, let it be your paftime; but aft off all carnal affections, and love of worldly things: fo we meet in joy at the laft day, or elfe I bid you farewell ermore: O farewell my friends and lovers all; God grant to fee your faces in joy. LETTER V.

From Mr. SHETERDEN to his WIFE.

Wrote unto you as one that longed more to hear of your health, than of all worldly treasure, willing you to intreat the elder brother by nature gently, giving to him his own, and offer him one of the doves, and fay they be Jacob's, are fent for a prefent to my lord Esau, but he will not take ec. Now, my beloved, you know the blessing of our Fa- is, that the elder fhould ferve the younger, and wisdom, mother, hath taught us the fame, and I know you do com- of your fervant the flefh, that he is rebellious, difobedient, untoward; unruly and crookedly you think he doth his fer- : but yet behold, how fhall you plead your caufe before an ferent judge? For if it be true that his fervice be not ac- cing to his duty, as it is many times found in fervants; yet, y, can you fhew your caufe to no indifferent judge, but he bject againft you that he is not kept like a fervant, but he eth both meat and drink, and other neceffaries meet and due a fervant: fo fhall you take more fhame of your own com- at, than remedy or advantage againft your fervant, and it be a cloak for him to hide all his rebellion and untoward ice becaufe you have mifufed him.

and therefore my fentence is, that you patiently bear with in fmall faults, and amend your own great faults, as op- ion, cruelty, and covetoufnefs, requiring more than a fer- can do, efpecially being tired with labour, ftarved with ger, and lamed with ftripes. And thefe things amended, if o his fervice negligently, (as no doubt fometimes he will) hen you may boldly correct him with difcretion; and some- if he do not his task, you make him go to bed fupperlefs: yet beat him not with durable ftrokes, neither with-hold meat in due time, and pinch him not by the belly continu- but let him have fomething to joy in: only watch him, keep him from doing of harm. Though he be but a stran- in the life that is in God; yet be good to ftrangers, for we all ftrangers in darknefs, and captives in fin, as well foul fpirit, being in Egypt, as now the flefh is yet unbap- d with the terrible red fea of death, and remember that one abideth for the ftranger, I mean one reward abideth for y and foul in the land of everlafting reft. And therefore in- him gently, and deal with him juftly now; for the time come that the yoke of bondage fhall be taken from his neck, he fhall be a fellow heir with your younger brother.

Circumcife him therefore, but do not mifufe him, nor keep from his own, but deal mercifully with the ftranger, that may fay, Oh of what understanding heart is this people: who God? or where is God fo nigh as to thefe? God make you and politic in heart, victorious in the field of this world, ble the nations with a rod: but kill not the Gibeonites, with on peace is taken; but let them draw water and hew wood, give them their meat and drink due for labourers, and be becaufe your difeafe is fo remedied; for it is better and er for a thirfty labouring man to drink, than for a drunken n to tell a fober tale. Yea, it is a token that you have ear- ly followed your labour, and not kept company with drunk- and belly-gods; and therefore be glad, I fay, yea, and be again, for great is your reward in heaven; yea, blessed ll they be, that in this your zeal fhall meet you, and with- w your hand from revenging yourfelf upon that churlifh al: which thing I hope to do now with thefe fweet raifins, trails of figs. I being of one houfe with your fervant Nabal, re fay to you that churlifhnefs is his name: but revenge for the Lord fhall do it in his due time. Farewel, mine heart.

Your's in bonds at Weftgate, NICHOLAS SHETERDEN.

The next day after the condemnation of thefe afore- which was the 26th day of July, W. Coker, Hopper, of Crambrooke, Henry Laurence, Richard Wright, of Afhford, and W. Stere, of Afhford, were likewise condemned for the fame articles. But becaufe the execution of thefe martyrs pertaineth not to this month, more fhall be faid of them when we come to the following month of Auguft.

A brief Account of NICHOLAS HALL and CHRIS- TOPHER WAID.

THE fame month of July, Nicholas Hall, brick- layer, and Christopher Waid, of Dartford, fuf- fered death, who were condemned by Maurice bifhop of Rochefter about the laft day of June. The fix ar- ticles adminiftered to them were of the fame ordinary courfe and effect with the other articles above fpecified, the brief fum whereof were thefe.

1. First, That they were christian men and professed the catholic determinations of our holy mother church.
2. That they which maintain or hold otherwise than our holy mother the catholic church doth, are heretics.
3. That they hold and maintain, that in the sacra- ment of the altar, under the forms of bread and wine, is not the very body and blood of Chrift. And that the faid very body of Chrift is verily in heaven only, and not in the facrament.
4. That they have and do hold and maintain, that the mafs, as it is now ufed in the catholic church, is naught and abominable.
5. That they have been, and be amongst the people of that jurifdiction vehemently fufpected upon the pre- mifes, and thereupon indicted, &c.

To thefe articles they answered as follows: First, Granting themfelves christian men, and acknowledging the determination of the holy church, that is, of the congregation or body of Chrift; fave that Hall denied to call the catholic and apoftolic church his mother, becaufe he found not this word Mother in the fcrip- tures.

To the fecond they granted. To the third article as touching the very body and blood of Chrift to be un- der the forms of bread and wine in fubftance, they would not grant, only affirming the very body of him to be in heaven, and the facrament to be a token or remem- brance of Chrift's death; Nicholas Hall adding more- over, and faying, That whereas before he held the fa- crament to be but only a token or remembrance of Chrift's death, now he faid, that there is neither token nor remembrance, becaufe it is now mifufed and clean turned from Chrift's institution, &c. And concerning the mafs in the fourth article, to be abominable, Chri- ftopher Waid, with the other, answered, that as they had confefled before, fo they would not now go from what they had faid. To the fifth article, for the peo- ple's fufpicion, they made no great account nor fticking to grant the fame.

And thus much concerning the articles and answers of thefe good men. Which being received, immedi- ately fentence of condemnation was pronounced by the faid Maurice the bifhop againft them, the copy of which fentence as it runneth much after the common courfe in condemning all the other fervants of Chrift, fo the fame being exemplified before, needeth not here to be repeated. Nicholas Hall was burnt at Rochefter about the 19th day of July.

Furthermore, with the aforefaid Hall and Waid, in the fame month of July, three others were condemned by Maurice, bifhop of Rochefter, whose names were Joan Beach, widow, John Harpol, of Rochefter, and Margery Polley. Of which Margery Polley, touching her examination and condemnation here followeth an account.

The CONDEMNATION of MARGERY POLLEY, Widow and Martyr.

MArgery Polley, widow, sometime wife of Richard Polley of Pepingbery, was accused and brought before the faid Maurice bifhop of Rochefter, about the beginning of the month of June. Which bifhop, ac- cording according to the pontifical solemnity of that church, rising up out of the chair of his majesty, in the high swelling stile after his ordinary manner to dash the silly poor woman, began in these words :

" We Maurice, by the sufferance of God, bishop of Rochester, proceeding of our mere office in a cause of heresy, against thee Margery Polley, of the parish of Pepingbery, of our diocese and jurisdiction of Rochester, do lay and object against thee all and singular these articles ensuing. To which, and to every parcel of them, we require of thee a true, full, and plain answer, by virtue of thine oath thereupon to be given," &c.

Thus the oath being first administered, and the articles commenced against her, which articles were the same that were ministered to Nicholas Hall and Waid before, she so framed her answers again, especially answering to the third and fourth article, that she neither allowed the deity of their sacrament, nor the absurdity of their mass. For which sentence was read against her about the beginning of June, and she condemned for the same. But because her death followed not upon the same, we will therefore defer the transaction thereof to the due place and time, first setting down in order of history the execution of Christopher Waid before mentioned.

The MARTYRDOM of CHRISTOPHER WAID.

CHRISTOPHER Waid, of Dartford, in the county of Kent, linen-weaver, was condemned, by Maurice bishop of Rochester, and appointed to be burnt at Dartford aforesaid. At the day appointed for his execution, which was in the month of July, there was carried out of town betimes in the morning in a cart, a stake, and therewith many bundles of reeds, to a place a quarter of a mile out of town, called the Brimth, into a gravel-pit thereby, the common place for the execution of felons. Thither also was brought a load of broom faggots, with other faggots and tall wood. Unto which place the people of the country resorted in great numbers, and there waited his coming; insomuch that divers fruiterers came thither with horse-loads of cherries, and sold them. About ten o'clock the sheriff came riding with a great many other gentlemen and retinue, appointed to assist him therein, and with them Christopher Waid, Margery Polley, of Tunbridge, riding pinioned by him, both singing of a psalm; which Margery, as soon as she espied afar off the multitude gathered about the place where they should suffer, waiting their coming, she said unto Waid very loud and cheerfully, You may rejoice, to see such a company gathered to celebrate your marriage this day.

And so passing by the place, which joined to the highway, they were straitway carried down to the town, where she was kept till the sheriff returned from Waid's execution. Mr. Waid being made ready, and stripped off his cloaths in an inn, a fair long white shirt was brought unto him from his wife, which being put on, and he pinioned, was led up on foot again to the aforesaid place. When he was come to the stake, he took it in his arms, and kissed it, setting his back unto it, and standing in a pitch barrel which was taken from the beacon, being hard by; then a smith brought a hoop of iron, and with two staples made him fast to the stake under his arms.

As soon as he was thus settled, with his eyes and hands lifted up to heaven, he spake with a cheerful and loud voice the last verse of the 86th Psalm; " Shew some good token upon me, O Lord, that they which hate me may see it, and be ashamed: because thou, Lord, hast helped me, and comforted me." Near to the stake was a little hill, upon the top whereof were set up four stays, quadrangle-wise, with a covering round about like a pulpit: into which place as Waid was thus praying at the stake, entered a friar with a book in his hand; whom when Waid espied, he cried earnestly unto the people, to take heed of the doctrine of the whore of Babylon, exhorting them to embrace the doctrine of the gospel preached in King Edward's days. While he was thus speaking to the people, the sheriff interrupted him, saying, Be quiet Waid, and die patiently. I am quiet, said he, I thank God, Mr. Sheriff, and so trust to be. All this while the friar stood still looking over the corner, as though he would have uttered somewhat: but Waid mightily admonished the people to beware of the doctrine; which when the friar perceived, whether he was amazed, or could have no audience of the people, he withdrew out of the place immediately, without speaking any word, and went away down to the town. Then the reeds being set about him, he pulled them and embraced them in his arms, always with his hands making a hole against his face, that his voice might be heard, which his tormenters perceiving, they cast faggots at the same hole; but notwithstanding he still, he could, put them off, his face being hurt with the heat of a faggot cast thereat. Then fire being put unto him, he cried unto God often, Lord Jesus receive my soul without any token or sign of impatience in the fire, at length after the fire was thoroughly kindled, he was heard by no man to speak, still holding up his hands together over his head towards heaven, even when he was dead and altogether roasted, as though they had been stayed up with a prop standing under them.

This sign did God shew upon him, whereby his enemies might perceive; that God had, according to his prayer, shewed such a token upon him, even to the shame and confusion. And thus was the order of this godly martyr's execution, this was his end. Where God seemed to confound and strike with the spirit of dumbness the friar, that locust which was risen up to have spoken against him; and also no less wonderfully sustained those hands which he lifted up to him for comfort in his torment.

The APPREHENSION, EXAMINATION, CONDEMNATION, and BURNING of DIRICK CARVER, and JOHN LAUNDER, who suffered MARTYRDOM for the Testimony of the Gospel.

THE 22d day of July, Dirick Carver, late of the parish of Bighthelmstone in the county of Suffolk was burnt at Lewes in the said county. And the following John Launder, late of Godstone in the county of Surry, was burnt at Stening. These two men were with others, about the latter end of the month of October, in the year 1554, apprehended by Edward Gage gentleman, as they were at prayers in the dwelling house of the said Dirick, and by him were sent up to the queen's council, who, after examination, sent them as prisoners to Newgate, there to attend the leisure of Bonner bishop of London. From whence (upon the bishop's receipt of a letter from the lord marquis of Winchester, now lord treasurer) they were brought by the keeper of the prison on the 8th of June next after into the bishop's chamber at his house in London; and there (being examined upon divers points of religion) they made their several confessions, subscribing and signing with their own hands: which being read, the bishop objected unto them certain other articles, causing them to swear truly and directly their answers thereunto; which articles they confessed to be true, referring themselves chiefly to their former confession.

This done, after long persuasions and fair exhortations, they were demanded whether they would stand to their answers. To whom Launder said, I will never go from these answers as long as I live. The other also confirmed the same, and therefore they were commanded to appear again before the bishop in the consistory at St. Paul's the tenth day of the same month. Which articles and confession, with the forementioned letter, do here ensue.

A LETTER

From the Marquis of WINCHESTER, Lord Treasurer, to BONNER, Bishop of LONDON, touching the Examination of the said Prisoners.

AFTER my right hearty commendations to your good ship, I shall not forget your livery of black against the time; no more I shall Mr. Dean, to whom I wrote to fermon, who must now assuredly do it: for my lord of Winchester cannot attend it. To whom I have given like knowledge by my letter now sent: and your lordship must command the sextons of your church to be in readiness for ringing in time of service. And if you be not furnished with black apparel for the altar, and for the priest, deacon, and sub-deacon, I must have knowledge thereof, that it may be taken of the queen's stuff, whereof I pray you let me be advertised.

And you have sent Bradford to Newgate, as a man convicted hereby before you: but as I perceive you have not sent me a significavit, and therefore you must send me one, that I may proceed with him, and that shall I do, as soon as I am answered by you.

There be divers like prisoners that came from Suffex, that be yet examined before you, lying now in Newgate, who must be examined by you, since they be come to London, and so I say they may be, and I certified of your proceedings, that I may follow, which I shall do, thanking your lordship heartily for my conies, trusting to recompense your lordship again shortly with twice as many. From my house this seventh of June, 1555.

Your loving friend,

WINCHESTER.

CONFESSIOⁿ of DIRICK CARVER, before BONNER, BISHOP of LONDON.

DIRICK CARVER, beer-brewer, of Brighthelmstone, in the county of Suffex, where he hath dwelt about eight or nine years, born in the village of Milson by Stockom, in the land of Luke, about forty years of age, and now prisoner in Newgate, where he hath remained and continued at the council's commandment, since Alhallows-day last past, being examined concerning his faith and belief in the sacrament of the altar, faith, that he hath and doth believe, that the very substance of the body and blood of Christ is not in the said sacrament, and that there is no other substance remaining in the said sacrament after the words spoken by the priest, but only the substance of bread and wine.

Item, Being examined concerning the mass in Latin now used in the church of England, he believeth, that there is no sacrifice in the mass, and that there is in it no salvation for a christian man, except it should be said in the mother tongue, that he might understand it; and concerning the ceremonies of the church, he faith and believeth, that they be not profitable to a christian man.

Item, Being examined concerning auricular confession, he answereth, That he hath believed, and doth believe, that it is necessary to go to a good priest for good counsel: but the absolution of the priest, laying his hand upon any man's head, as is now used, is nothing profitable to a christian man's salvation. And further he faith, that he hath not been confessed, nor received the sacrament of the altar, since the coronation of the queen that now is.

Item, Concerning the faith and religion now taught, set forth and believed in the church of England, he answereth and believeth, that the faith and doctrine now taught, set forth, and used in the said church of England, is not agreeable to God's word. And furthermore he faith, that bishop Hooper, Cardmaker, Rogers, and others of their opinion, who were lately burnt, were good christian men, and preached the true doctrine of Christ, as he believeth; and faith, that they shed their blood in the same doctrine, which was by the power of God, as he faith and believeth.

And further being examined, he faith, That since the queen's coronation, he hath had the bible and psalter read in his house at Brighthelmstone divers times, and likewise since his coming to Newgate: but the keeper hearing thereof, took them away; and also said, that about a twelvemonth ago, he had the English procession said in his house, with other English prayers. And further said, That Thomas Iveson, John Launder, and William Vesie, being prisoners with him in Newgate, were taken with this examine in his house at Brighthelmstone, as they were hearing the gospel then read in English, a little before Alhallows-day last, and brought into the court: and being examined thereupon by the council, were committed by them to prison in Newgate.

No. 22.

The CONFESSION of JOHN LAUNDER, before BONNER, BISHOP of LONDON.

JOHN LAUNDER, of the parish of Godstone, in the county of Surry, husbandman, aged 25 years, born at Godstone afore said, being examined, doth confesse and say, That about two days before last Alhallow-tide, this examine and one Dirick Carver, Thomas Iveson, William Vesie, with divers other persons, to the number of twelve, (being all together at their prayers, saying the service in English, set forth in the time of king Edward the Sixth, in the house of the said Dirick Carver, situated at Brighthelmstone in Suffex) were apprehended by one Mr. Gage, and by him sent up to London to the king and queen's council, and by them (upon his examination) committed to Newgate, where he and his said fellows have ever since remained.

And further being examined, he doth confesse and say, that the occasion of his coming to the said Brighthelmstone, was upon some business there to be done for his father: and so being there, and hearing that the said Dirick was a man that did much favour the gospel, this examine did resort to his house and company, whom before that time he did never see or know, and by reason of that his resort he was apprehended as before. And further doth confesse and believe, that there is here in earth one whole and universal catholic church, whereof the members be dispersed through the world; and doth believe also, that the same church doth set forth and teach only two sacraments, namely, the sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the supper of our Lord. And whosoever doth teach or use any more sacraments, or yet any ceremonies, he doth not believe that they be of the catholic church, but doth abhor them from the bottom of his heart. And doth further say and believe, that all the service, sacrifices and ceremonies, now used in this realm of England (yea, and in all other parts of the world, which have been used after the same manner) be erroneous and naught, and contrary to Christ's institution, and the determination of Christ's catholic church, whereof he believeth that he himself is a member.

Also he doth confesse and believe, that in the sacrament, now called the sacrament of the altar, there is not really and truly contained, under the forms of bread and wine, the very natural body and blood of Christ in substance: but his belief and faith therein is as followeth, to wit, That when he doth receive the material bread and wine, he doth receive the same in a remembrance of Christ's death and passion; and so receiving it, he doth eat and drink Christ's body and blood by faith, and none otherways as he believeth.

And moreover he doth confesse, say, and believe, that the mass now used in the realm of England, or elsewhere in all Christendom, is naught and abominable, and directly against God's word, and his catholic church; and that there is nothing said or used in it good and profitable. For he faith, that albeit the Gloria in excelsis, the creed, Sanctus Pater-noster, Agnus, and other parts of the mass, be of themselves good and profitable, yet the same being used among other things that be naught and superfluous in the mass, the same good things do become naught also, as he believeth.

Also he doth believe and confesse, that auricular confession is not necessary to be made to any priest, or to any other creature, but every person ought to confesse his sins only to God, and also that no man hath any authority to absolve any one from his sins; and also believeth, that the right and true way (according to the scripture) after a man hath fallen from grace to sin, to arise to Christ again, is to be sorry for his offences, and to do the same or the like no more; and not to make any auricular confession of them to the priest, or to take absolution of them at the priest's hands. All which his said opinions he hath believed these seven or eight years past, and in that time hath divers times openly argued and defended the same, as he faith, &c.

Upon Monday, being the 10th day of June, these two persons, with others, were brought by the keeper unto the bishop's consistory, (as it was before commanded) at one o'clock in the afternoon, where the bishop first beginning with the said Dirick Carver, caused his confession to be openly read unto him, asking him whether he would stand to the same. To whom the said Dirick answered, that he would: for your doctrine, said he, is poison and forcery. If Christ were here, you would put him to a worse death than he was put to before.

You say that you can make a god: you can make a pudding as well. Your ceremonies in the church be beggary and poison. And further I say, that auricular confession is contrary to God's word, and very poison: with divers other such like words.

The bishop seeing his constancy, and that neither his accustomed flatteries, nor yet his cruel threatenings could once move this good man to incline to their idolatry, pronounced his usual and general blessing, as well towards Dirick Carver, as also on the said John Launder, although severally; who remained as constant as the other: and therefore were both delivered to the sheriffs, who were there present, but afterwards were conveyed to the places above-named, and there most joyfully gave their bodies to be burned in the fire, and their souls into the hands of Almighty God, by Jesus Christ, who hath assured them to a better hope of life.

Dirick Carver was a man whom the Lord had blessed as well with temporal riches, as with his spiritual treasures; which were yet no clog or hinderance unto his true professing of Christ, (God by his grace so working in him) of which there was such havock made by the greedy ravens of that time, that his poor wife and children had little thereof. During his imprisonment, although he was well stricken in years, (and, as it were, past the time of learning) yet he so diligently spent his time, that being at his first apprehension utterly ignorant of any letter of a book, he could before his death perfectly read any printed English. His zeal and industry is worthy of no small commendation, and therefore I thought good not to pass it over in silence, but is recommended for the good example and encouragement of others.

Moreover, at his coming into the town of Lewes to be burnt, the people called to him, beseeching God to strengthen him in the faith of Jesus Christ. He thanked them, and prayed to God that of his mercy he would strengthen them in the like faith. And when he came to the sign of the Star, the people flocked about him, where the sheriff said, that he had found him a faithful man in all his answers. And as he came to the stake, he kneeled down and said his prayers, and the sheriff made haste.

Then his book was thrown into the barrel, and when he had stripped himself, (as a joyful servant of God) he went into the barrel himself. And as soon as ever he came in, he took the book and threw it among the people, and then the sheriff commanded, in the name of the king and queen, on pain of death, to throw in the book again. And immediately the holy martyr began to speak with a joyful voice, saying:

Dear brethren and sisters, I call you all to witness, that I come to seal Christ's gospel with my blood, because I know that it is true: it is well known to you all, that it hath been truly preached here in Lewes, and in all places of England, and now it is not. And because I will not deny God's gospel, and be obedient to man's laws, I am condemned to die. Dear brethren and sisters, as many of you as do believe in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, unto everlasting life, see you do the works appertaining to the same. And as many of you as do believe in the pope of Rome and his laws, which he sets forth in these days, you do believe to your utter condemnation, and, except the infinite mercy of God prevent it, you shall burn in the eternal flames of hell.

Immediately the sheriff spake unto him, and said, If thou dost not believe on the pope, thou art damned body and soul. And further the sheriff said unto him, Speak to thy God, that he may deliver thee now, or else to strike me down, to the example of this people; but this pious man said, The Lord forgive you your sayings.

And then he spake again to all the people there present with a loud voice saying, Dear brethren, and you whom I have offended in words or in deed, I ask you for the Lord's sake to forgive me, and I beseech you to forgive all you who have offended me in thought, word or deed. And he said further in his prayer, O Lord my God, thou hast written, "He that will not forsake his wife, children, house, and every thing that he hath, and take up thy cross and follow thee, is not worthy of thee." But thou, Lord, knowest that I have forsaken all to come unto thee: Lord have mercy upon me, for unto thee I commend my spirit; and my soul doth rejoice in thee. These were the last words of that faithful servant of Christ, before the fire was put to him. And when the fire came to him, he cried, O Lord, have mercy upon me, and sprung up in the fire, calling upon the name of Jesus, and so he ended his life.

An Account of THOMAS IVESON, MARTYR.

THOMAS IVESON, of Godstone in the county of Surry, carpenter, was burnt about the same month at Chichester; whose apprehension, examination, and condemnation, (inasmuch as it was at the same time, and in the same form with Dirick Carver's and John Launder's) I here omit, referring the reader to their history and process before-mentioned, except only this his separate confession and private answers made before bishop Bonner at his last examination in the consistory, I thought not to omit, who being examined upon the aforesaid articles, answered as followeth.

The ANSWERS of THOMAS IVESON, to the OBJECTIONS of BONNER, Bishop of London, in a Chamber at his House, in the Month of July.

FIRST, That I believed, that there is but one catholic, universal, and whole church of Christ through the whole world, which hath held, and doth hold the true faith, and all the necessary articles of christian belief, and all the sacraments of Christ, with the true use and administration of the same.

2. Item, That he is necessarily bounden to believe and give credit, in all the said faith, articles of the belief, religion, and the sacraments of Christ, and the administration of the same.

3. Item, That the faith, religion, and administration of sacraments, which now is believed, used, taught, and set forth in this our church of England, is not agreeing with the truth and faith of Christ, nor with the faith of the said catholic and universal church of Christ.

4. Item, Concerning the sacrament of the altar, he believeth that it is a very idol, and detestable before God, as it is now administered.

5. Item, That the mass is naught, and not of the institution of Christ, but that it is of man's invention: and being demanded, whether any thing used in the mass be good, he said that he would answer no further.

6. Item, That he hath not received the sacrament of the altar since it had been administered as now it is in England, neither was confessed at any time within these seven years; nor heard mass for the same space.

7. Item, That auricular confession is not necessary to be made to a priest; for he cannot forgive, nor absolve him from sins.

8. Item, Concerning the sacrament of baptism, that it is a sign and token of Christ, as circumcision was, and no otherwise; and he believeth that his sins are not washed away thereby, but his body only washed; for his sins be washed away only by Christ's blood.

9. Item, That there be in the catholic church of Christ only two sacraments, that is to say, the sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the supper of the Lord, and no more, which are not rightly used at this present time in England, and therefore be unprofitable.

10. Item, He believeth that all the ceremonies now used

d in the church of England, are vain, superfluous, superstitious, and naught. Furthermore, the said Iveson being earnestly persuaded to recant, said in this wise, I would not recant and make my opinion and belief for all the goods in London: I do appeal to God's mercy, and will be none of your church, nor submit myself to the same: and that I have said, I will say again. And if there came an angel from heaven to teach me any other doctrine than which I am now in, I would not believe him. Which answer thus made, he was condemned as an heretic, and with the same persons was committed to the secular power, as they term it, and at the place above-mentioned was burned, persevering still in his constant faith unto the end.

ACCOUNT of JOHN ALEWORTH, who died in PRISON.

IN the latter end of the month of July, John Aleworth died in prison at the town of Reading, being there in bonds for the testimony of the gospel. Whom though the catholic prelates (according to their usual custom) excluded out of their catholic burial, yet we have no cause to exclude him out of the number of Christ's martyrs, and heirs of his holy kingdom.

An ACCOUNT of JAMES ABBES, MARTYR.

Among many that endeavoured in these troublesome days to keep a good conscience, there was one James Abbes, a young man, who was enforced to have part with his brethren in wandering, and going from place to place, to avoid the peril of apprehension. But at length he was caught by the hands of wicked men, and brought before Dr. Hopkins, bishop of Norwich: who examining him of his religion, and charging him therewith both with threats and fair speeches, at last the said James Abbes did yield to their naughty persuasions, although his conscience consented not thereto. Now when he was dismissed, and should go from the bishop, the bishop calling him again, gave him a piece of money, either lx d. or xx d. whether I know not; which when the said James had received, and was gone from the bishop, his conscience began to throb, and hardly to accuse his fact: in which combat with himself (being piteously vexed) he went immediately to the bishop again, and there threw him his said money which he had received at his hand, and said, he repented that he ever gave his consent to their wicked persuasions, and in taking of his money. Now this being done, the bishop with his chaplains laboured afresh to win him again, but in vain; for he would not yield to their persuasions, (although he had loved Peter before through infirmity) but stood manfully in his master's quarrel to the end, and abode the force of the fire in the consuming of his body to ashes, which tyranny of burning was done in Bury, the second of August, 1555.

ACCOUNT of the APPREHENSION, EXAMINATION, and CONDEMNATION of JOHN DENLEY, GENTLEMAN, JOHN NEWMAN, and PATRICK PACKINGHAM.

IN the midst of this tempestuous rage of malignant adversaries, persecuting and destroying the poor flock of Christ, many there were, which though they were spiritual men, yet thought to help forward for their arts, and as one would say, to heap up more coals to this furious flame of persecution, whether of a blind zeal, or a parasitical flattery, I know not. Amongst which was one Edmund Tyrel, Esq; and at that time a peace of the peace within the county of Essex, an assistant to the cruel murderers of God's saints: who as he came from the burning of some pious martyrs, met with John Denley, gentleman, and John Newman, (both of Maidstone in Kent) travelling upon the way, and going to visit some of their friends in the said county of Essex.

And upon the sight of them, as he bragged, apprehended them upon suspicion, and searched them, and finding the confessions of their faith about them in writing, sent them up unto the queen's commissioners, directing also unto one of the same commissioners these his favourable letters in their behalf: the copy whereof here followeth.

A LETTER

From EDMUND TYREL, Esq; to one of the QUEEN'S COMMISSIONERS.

SIR, with the most hearty commendations unto you, these shall be to advertise you, that I have received a letter from sir Nicholas Hare and you, and others of their majesties commissioners, by a servant of the king and queen's, named John Failes, for certain business about S. Osythes, which I could not immediately go about, for that I had received a letter from the council, to assist the sheriff for the execution of the heretics, the one at Raleigh, and the other at Rochford, which was done on Tuesday last.

And as I came homeward, I met with two men: even as I saw them, I suspected them, and then I did examine and search them, and found about them certain letters which I have sent you, and also a certain writing in paper, what their faith was. And they confessed to me, that they had forsaken and fled out of their country for religion's sake; and since they have been in many countries, by their own confession, which I have sent you: for which I thought it good, (as they came from London, and that there may be more found of them than at present I can inform you) to send them to you, whereby you and others of the king and queen's commissioners there might try them, so that their lewdness may thoroughly be known; for I think these have caused many to trouble their consciences. So this hath been some hinderance to me, wherefore I could not go about those matters expressed in your letters: but to-morrow at noon I intend by God's grace to accomplish your letters, with as much diligence as I can. May the Holy Trinity ever have you in his keeping. I beseech you (master) to be so good as to discharge these poor men that bring these prisoners up as soon as may be. And thus most heartily farewell. From Rainesdon-park the 12th day of June, 1555.

By your assured to command,
EDMUND TYREL.

Forasmuch as in this letter mention is made of a certain writing found about them, containing an account of their faith, the contents thereof here ensue.

Certain NOTES collected and gathered out of the Scriptures by JOHN DENLEY, GENTLEMAN, with a CONFESSION of his FAITH, touching the Sacrament of Christ's Body and Blood, found in his Pocket at the Time of his Apprehension.

"Christ is in the sacrament, as he is where two or three are gathered together in his name."

THE difference of the doctrine between the faithful and the papists concerning the sacrament is, that the papists say, that Christ is corporally under, or in the forms of bread and wine; but the faithful say, that Christ is not there, neither corporally nor spiritually; but in them that worthily eat and drink the bread and wine, he is spiritually, but not corporally.

For figuratively he is in the bread and wine, and spiritually he is in them that worthily eat and drink the bread and wine; but really, carnally, and corporally he is only in heaven, from whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

"My belief in the sacrament of the blessed body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ."

AS concerning the sacrament of the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, my belief is this, that the bread and wine is appointed unto a sacrament; and that after thanks be given to God the Father, then it doth represent unto me the very body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ; not that the bread is the body, or the wine the blood, but that I in faith do see that blessed body of our Saviour broken on the cross, and his precious blood plentifully shed for the redemption of my sins. Also in faith I hear him call us unto him, saying, "Come unto me all ye that labour and are laden, and I will refresh you," Isa. lv. also Matth. xi. &c. In faith I come unto him, and I am refreshed, so that I believe that all that that do come to the table of the Lord in this faith, fear and love, being sorry for their offences, intending earnestly to lead a godly conversation in this vale of misery, do receive the fruit of the death of Christ, which fruit is our salvation.

I do understand (spiritually) that as the outward man doth eat the material bread which comforteth the body, so doth the inward man (through faith) eat the body of Christ, believing that as the bread is broken, so was Christ's body broken on the cross for our sins; which comforteth our souls unto life everlasting; and signifying thereby, that even as that bread was divided among them, so should his body and fruit of his passion be distributed unto as many as believed in his words. But the bread broken and eaten in the supper admonisheth and putteth us in remembrance of his death, and so exciteth us to thanksgiving, to laud and praise God for the benefits of our redemption.

And thus we there have Christ present; in the inward eye and sight of our faith we eat his body and drink his blood; that is, we believe surely that his body was crucified for our sins, and his blood shed for our salvation.

Christ's body and blood are not contained in the sacramental bread and wine, as the papists have said, and as some yet do say, as ye read in these scriptures following: namely in Matth. ix. xxiv. and xxvi. Luke v. xxiv. and xxiii. Mark xvi. John xiii. xiv. xv. xvi. and xvii. Acts i. iii. vii. and ix. Rom. viii. Psal. viii. 1 Cor. x. and xi. Exod. xii. Coloss. i. Ephes. i. and iv. Phil. i. and ii. 1 Thess. i. and ix. Heb. i. v. viii. ix. x. and xii. 1 Pet. iii. Psal. xi. xlvii. ciii. and x.

"Christ's material body is not in all places, as these scriptures do testify hereafter."

First read St. Matthew the last, Mark the last, Luke the last, John xi. xx. and xxi. These places of the scripture do plainly declare, that his body that was born of the virgin Mary, cannot be in more places than one, and that is in heaven, on the right hand of God, and not in the sacrament, nor in all places, as the papists have affirmed, and yet do affirm.

Therefore whosoever they be that worship the creatures of bread and wine, do commit idolatry, and make abominable idols of them, and take the glory from God, and give it to his creatures, which is contrary to the mind of God, as these scriptures hereafter do testify: namely Exod. xx. xxii. xxiii. and xxiv. Lev. xix. Deut. iv. vi. and xxxii. Psal. lxxx. Isai. xlv. Mal. ii. Matth. iv. Luke iv. Acts xiv. Rev. xiv. Psal. xcvi. 1 Cor. i. Ephes. iv. 1 Tim. ii. 1 John v. Rev. xix. and xxii.

JOHN DENLEY.

Now to return to the commissioners again: they receiving these prisoners before-mentioned, after they saw they could little prevail with their own persuasions, sent them to bishop Bonner, to be handled after his fatherly and charitable discretion. Which how discreet and favourable it was, the history of others, as well as the sequel of this, doth manifestly declare. For the 28th of June then next following he caused the said Denley and Newman, with one Patrick Packingham, to be brought into his chamber within his house or palace, there examining them upon their confessions (which Tyrel had found about them), objecting also unto them certain other articles of his own. To which they all answered in effect one thing, although Denley answered more largely than the others, and therefore I thought his answers sufficient to lay down, as containing the substance of all the rest, except that Packingham had one article of no great force objected to him, which the others had not.

This done, the bishop began with his accustomed persuasions; to whom Mr. Denley replied, God save me from your counsel, and keep me in the mind I am now in, for what you count heresy I take to be the truth: and thereupon they were commanded to appear in the bishop's consistory the fifth day of July then next coming, in the afternoon, where these articles were objected against them.

ARTICLES objected by EDMUND BONNER, Bishop of London, against JOHN DENLEY, JOHN NEWMAN, and PATRICK PACKINGHAM, jointly and severally, the 28th of June, 1555.

FIRST, That the said Denley now is of the diocese of London, and the jurisdiction of the bishop of London.

Secondly, That the said Denley hath not believed, nor doth believe, that there is any catholic church of Christ here in earth.

Thirdly, That the said Denley hath not believed, nor doth believe, that this church of England is any part or member of the said catholic church.

Fourthly, That the said Denley hath believed and doth believe, that the mass now used in this realm of England is naught, and full of idolatry and evil, and plain against God's word, and therefore he, the said Denley, hath not heard it, nor will hear it.

Fifthly, That the said Denley hath believed, and doth so believe, that auricular confession now used in this realm of England, is not good, but contrary to God's word.

Sixthly, That the said Denley hath believed, and doth so believe, that absolution given by the priest hearing confession, is not good, nor allowable by God's word, but contrary to the same.

Seventhly, That the said Denley hath believed, and doth so believe, that christening of children, as it is now used in the church of England, is not good, nor allowable by God's word, but against it: likewise confirming of children, giving of orders, saying of mattins and even-song, anointing of sick persons, making of holy bread and holy water, with the rest of the church.

Eighthly, That the said Denley hath believed, and doth so believe, that there are but two sacraments in Christ's catholic church, that is to say, the sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the altar.

Ninthly, That the said Denley hath believed, and doth so believe, that forasmuch as Christ is ascended up into heaven, therefore the very body of Christ is not in the sacrament of the altar.

Tenthly, That thou Patrick Packingham, now being of the age of twenty-one at least, being within the house of the bishop of London at St. Paul's, and by him brought to the great chapel to hear mass there, the 23d day of June, in the year of our Lord 1555, didst unreverently stand in the said chapel, having thy cap on thy head all the time of mass; and didst also refuse to receive holy water and holy bread at the hands of the priest, there contemning and despising both the mass and the said holy water and holy bread.

ANSWERS to the foregoing ARTICLES.

TO the first article I answer, It is very true. To the second article, I answer, That it is not true: for I believe the holy catholic church, which is built upon the foundation of the prophets and apostles, Christ being the head; which holy church is the congregation of faithful people dispersed through the whole world, which church doth truly preach God's holy word; and doth also administer the two sacraments, that is to say, baptism and the supper of the Lord, according to the blessed word.

To the third article I answer, That I do believe that this church of England, using the faith and religion which is now used, is no part or member of the aforelaid catholic church, but is the church of Antichrist, the bishop of Rome being the head thereof: for it is plain, that they have altered the testament of God, and set up a testament of their own devising, full of blasphemy and lies, for Christ's testament is, that he would have all things done to the edifying of the people, as it appeareth where he taught them to pray, Matth. vi. and also it appeareth by St. Paul, 1 Cor. xiv. for he saith, that "He that prophesieth, speaketh unto men for their edifying, for their exhortation, and for their comfort; he that speaketh with the tongue, profiteth himself; he that prophesieth, edifieth the congregation."

Also he saith, "Even so likewise when you speak with gues, except you speak words that have signification, shall it be understood what is spoken? for you shall speak in the air, that is as much as to say, in vain.
so he saith, Thou verily givest thanks well, but the er is not edified. I thank my God, I speak with gues more than you all: yet I had rather in the congregation to speak five words with understanding, to the ormation of others, than ten thousand words with the gue. Also he saith, Let all things be done to edifiion."

Also it is written in the xlvi. Psalm, "For God is ng of all the earth: O sing praises unto him with un-standing," &c. So it doth appear that this church of ngland, now used, is not built upon Christ, if St. Paul's ords be true, and also the Psalms; therefore this church not built upon the prophets, apostles, nor Christ, as I ve before declared.

To the fourth article I answer, and I do believe (as I d before), That the mass now used in this realm of ngland, is naught, and abominable idolatry and blasemy against God's holy word; for Christ in his holy pper instituted the sacrament of bread and wine be eaten together in remembrance of his death till come, and not to have them worshipped, and make d of them: for God will not be worshipped in s creatures, but we ought to give him praise for his atures, which he hath created for us. For he saith in e second commandment, "Thou shalt not make to yself any graven image, nor the likeness of any thing at is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, thou alt not bow down to them, nor worship them." So it peareth by this commandment, that we ought not to orship the sacrament of bread and wine, for it is an idolatry; for he saith, No similitude; therefore, thou shalt not bow down to them, nor worship them.
pray you what do you call kneeling down, holding o the hands, knocking of the breast, putting off the p, and making courtesy, with other like superstion? You would make men to be so blind as to think at this is no worshipping.

Peradventure you will object and say, You do not orship the bread and wine, but Christ's body, which as born of the virgin Mary, contained under the forms bread and wine. But that is a very lie, for Christ's dy which was born of the virgin Mary is in heaven, St. Paul's words be true, as undoubtedly they are: for saith in Hebrews x. "But this man, after he had ffered one sacrifice for sins, is set down for ever on the ght hand of God, and from henceforth tarrieth till his es be made his footstool."

Also in chap. ix. he saith, "For Christ is not enered into holy places made with hands, which are militudes of true things, but he is entered into very aven, to appear now in the sight of God for us," &c. Also Phil. iii. "But our conversation is in hea-en, from whence we look for the Saviour, even the ord Jesus Christ," &c. 1 Thes. i. "For they themselves shew of you, what manner of entering in we had nto you, and how ye turned to God from images to ve the living God, and to look for his Son from hea-en, whom he raised from death, even Jesus which livered us from the wrath to come," &c. Also, John vi. "I went out from the Father, and came into e world." Again, "I leave the world, and go to e Father," &c. John xvii. "Now I am not in the orld, and they are in the world, and I come to thee."
All these places of scripture, with many more, plainly ove to them that have ears to hear, that Christ's body hich was born of the virgin Mary is in heaven, and ot in the sacramental bread and wine; and therefore is idolatry to worship them, &c.

To the fifth article I answer, That I do believe (as said before) that auricular confession is not good as is now used. Touching my sins wherein I have ffended God, I must seek to him for remission thereof, or our Saviour saith, in the 11th of St. Matt. "Come nto me all ye that labour and are laden, I will ease ou," &c. The prodigal son, Luke xv. saith, "I will ife and go to my Father, and I will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and annomore worthy to be called thy son," &c. Psal. xxxi.
No. 22.

"I said I will acknowledge mine offences, and accuse myself unto the Lord, and so thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin," &c. Job. xiii. "But I will reprove mine own ways in his sight: he shall make me whole, and there may no hypocrite come before him." Syrach xxxiv. "Who can be cleansed of the unclean?" And there were but one of the ten lepers that were cleansed, that came to Christ to give him thanks. He asked for the other nine. But if I have offended my neighbour, I must reconcile myself to him; and if I be a notorious sinner, after the first and second admonition, it ought to be declared to the congregation, and the minister of the congregation hath power by the word to excommunicate me, and I am to be taken as an heathen person, not for a day, or for forty days, but until such time as I do openly in the congregation acknowledge my fault, and then the minister hath power by the word to preach to me, or them, the remission of our sins in the blood of Jesus Christ, as it is written in the xliith of the Acts of the Apostles, and Matthew xviii. I know no more of any other confession.

To the sixth article, I the said John Denley have answered in the fifth.

To the seventh article I answer, that as touching the sacrament of baptism, which is the christening of children, it is altered and changed; for St. John used nothing but the preaching of the word and the water, as it doth appear when Christ required to be baptized of him, and others also who came to John to be baptized, as it appeareth, Matth. iii. Mark i. Luke iii. and Acts viii. the chamberlain said, See here is the water, what hindereth me to be baptized? It appeareth here that Philip had preached unto him; for he said, Here is water.
We do not read, that he asked for any cream, oil, or spittle, or conjured water, or conjured wax, or croyson, or salt, for it seemeth that Philip had preached no such things to him: for he would as well have asked for them as for water: and the water was not conjured, but even as it was before. Also Acts x. "Then answered Peter, Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized?" &c. Acts xvi. "And Paul and Silas preached unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house: and he took them the same hour of the night, and washed their wounds, and so was he baptized, and all they of his household straightway:" where you see nothing but preaching the word, and the water.
The like is to be said of the rest of the ceremonies of your church.

To the eighth article I answer shortly, that there be no more sacraments than two; baptism, and the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ; except you will make the rainbow a sacrament: for there is no sacrament but what hath a promise annexed to it.

To the ninth article I answer you, That you have my mind written already; for it was found about me when I was taken: and you also know my mind in the fourth article, plainly expressed, concerning the bodily presence: for Christ's body is in heaven, and will not be contained in so small a piece of bread. And as the words which Christ spake are true indeed, so must they also be understood by other places of scripture which Christ spake himself, and also the apostles after him.
And thus I make an end.

By me, JOHN DENLEY.

The first day of the month of July, the said three prisoners were brought into the consistory in St. Paul's, where Bonner proceeded against them after the usual form and manner of law, reading first their confessions, articles, and answers, and then tempting them sometimes with fair promises, at other times with threatenings, which indeed were generally his chief arguments and reasons. In the end, seeing their unmoveable constancy, upon the 5th of July he condemned them as heretics, and delivered them to the sheriffs of London, as to his common executioners, who kept them till they were commanded by writ to send them to their several places of suffering; and accordingly Mr. Den-

ley was sent to Uxbridge, where he was burned on the 8th day of August; and being set in the fire, with the burning flames about him, he sung a psalm.

Then cruel Dr. Story being there present, commanded one of the tormentors to throw a faggot at him, wherewith being so hurt that his face bled, he left singing, and clapt both his hands upon his face. Truly, said Dr. Story to him that hurled the faggot, thou hast marred a good old song.

Yet notwithstanding all this, he put his hands abroad in the flames, and sung again, resigning his spirit into the hands of God, through his Son Jesus Christ.

After the martyrdom of Mr. Denley at Uxbridge, which was the 8th of August, Mr. Patrick Packingham also suffered at the same town, about the 28th of the said month. This Packingham was charged by Bonner, (as you heard before in the tenth article) for his behaviour in the bishop's chapel, who at the mass time there standing, would not pull off his cap, which was taken for a heinous offence. Packingham being much persuaded by Bonner to recant, protested in these words to the bishop, That the church which he believed was no catholic church, but was the church of Satan, and therefore he would never turn to it, &c.

Furthermore as concerning the other, which was John Newman, pewterer, at Maidstone in Kent, he was burnt the last day of August, at Saffron-walden, in the county of Essex, whose examination and confession of his faith and belief, for which he was cruelly persecuted and burnt, here followeth.

The EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN NEWMAN.

JOHN NEWMAN, when apprehended, was first examined by Dr. Thornton, suffragan of Dover, at Tenterden. From thence he was carried to Bonner, and there condemned with Denley and Packingham. But because his examinations and answers came not then to my hands, I thought here in this place to bestow them, rather than they should be utterly suppressed. And first, what his answer was by writing to the said suffragan, after his apprehension, you shall hear by the tenor of his own words as follow:

IT may please you to understand, that for the space of all the time of the late king Edward's reign, we were diligently instructed with continual sermons, made by such men whose faith, wisdom, learning, and virtuous living, was commended unto all men under the king's hand and seal, and under the hands of all the council. These men taught diligently a long time, persuading us by the allegations of God's word, that there was no transubstantiation, or corporal presence in the sacrament. Their doctrine was not believed by us suddenly, but by their continual preaching, and also by our continual prayer unto God that we might never be deceived; but if it were true, that God would incline our hearts unto it; and if it were not true, that we might never believe. We weighed that they laboured with God's word, and we asked the advice of our friends, neither could we find that they preached false doctrine. We considered also, as we did learn, that the king's grace and his council, and the most part of the whole realm, believed as they taught, because no man preached the contrary. Also we know that the preachers were commanded by the king and laws of the realm, to preach unto us such doctrine as was agreeable to the authority of God's word, and no other; and by their diligent setting of it forth by the king's commandment, and the consent of the whole council, and by the authority of the whole parliament, we embraced it, and received it as a very infallible truth, taught unto us for the space of seven years. Wherefore, until such time as our consciences are otherwise taught and instructed by God's word, we cannot with safeguard of our consciences take it, as many suppose at this time. And we trust in God that the queen's merciful highness, neither yet her most honourable council, will in a matter of faith use compulsion, or violence, because faith is the gift of God, and cometh not of man, neither of man's laws, nor at such time as men require it, but at such time as God giveth it.

The EXAMINATION and ANSWERS of JOHN NEWMAN, before Dr. THORNTON and Others.

FIRST one of the doctors began, whose name John Newman doth not express, asking in this wise.

Doctor. How say you to this: "This is my body which is given for you?"

Newman. It is a figurative speech, one thing spoken, and another meant; as Christ saith, "I am a vine, I am a door, I am a stone, &c." Is he therefore a material stone, a vine, or a door?

Doctor. This is no figurative speech. For he saith, "This is my body which is given for you," and he saith not so of the stone, vine, or door; but that is a figurative speech.

Newman. Christ saith, "This cup is the New Testament in my blood." If you will have it so meant, then let them take and eat the cup.

Doctor. Nay, that is not so meant: for it is a common phrase of speech among ourselves: we say to our friend, drink a cup of drink, and yet we mean he should drink the drink in the cup.

Newman. Why, if you will have the one so understood, you must so understand the other.

Doctor. Nay, it is a common use of speech, to say, drink a cup of ale or beer, and therefore it is no figurative speech.

Newman. The often using of a thing doth not make that thing otherwise than it is; but wheresoever any thing is spoke, and another meant, it is a figurative speech.

Doctor. Well, we will not stand hereabout. How say you of the real presence? Is not Christ's natural body there that was born of the virgin Mary?

Newman. No, I do not so believe; neither can I so believe; for the soul of man doth not feed upon natural things as the body doth.

Doctor. Why, how then doth it feed?

Newman. I think the soul of man doth feed as the angels in heaven, whose feeding is only the pleasure, joy, felicity, and delectation that they have of God; and so the soul of man doth feed and eat, through faith, the body of Christ.

Collins. Yea, but if the body do not feed upon natural things, the soul cannot continue with the body; therefore the body must needs feed upon natural things, that both may live together.

Newman. I grant it to be true: but yet the soul doth live otherwise than the body which doth perish; therefore natural things do but feed the body only. I pray you, what did Judas receive at the supper?

Collins. Marry, Judas did receive the very body of Christ, but it was to his damnation.

Newman. Why, was the devil entered into him before? Then he had the devil and Christ in him at one time.

Collins. Nay, the devil did enter into him afterwards.

Newman. Yea, and before too: what, do you think he had but one devil? Nay, I think he had rather a legion of devils at the latter end.

Collins. Well, suppose it be so: what say you to that?

Newman. Marry, if Christ and the devil were both in Judas at once, I pray you how did they two agree together?

Collins. We grant that they were both in Judas at that time: for Christ may be where the devil is, if he will; but the devil cannot be where Christ is, except it please Christ.

Newman. Christ will not be in an unclean person that hath the devil.

Thornton. Why, will you not believe that Christ was in hell? and you will grant that the devil is there; and so might he be in Judas, if it pleased him.

Newman. Christ would not suffer Mary Magdalene to touch him, who sought him at his grave, and did see intirely; much less will he suffer an ungodly man receive him into his unclean body.

Thornton. Yes, seeing God may do all things, he do what he list, and be where he will. And doth the Psalm say, He is in hell, and in all places? Should we then doubt of his being there?

Newman. Though his Godhead be in all places, yet it is not sufficient to prove that his humanity is in all places.

Thornton. No? do you not believe that God is omnipotent, and may do all things?

Newman. I do believe that God is almighty, and do all that he will do.

Thornton. Nay, but if he be omnipotent, he may do all things, and there is nothing impossible for him.

Newman. I know God is almighty, and can do all that he will: but he cannot make his Son a liar, he cannot deny himself, nor can he restore virginity once polluted and defiled.

Thornton. What is that to your purpose? God doth defile virginity; we speak but of things that God can do.

Newman. Why, will you have the humanity of Christ in all places as the Deity is?

Thornton. Yea, he is in all places as the Deity is, if it please him.

Newman. I promise you, that seemeth to me a very great heresy, for heaven and earth are not able to contain the divine power of God, for it is in all places, as here and in every place; and yet you say, that wherever the Deity is, there is also the humanity; and so you will make him no body, but a fantastical body, and not a body indeed.

Thornton. Nay, we do not say he is in all places as the Deity is, but if it please him he may be in all places with the Deity.

Newman. I promise you, that seemeth to me as great a heresy as ever I heard in my life, and I dare not say it, lest I should deny Christ to be a very man, and that were against all the scriptures.

Thornton. Truth, what shall we stand reasoning with him? I dare say he doth not believe that Christ came out of his mother, not opening the matrice. Do you believe that Christ rose from death, and came through the stone?

Newman. I do believe that Christ rose from death; but I do not believe he came through the stone, neither doth the scripture so say.

Thornton. Lo, how say you? he doth not believe that Christ came through the stone; and if he doth not believe this, how shall he believe the other? If he could believe this, it were easy for him to believe the other.

Newman. The scripture doth not say he went through the stone, but it saith the angel of God came down, and rolled away the stone, and for fear of him the keepers became even as dead men.

Thornton. Ah fool, fool, that was because the woman could not see that he was risen again from death.

Newman. Well, the scripture maketh as much for us, as it doth for you, and more too.

Thornton. Well, let us not stand any longer about this. Back again to the real presence. How say you, is the body of Christ really in the sacrament, or no?

Newman. I have answered you already.

Thornton. Well, do you not believe that it is there?

Newman. No, I believe it not.

Thornton. Well, will you stand to it?

Newman. I must needs stand to it, till I be persuaded of a further truth.

Thornton. Nay, you will not be persuaded, but stand to your own opinion.

Newman. Nay, I stand not to mine own opinion, God take to witness, but only to the scriptures of God, and to all those that stand here witness with me, and nothing but the scriptures: and I take God to witness, that I do nothing of presumption, but that that I do is by my conscience; and if there be a further truth than this, except it appear a truth to me, I cannot receive it as a truth. And seeing faith is the gift of God, and cometh not of man; for it is not you that can give me faith, nor any man else; therefore I hope you will bear the more with me, seeing it must be wrought by God; and when it shall please him to open a further truth to me, I shall receive it with all my heart, and embrace it.

Thornton had many other questions which I did not bear away; but as I do understand, these are the chief: as for taunts foolish and unlearned, he lacked none. Praise God for his gifts, and God increase in us strength.

The ARGUMENTS of JOHN NEWMAN.

If the body of Christ were really and bodily in the sacrament, then whosoever received the sacrament, received also the body.

The wicked receiving the sacrament, receive not the body of Christ.

Therefore the body of Christ is not really in the sacrament.

ARGUMENT.

They which eat the flesh, and drink the blood of Christ, dwell in him, and he in them.

The wicked dwell not in Christ, nor he in them.

Therefore the wicked eat not the flesh, nor drink the blood of Christ.

ARGUMENT.

They that have Christ dwelling in them, bring forth much fruit, John xv. "He that dwelleth in me, and I in him, bringeth forth much fruit."

The wicked bring forth no fruit of goodness.

Therefore they have not Christ's body dwelling in them.

ARGUMENT.

Where remembrance is of a thing, there is imported the absence thereof.

Remembrance of Christ's body is in the sacrament, "Do this in remembrance of me."

Therefore Christ's body there is imported to be absent.

Indeed they will say, we see him not with our outward eyes, but he is commended under the forms of bread and wine, and that we see is nothing but a quality of an accident without a substance: but let them first prove this, and I will believe them. And thus much concerning Newman's examinations and arguments.

The FAITH of JOHN NEWMAN, dwelling at MAIDSTONE in KENT, who was by Occupation a PEWTERER.

"The Lord is the protector of my life. The just shall live by faith, and if he withdraw himself, my soul shall have no pleasure in him."

MY faith is, that there is one God, which is without beginning and without ending. This God created all things visible and invisible. And after that he had made both heaven and earth, with all other creatures, he made man, and set him in the place which he had prepared for him, which place he called Eden: he gave to Adam his commandments and precepts, and said, Whensoever thou dost the thing which I forbid, thou shalt surely die the death; yet did man for all this disobey God his creator, and after his sin he fled from God and himself, and was in a miserable desperate case. But God seeing man in his miserable estate, because he and all his posterity should not continue in death, promised Adam that the woman's seed should break the serpent's head; whereby is meant, that the Son of God should become man, and destroy the devil, who by his subtle persuasions had deceived Adam. Then did Adam, by faith, take hold of God's promise, and became the servant of righteousness, through the faith which he had in the promise of the woman's seed. So did Abel, Seth, Enoch, and Noah, with faithful Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and the rest of the faithful until Christ's time: as St. Paul saith, "They did all eat one spiritual meat, and did all drink of one spiritual drink; they did drink of that spiritual rock that followed them, which rock was Christ that saveth us." And when the time was fully come, God sent his Son, made of a woman, that is, he took flesh of the virgin Mary, and became man; not the shadow of a man, nor a fantastical man, but a very natural man in all points, sin only excepted; which God and man is Christ the promised woman's seed. This Christ was here conversant among men for the space of thirty years and more, and when the time was come that he should go to his Father, he gave unto us the mystery of our redemption, that we through faith should eat his body, and drink his blood, that we might feed on him through faith to the end of the world. After this Christ offered up his body on the cross to pacify his Father, and to deliver us from the thralldom of the devil, in which we were through sin original and actual. And with that one sacrifice of his body once offered on the cross, he hath made perfect for ever all them that are sanctified. He descended into hell, the third day he rose again from death, and was conversant at certain times with his disciples for the space of forty days after he rose from death. Then in the sight of all his disciples he ascended into heaven: and as his disciples stood looking upward, and beholding him how he went into heaven, two men stood by them in white apparel, which also said, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come even as ye have seen him go into heaven."

St. Peter also faith, that the heavens must receive him, until the time that all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his prophets, since the world began, be restored again, which is the latter day, when he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. I do believe in the Holy Ghost, which is the Spirit of God, proceeding from the Father and the Son, which Holy Spirit is one God with them. I believe that there is an holy church, which is the company of the faithful and elect people of God, dispersed abroad throughout the whole world; which holy church or congregation doth not look for Christ here, nor Christ there, neither in the desert, nor in the secret places whereof Christ warneth us, but as St. Paul faith, in heaven, where he sitteth on the right hand of the Father; they set their affections on things that are above, and not on things that are on earth. For they are dead concerning things of this world, and their life is hid with Christ in God: and when Christ, who is their life, shall shew himself, then shall they also appear with him in glory. I believe that there is a communion of saints, even the fellowship of the faithful people which are dispersed abroad throughout the whole world, and are of one mind: they follow Christ their head, they love one another, as Christ loved them, and are knit together in one, even in Christ; which church or congregation hath the forgiveness of sins through Christ, and shall enter without spot before the face of God into his glory. For as Christ being their head hath entered pure and clean, so they by entering by him, shall be like him in glory. And I am certain and sure, that all they which do die, shall rise again and receive their bodies. In them shall they see Christ come in his glory to judge the quick and the dead. At whose coming all men shall appear and give a reckoning of their doings: he shall separate the good from the bad; he shall say to them which are his elect, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning;" but to the others that have always resisted his will, he shall say, "Depart from me ye cursed into everlasting fire, which is prepared for the devil and his angels."

Thus have I briefly declared my faith, which were no faith at all if I doubted of it. This faith therefore I desire God to increase in me. Praise God for his gifts.

And thus have you the martyrdom, with the confession of the blessed man, and witness of the Lord's truth, who for that gave his life, as is before declared.

Likewise Richard Hook, about the same time, and for the same matter, gave his life at Chichester.

The EXAMINATIONS, ANSWERS, and CONDEMNATION of WILLIAM COKER, WILLIAM HOPPER, HENRY LAURENCE, RICHARD COLLIER, RICHARD WRIGHT, and WILLIAM STERE, before the BISHOP of DOVER, and Dr. HARPSFIELD, ARCHDEACON of CANTERBURY.

MENTION was made a little before in the story of Mr. Bland, and Nicholas Sheterden, of certain other Kentish-men, who being the same time with them called forth and examined by Thornton, bishop of Dover, Dr. Harpsfield, Richard Faucet, and Robert Collins: yet notwithstanding because the condemnation and execution of them was deferred a little longer, till the latter end of the month of August; coming therefore now to the time of suffering, we will briefly touch some part of their examinations and answers as we find them in the registers. The names of these were W. Coker, W. Hopper, H. Laurence, R. Colliar, Richard Wright, and William Stere. What the articles objected to Mr. Bland and them were, you heard before. To which articles they severally answered for themselves in effect as followeth.

First, William Coker said, he would answer no other wise than he had already answered; and being offered to have a longer respite of six days more, he refused to take it; and so upon the same, sentence of condemnation was read against him, the 11th of July.

William Hopper first seemed to grant to the faith and determination of the Roman church, but calling himself better to mind, constantly stuck to the truth, and was condemned the next week after, the 16th of July.

Henry Laurence, examined the said 16th of July, partly deferred to the 2d of August, answered to the articles objected against him; first denying auricular confession, and that he neither had, nor would receive the sacrament, because, faith he, the order of the holy scriptures is changed in the order of the sacrament.

Moreover, the said Laurence was charged for not putting off his cap, when the suffragan made mention of the sacrament, and did no reverence to the same. The said Laurence answered in these words, What? you shall not need to put off your cap: for it is not so held that you need to put off your cap thereunto.

Further, being opposed concerning the verity of the sacrament given to Christ's disciples, he affirmed that even as Christ gave his very body to his disciples, and confessed it to be the same; so likewise Christ himself said, he was a door, &c. adding moreover, that as he had said before, so he faith still, that the sacrament of the altar is an idol, and no remembrance of Christ's passion, and contrary he knoweth not. At last being required to subscribe his answers, he wrote these words under the bill of their examinations, "You are all Antichrist, and him you follow— and here his hand was hindered from writing any further: belike he would have written out [follow], &c. And so upon the same sentence was given against him the 2d of August.

Richard Colliar, of Ashford above-mentioned, having the 16th of August to appear, examined of the sacrament of the popish altar, answered and said, that he did not believe, that after the consecration there is the real and substantial body of Christ, but only bread and wine; and that it is most abominable, most detestable, and most wicked to believe otherwise, &c. Upon this sentence was read against him, and he condemned the 16th of August. After his condemnation he sung a psalm. Wherefore the priests and their officers raised at him, saying he was out of his wits.

Richard Wright, the same place and day above-mentioned, appearing, and being required by the judge what he believed of the real presence in the sacrament, answered again, that as touching the sacrament of the altar and the mass, he was ashamed to speak of it, or to name it, and that he allowed it not, as it was used in the church. Against whom the sentence was also read the same day and place aforesaid.

William Stere, of the aforesaid parish of Athford, likewise detected and accused, was brought to appear the said 16th day of August, where he in the chapter-house of Canterbury, being required to answer to the positions laid unto him by the judge, made answer again, That he should command his dog, and not him: and further declared, that Dick of Dover had no authority to sit against him in judgment; and asked, where was his authority? who then shewed him certain bulls and writings from Rome, as he said. William Stere denying that to be of sufficient force, the said Dick also said, he had authority from the queen. Then the martyr alledging that the archbishop of Canterbury, (who was then in prison) was his diocesan, urged him to shew his authority from the archbishop, or else he denied his authority to be sufficient. And as touching the sacrament of the altar, he found it not, he said, in the scripture, and therefore he would not answer thereunto.

And moreover, the judge speaking of the sacrament of the altar with reverence, and putting off his cap, William Stere told him, that he needed not to reverence that matter so highly. And thus (saying to the judge, that he was a bloody man, &c.) the sentence was pronounced against him; and after the sentence was read, he said, that the sacrament of the altar was the most blasphemous idol that ever was, &c.

And thus these six heavenly martyrs and witnesses to the truth, being condemned by the bloody suffragan and archdeacon of Canterbury, Mr. Collins, and Mr. Faucet, were burnt all together in the same town of Canterbury, at three stakes in one fire, about the latter end of August.

The copy of their sentence condemnatory, you may find before in the story of Mr. John Rogers; for the papists in their condemnations follow one manner of sentence against all they have condemned through their unmerciful tyranny.

The Persecution of Ten Martyrs together, sent by certain of the Council to BONNER to be examined.

AFTER the burning of these six before-named, next followeth the persecution of ten other true servants of God, the names of whom are as follow.

Elizabeth Warne,	William Hale,
George Tankerfield,	Thomas Leyes,
Robert Smith,	George King,
Stephen Harwood,	John Wade,
Thomas Fust,	Joan Lashford.

The prisons of London beginning now to be replenished with God's saints, and still more and more coming in, the council and commissioners, thinking to make ready dispatch with the poor prisoners, caused these ten to be sent with their letter directed to Bonner, bishop of London, by him to be examined and rid out of the way. The copy of which letter, with their names subscribed, here followeth to be read and noted.

A L E T T E R

Sent by the Commissioners to Dr. BONNER, Bishop of London.

AFTER our hearty commendations to your good lordship, we send you here John Wade, William Hale, George King, Thomas Leyes, of Thorp in Essex, Thomas Fust, hofier, Robert Smith, painter, Stephen Harwood, brewer, George Tankerfield, cook, Elizabeth Warne, and Joan Lashford, of London, sacramentaries; all which we desire your lordship to examine, and to order according to the ecclesiastical laws: praying your lordship to appoint some of your officers to receive them at this bearer's hands. And thus most heartily fare your lordship well. From London this 2d of July.

Your lordship's loving friends,

Nicholas Hare,	Richard Rede,
William Roper,	William Cooke.

The History of ELIZABETH WARNE, Widow, burnt at Stratford-Bow.

NOW severally to prosecute the stories of these ten martyrs aforesaid: first we will begin with the history of Elizabeth Warne, widow, who in the month of August was burnt at Stratford-Bow, near London; she was late wife of John Warne, upholsterer, and martyr, who was also burnt the latter end of the May before, as in his story is recorded.

This Elizabeth Warne had been apprehended amongst others, the first day of January, in a house in Bow-church-yard in London, as they were gathered together in prayer, and at that present was carried to the Compter, where she remained till the 11th day of June: at which time she was brought to Newgate, and was confined there till the 2d day of July. Then was she sent by the king and queen's commissioners unto Bonner, bishop of London, who on the 6th day of the said month caused her with divers others (as Robert Smith, George Tankerfield, &c.) to be brought before him into his palace, and there examined her upon sundry articles, such as were commonly administered unto poor saints and martyrs of God, as you may more plainly perceive by other more large and ample processes before-mentioned.

The chief objection that he used towards her, or the most of those, was touching the real and corporal presence of the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, as the chief ground and most profitable foundation for their catholic dignity. Many other matters he objected against them, as for not coming to the church, for speaking against the mass, for despising their ceremonies and new found sacraments, with divers other fond and trifling toys, not worthy to be mentioned.

In the end, when she had been divers times brought before him and other his adherents, and there earnestly exhorted to recant, she said, Do what you will; for if Christ were in an error, then am I in an error. Upon which answer, she was condemned as an heretic, the 12th day of the same month of July, and so delivered to the secular power, as they term it, to be by them put to death, which was done in the same month.

The chief procurer of her death was Dr. Story, being (as it was thought) somewhat related to her, or else to her late husband. Who, at the first apprehension of his said kinswoman, endeavoured by all means to get her pardon, and accordingly applied to Dr. Martin, then one of the king and queen's commissioners in matters of religion, (himself being as yet not made commissioner) and by this his suit obtained her deliverance for that present, as Dr. Martin himself (the author hereof) hath reported; yet afterwards, upon what occasion God only knoweth, except upon some burning charity, the said Dr. Story obtaining to be one of the commissioners, caused not only the said John Warne, but also his wife, and afterwards his daughter, to be again apprehended, never leaving them till he had brought them all to ashes. Such was the rage of that devout catholic and white child of the mother church, that neither kindred or any other consideration could prevail with him, although it did (at his request) with others, who in respect of him were but strangers unto them. The Lord, if it be his will, turn his heart, or else rid his poor church from such an hydra, as, thanked be God, now he hath.

An Account of GEORGE TANKERFIELD, Martyr.

GEORGE TANKERFIELD, of London, cook, born in York, about the age of 27 or 28 years, was in the days of king Edward a papist, till the time queen Mary came in, and then perceiving the great cruelty which the papists used, was brought into a mis-doubt of their doings, and began (as he said) in his heart to abhor them. And as concerning the mass, whereof he had but a doubtful opinion before, and much striving with himself in that case; at length he fell to prayer, desiring God in mercy to open to him the the truth, that he might be thoroughly persuaded therein, whether it were of God, or no: if not, that he might utterly hate it in his heart, and abhor it: which the Lord mercifully heard, and, according to his prayer, daily working more and more in him to detest and abhor the same: and so he was moved to read the Testament, whereby (as is said) the Lord enlightened his mind with the knowledge of the truth, working a lively faith in him to believe the same, and utterly to detest all popery, and so he came no more to their doings; and not only that, but also this lively faith (as he said) kindled such a flame in him, as would not be kept in, but utter itself by the confession thereof, reproving his own former doings to his friends, exhorting them likewise to repent and turn to the truth with him; thus they began to smell him out, and at length he was sent for as followeth.

It pleased God to strike him with sickness, whereby he lay long sick; and on a certain day to take the air abroad, he rose up, and went and walked into the Temple fields to see the shooters. In the mean time Mr. Beard came to his house and inquired for him, pretending to his wife, that he came only to have him dress a banquet at the lord Paget's. His wife, because of his apparel (which was very rich) took him to be some honest gentleman, and with all speed prepared herself to fetch her husband, having a good hope he should now earn some money: and lest this gentleman should be tired with tarrying, she fetched him a cushion to set him soft, and laid a fair napkin before him, and set bread thereon, and came to her husband; who, when he heard it, said, A banquet, woman; indeed it is such a banquet as will not be very pleasant to the flesh, but God's will be done. And when he came home he saw who it was, and called him by his name, which when his wife perceived, and wherefore he came, like a tall woman would play Peter's part, and instead of a sword took a spit, and would have run him through, had not the constable which Mr. Beard had sent for by his man, came in and rescued him: yet she sent a brickbat after him, and hit him on the back. And so Tankerfield was delivered to the constable, and brought to Newgate about the last day of February, 1555, by the said Beard, yeoman of the guards, and Simon Ponder, pewterer, constable of St. Dunstan's in the West, sent in by Roger Chomley, knight, and Dr. Martin.

Tankerfield being thus brought to prison by his adversaries, at length with the others before-named was brought to his examination before bishop Bonner, who, after his accustomed manner, ordered his articles and positions unto him, the copy and tenor of which his ordinary articles ye may read above expressed.

To these articles he answered again, constantly declaring his mind concerning auricular confession, and also the sacrament of the popish altar, and likewise the mass, &c. First, that he has not confessed to any priest five years past, nor to any other but only to God: and further denying that he would hereafter be confessed to any priest, for that he found it not in Christ's book, and took it only to be a counsel.

And concerning the sacrament, commonly called the sacrament of the altar, he confessed, that he neither had nor did believe, that in the sacrament there is the real body and blood of Christ, because the body is ascended into heaven, and there doth sit at the right hand of God the Father.

And moreover he said, that the mass now used in the church of England was naught, and full of idolatry and abomination, and against the word of God; affirming also, that there are but two sacraments in the church of Christ, baptism and the supper of the Lord, &c. And to these assertions he said he would stand; and so he did to the end.

And when at last the bishop began to read the sentence, first exhorting him with many words to revoke his professed opinion, (which they called damnable and heretical) he notwithstanding resisted all their persuasions, answering the bishop again in this manner: I will not,

said he, forsake mine opinions, except you, my lord, can refute them by scriptures; and I care not for your divinity; for you condemn all men, and prove nothing against them. And after many fair words of exhortation, which Bonner then used, to convert, or rather pervert him, he answered boldly again, saying moreover, That the church whereof the pope is supreme head, is no part of Christ's catholic church; and adding thereunto, and pointing to the bishop, spake to the people, saying, Good people beware of him, and such as he is, for these be the people that deceive you, &c.

These and many other words he spake; whereupon the bishop, reading the sentence of condemnation, gave him to the secular power.

And so this good man being carried to St. Alban's, there ended his life with much patience and constancy, the 26th day of August, for the defence of the truth, which at length will have the victory.

NOTES concerning GEORGE TANKERFIELD, after he was carried to St. Alban's to suffer Martyrdom.

IMprimis, He was brought to St. Alban's by the high sheriff of Hertfordshire, Edward Brocket, esquire, and Mr. Pulter, of Hitchen, who was under sheriff.

Item, Their inn was the cross-keys, where there was a great concourse of people to see and hear the prisoner, among which multitude some were sorry to see so pious a man brought to be burned, others praised God for his constancy and perseverance in the truth. Contrariwise, some there were which said, it was pity he did stand in such opinions: and others, both old men and women, cried against him; one called him heretic, and said it was pity that he lived. But George Tankerfield spake unto them so effectually out of the word of God, lamenting their ignorance, and protesting unto them his unspotted conscience, that God did mollify their hardened hearts, insomuch that some of them departed out of the chamber with weeping eyes.

Item, There came a certain school-master, to have communication with George Tankerfield the day before he was coming to St. Alban's, concerning the sacrament of the altar, and other points of the popish religion: but as he urged Tankerfield with the authority of the doctors, wresting them after his own will; so on the other side, Tankerfield answered him mightily by the scriptures, not wrested after the mind of any man, but being interpreted after the will of the Lord Jesus, &c. So that as he would not allow such allegations as Tankerfield brought out of the scriptures without the opinions of the doctors; so again Tankerfield would not credit his doctrine to be true, except he would confirm it by the scriptures. In the end, Tankerfield prayed him that he would not trouble him in such matters, for his conscience was established, &c. and so he departed from him, wishing him well, and protesting that he meant him no more hurt than his own soul.

Item, When the hour drew on apace that he should suffer, he desired the wine-drawer, that he might have a pint of malmsey and a loaf, that he might eat and drink that in remembrance of Christ's death and passion, because he could not have it administered to him by others in such manner as Christ commanded; and then he kneeled down, making his confession unto the Lord with all which were in the chamber with him; and after he had prayed earnestly unto the Lord, and had read the institution of the holy supper by the Lord Jesus out of the evangelists, and out of St. Paul, he said, O Lord, thou knowest it, I do not this to derogate authority from any man, or in contempt of those which are thy ministers, but only because I cannot have it administered according to thy word, &c. and when he had spoke these and such like words, he received it with giving of thanks.

Item, When some of his friends desired him to eat some meat, he said he would not eat that which should do others good that had more need, and that had longer time to live than he.

Item,

Item, He prayed his host to let him have a good fire in the chamber; he had so; and then he sitting on a form before the fire, put off his shoes and hose, and stretched out his leg to the flame; and when it had touched his foot, he quickly withdrew his leg, shewing the flesh did persuade him one way, and the spirit another way. The flesh said, O thou fool, wilt thou burn, and needest not? The spirit said, Be not afraid, for this is nothing in respect of fire eternal. The flesh said, Do not leave the company of thy friends and acquaintance which love thee, and will let thee lack nothing. The spirit said, The company of Jesus Christ and his glorious presence doth exceed all fleshly friends. The flesh said, Do not shorten thy time, for thou mayest live if thou wilt much longer. The spirit said, This life is nothing unto the life in heaven which lasteth for ever, &c. And all this time the sheriffs were at a gentleman's house at dinner, not far from the town, whither also resorted many knights and gentlemen out of the country, because his son was married that day; and until they returned from dinner, the prisoner was left with his host, to be kept and looked unto. And George Tankerfield all that time was kindly and lovingly intreated by his host; and considering that his time was short, his saying was, That although the day was ever so long, yet at the last it ringeth to evening song.

Item, About two o'clock, when the sheriffs were returned from dinner, they brought George Tankerfield out of the inn unto the place where he should suffer, which is called Romeland, being a green place near the west end of the abbey church: unto which when he was come, he kneeled down by the stake that was set up for him; and after he had ended his prayers he arose, and with a joyful faith he said, that although he had a sharp dinner, yet he hoped to have a joyful supper in heaven.

Item, While the faggots were set about him, there came a priest unto him, and persuaded him to believe on the sacrament of the altar, and he should be saved. But George Tankerfield cried out vehemently, and said, I defy the whore of Babylon, I defy the whore of Babylon: fie on that abominable idol: good people, do not believe him, good people, do not believe him. And then the mayor of the town commanded to set fire to the heretic, and said, If he had but one load of faggots in the whole world, he would give them to burn him. There was a certain knight by, who went unto Tankerfield, and took him by the hand and said, Good brother, be strong in Christ; this he spake softly; and Tankerfield said, O sir, I thank you, I am so, I thank God. Then fire was set unto him, and he desired the sheriff and all the people to pray for him; the most part did so. And so embracing the fire, he bathed himself in it, and calling on the name of the Lord Jesus, he was quickly out of pain.

The History and Examinations of ROBERT SMITH, Martyr.

ROBERT SMITH was brought to Newgate the 5th of November, by John Matthew, yeoman of the guard of the queen's side, by the command of the council. Robert Smith first gave himself to service in the house of sir Thomas Smith, knight, being then provost of Eaton: from thence he was preferred to Windsor, having there in the college a clerkship of ten pounds a year. Of stature he was tall and slender, active about many things, but chiefly delighting in the art of painting, which many times rather for his mind's sake, than for any gain, he did practise and exercise. In religion he was fervent, after he had once tasted the truth; wherein he was much confirmed by the preaching of Mr. Turner, of Windsor, and others. Whereupon at the coming in of queen Mary he was deprived of his clerkship by her visitors; and not long after he was apprehended, and brought to examination before Bonner, as here followeth, written and testified with his own hand.

The first Examination of ROBERT SMITH before Bishop BONNER.

ABOUT nine o'clock in the morning I was among the rest of my brethren brought to the bishop's house; and first of all I was brought before him into his chamber, to whom the bishop said as followeth, after he had asked my name.

Bonner. How long is it since you were confessed to any priest?

Smith. Never since I had years of discretion. For I never saw it needful, neither commanded by God to come to shew my faults to any of that sinful number whom you call priests.

Bonner. Thou shewest thyself even at thy first speech to be a rank heretic, who being weary of painting, art entered into divinity, and so fallen, through thy departing from thy vocation, into heresy.

Smith. Although I have understanding in the said occupation, yet (I praise God) I have had little need all my life hitherto to live by the same; but have lived without the same in mine own house as honestly in my vocation as you have lived in your's, and yet used the same better than ever you used the pulpit.

Bonner. How long is it since you received the sacrament of the altar, and what is your opinion in the same?

Smith. I never received the same since I had years of discretion, nor ever will, by God's grace; neither do esteem the same in any point, because it hath not God's ordinance, neither in name, nor in other usage, but rather is set up and erected to mock God withal.

Bonner. Do you not believe that it is the very body of Christ that was born of the virgin Mary, naturally, substantially, and really, after the words of consecration?

Smith. I shewed you before it was none of God's ordinances, as you use it; then much less to be God, or any part of his substance, but only bread and wine erected to the use aforesaid; yet nevertheless, if you can prove it to be the body that you spake of by the word, I will believe it; if not, I will do as I do, account it a detestable idol, not God; but contrary to God and his truth.

Then after many raging words and vain objections, Bonner said, there was no remedy, but I must be burned.

Smith. You shall do no more unto me, than you have done to better men than either of us both. But think not thereby to quench the Spirit of God, neither thereby to make your matter good. For your sore is too well seen to be healed so privily with blood. For even the very children have all your deeds in derision; so that although you patch up one place with authority, yet shall it break out in forty to your shame.

Bonner. Then after much ado, and many railing sentences, he said, throwing away the paper of mine examination; Well, even now, by my troth, even in good earnest, if thou wilt go to confession, I will tear this paper in pieces.

Smith. To which I answered; It would be too much to his shame to shew it to men of discretion.

After which answer, I was carried down to the garden with my jailor, and there remained till my brother Harwood was examined; and then being again brought up before the said Bonner, he demanded if I agreed with Harwood in his confession upon these articles following.

Bonner. What say you to the catholic church? Do you not confess there is one in earth?

Smith. Yes verily, I believe that there is one catholic church, or faithful congregation, which as the apostle saith, is built upon the prophets and apostles, Christ Jesus being the head corner-stone: which church in all her words and works maintaineth the word, and bringeth the same for her authority, and without it doth nothing, nor ought to do, of which I am assured I am by grace made a member.

Bonner. You shall understand, that I am bound when my brother offendeth, and will not be reconciled, to bring him before the congregation; now if your church be the same, where may a man find it, to bring his brother before the same?

Smith. It is written in the Acts of the apostles, that when the tyranny of the bishops was so great against the church in Jewry, they were fain to assemble in houses and secret places, as they now do; and yet were they nevertheless the church of God: and seeing they had their matters redressed being shut up in a corner, may not we do the like now-a-days?

Bonner. Yea, their church was known full well. For St. Paul wrote to the Corinthians, to have the man punished and excommunicated, that had committed evil with his father's wife. Whereby we may well perceive it was a known church; but your's is not known.

Smith. Then could you not persecute it as you do: but as you say the church of God at Corinth was manifest both to God and St. Paul; even so is this church of God in England, which you persecute, both known to God, and also even to the very wicked, although they know not, nor will know their truth nor conversation; yea, and your sinful number have professed their verity, and maintained the same a long season.

Bonner. Well, thou sayest that the church of God was only at Corinth, when St. Paul writ unto them, and so will I put in writing, shall I?

Smith. I do greatly marvel, my lord, that you are not ashamed to lay snares for your brethren on this manner. This is now the third snare you have laid for me. First, to make me confess that the church of England is not the church of Christ. Secondly, to say it is not known. Thirdly, to say the church of God is not universal, but particular. And this is not the office of a bishop. For if an innocent had come in your way, you would have done your best, I see, to have entangled him.

Well, friend, said Dr. Harpsfield, you are no innocent, as it appeareth.

Smith. By the grace of God I am that I am; and this grace in me, I hope, is not in vain.

Well, said Bonner, laughing, tell me, how sayest thou of the church?

Smith. I told you whereon the true church is built, and I affirm in England to be the congregation of God, and also in omnem terram; as it is written, "Their sound is gone forth into all lands," and this is the afflicted and persecuted church, which ye cease not to imprison, slay, and kill. And in Corinth was not all the congregation of God, but a number of those holy and elect people of God. For neither Paul nor Peter were present at Corinth when they wrote, and yet were they of the church of God, as many thousands more which also communicate in that Holy Spirit.

Bonner. What call you catholic, and what call you church?

Smith. Catholic is universal, and church is a congregation knit together in unity.

Then after much like talk, it was laid to my charge, that my fellow and I spake one thing. For which I praised God, and was sent again to the garden. Where, after a while, as I and brother Harwood had been together, came one of my lord's chaplains, that much desired to commune with me, demanding first if I were a prisoner.

Smith. I am in this flesh a prisoner, and subject to my master and your's; but I hope yet the Lord's free man through Christ Jesus.

Doctor. I do much desire to talk to you lovingly, because you are a man that I much lament, with many other sweet words.

To which I answered, Sub melle latet venenum. And after much ado about his god, I compelled him to say, that it must needs enter into the belly, and so fall into the draught.

Doctor. What derogation was it to Christ, when the Jews spit in his face?

Smith. If the Jews, being his enemies, did spit in his face, and we being his friends throw him into the draught, which of us have deserved the greatest damna-tion? Then by your argument, he that doth injury to Christ, shall have a most plenteous salvation.

Then the doctor started away, and would have his humanity incomprehensible, making a comparison between the soul of man and the body of Christ, bringing in to serve his turn, which way Christ came in among his disciples, the doors being shut?

Smith. Although it be said, that when he came the doors were shut, yet have I as much to prove, that the doors opened at his coming, as you have to prove he came through the door. For that Almighty God who brought the disciples out of prison, which yet when search was made was found shut, was able to let Christ in at the door, although it were shut: and yet it maketh not for your purpose; for they saw him, heard him, and felt him, and that you cannot say you do, neither is he in more places than one at the same time.

At which answer when he had made many scoffings, he went from me, and we were carried into my lord's hall, where we were baited by my lord's band of servants almost all the day, until our keeper seeing their rudeness, shut us all up in a handsome chamber, while my lord went into his synagogue to condemn Mr. Denley and John Newman.

Then they brought my lord mayor up into the chamber where my lord intended to sup, to hear the matter; and I was the first that was called; where my lord mayor being set with the bishop and one of the sheriffs, wine was flowing on every side, whilst I stood before them like a mute; which made me remember how Pilate and Herod were made friends, but no man was sorry for Joseph's hurt. But after my lord had well drank, my articles were sent for and read, and he demanded whether I did say as was written?

Smith. That I have said, I have said, and what I have said I do mean.

Bonner. Well, my lord mayor, your lordship hath heard in some measure, what a stout heretic this is, and that his articles have deserved death: yet nevertheless forasmuch as they report me to seek blood, and call me bloody Bonner, whereas, God knoweth, I never sought any man's blood in all my life, I have kept him from the consistory this day, whither I could have brought him justly; I desire him to turn, and I will with all speed dispatch him out of his trouble; and this I profess before your lordship and all this audience.

Smith. Why, my lord, do you put on this fair vizard before my lord mayor, to make him believe that you seek not my blood, to cloak your murders, through my stoutness, as you call it? Have you not had my brother Tomkins before you, whose hand when you burned most cruelly, you burned also his body, and not only him, but a great many of the members of Christ, men that feared God, and lived virtuously, and also the queen's majesty's most true subjects, as their goods and bodies have made manifest? And seeing in these saints you have shewed so little mercy, shall it seem to my lord and this audience that you shew me more favour? No, no, my lord. But if you mean as you say, why then do you examine me of what I am not bound to answer you?

Bonner. Well, what sayest thou by the sacrament of the altar? Is it not the very body of Christ, flesh, blood, and bone, as it was born of the virgin?

Smith. I have answered that it is none of God's order nor a sacrament, but man's own vain invention, and shewed him the Lord's institution. But when he was so earnest before the audience, declaring that we knew nothing, bringing out his Hoc est corpus meum to lay in my dish; I proved before the audience that it was a dead god, declaring the distinction appointed between two creatures of bread and wine, and that a body without blood hath no life. At which Harpsfield found himself much offended, and took the tale out of my lord's mouth, saying,

Harpf. I will prove by the scriptures, that you blaspheme God in so saying: for it is given in two parts, because there are two things shewed, that is to say, his body and his passion, as saith St. Paul: and therefore the bread is his body, and the wine the representation of his death and blood-shedding.

Smith.

Smith. You falsify the word, and rack it to serve your purpose. For the wine was not only the shewing of his passion, but the bread also. For our Saviour saith, "So often as you do this, do it in remembrance of me." And St. Paul saith, "So oft as you eat of this bread, and drink of this cup, you shall shew the Lord's death till he come." And here is as much reverence given to the one as to the other. Wherefore if the bread be his body, the cup must be his blood, and as well you make his body in the cup, as his blood in the bread.

Then my lord rose up, and went to the table, where the lord mayor desired me to save my soul. To whom I answered, I hoped it was saved through Christ Jesus; desiring him to have pity on his own soul, and remember whose sword he carried.

On which I was carried into the garden, and there abode till the rest of my friends were examined, and then were we sent away to Newgate with many foul farewells, my lord bishop giving the keeper a charge to lay me in limbo.

Second Examination of ROBERT SMITH, before Bishop BONNER.

UPON Saturday, at eight o'clock, I was brought to his chamber again, and there examined by him as followeth.

Bonner. Thou Robert Smith, &c. sayest that there is no catholic church here on earth.

Smith. You have heard me both speak the contrary, and you have writing as a witness of the same.

Bonner. Yes, but I must ask this question: how sayest thou?

Smith. Must you of necessity begin with a lie? It maketh manifest that you determine to the end with the same. But there shall no liars enter into the kingdom of God. Nevertheless, if you will be answered, ask mine articles that were written yesterday, and they shall tell you that I have confessed a church of God, as well in earth as in heaven, and yet all one church, and one man's members, even Christ Jesus.

Bonner. Well, what sayest thou to auricular confession? Is it not necessary to be used in Christ's church? and wilt thou not be confessed by the priest?

Smith. It is not needful to be used in Christ's church, as I answered yesterday. But if it be needful for your church, it is to pick men's pockets; and such pick-pocket matters is all the whole rabble of your ceremonies: for all that you maintain is but money-matters.

Bonner. Why, how art thou able to prove that confession is a pick-pocket matter? Art thou not ashamed to say so?

Smith. I speak by experience: for I have both heard and seen the fruits of the same. For first it hath been, we see, a betrayer of king's secrets, and the secrets of other men's consciences; who being delivered, and glad to be discharged from their sins, have given great sums of money to priests to absolve them, and sing masses for their souls' health.

And for example, I began to bring in a pageant, that by report was played at St. Thomas of Acres, and where I was when a child, waiting on a gentleman of Norfolk, which being bound in conscience, through the persuasion of the priest, gave away a great quantity of his goods, and forgave unto one Mr. Gresham a large sum of money, and to another as much. The priest for his part had a good share, and the house had an annuity to keep him: which thing when his brother heard, he came to London; and after a declaration made to the council, how by the subtilty of the priest he had robbed his wife and children, recovered a great part again, to the value of two or three hundred pounds of Mr. Gresham and his other friend; but what he gave to the house could not be recovered. This story I began to tell; but when my lord saw it favoured not to his purpose, he began to revile me, and said, By the mass, if the queen's majesty were of my mind, thou shouldst not come to talk before any man, but shouldst be put in a sack, with a dog in the same, and be thrown into a river.

Smith. I know you speak by practice, as much as by speculation, for both you and your predecessors have sought all possible means to kill Christ secretly; witness Mr. Hunne, whom your predecessor caused to be thrust in at the nose with hot burning needles, and then to be hanged, and gave it out that the said Hunne hanged himself: and also a good brother of your's, a bishop of your profession, having in his prison an innocent man, whom, because he could not overcome by scripture, he caused to be privately strangled, and his flesh to be torn and plucked away with a pair of pincers; and bringing him before the people, said, the rats had eaten him. Thus according to your oath is all your dealing, and hath been; and as you, taking upon you the office, do not without oaths open your mouth, no more do you without murder maintain your traditions.

Bonner. Ah, you are a generation of liars; there is not one true word that cometh out of your mouths.

Smith. Yes, my lord, I have said that Jesus Christ is dead for my sins, and risen for my justification, and this is no lie.

Then Bonner made his man to put in my tale of the gentleman of Norfolk, and would have me recite it again: which when I would not do, he made his man to put in such fums as he imagined. At the end of this sir John Mordaunt came in, and sat down to hear my examination. Then said my lord, How sayest thou, Smith, to the seven sacraments? Believest thou not that they be of God's order, that is to say, the sacrament of, &c.

Smith. I believe that in God's church are but two sacraments, that is to say, the sacrament of regeneration, and the sacrament of the Lord's supper: and as for the sacrament of the altar, and all your sacraments, they may well serve your church, but God's church hath nothing to do with them, neither have I any thing to do to answer them, nor you to examine me of them.

Bonner. Why, is God's order changed in baptism? In what point do we dissent from the word of God?

Smith. First, in hallowing your water; in conjuring of the same; in baptizing children with anointing and spitting in their mouths, mingled with salt, and with many other lewd ceremonies, of which not one point is able to be proved in God's order.

Bonner. By the mass, this is the most unshame-faced heretic that ever I heard speak.

Smith. Well sworn, my lord, you keep a good watch.

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, you catch me at my words: but I will watch thee as well, I warrant thee.

By my troth, my lord, said sir John Mordaunt, I never heard the like in all my life. But I pray you, my lord, mark well his answer for baptism. He disalloweth therein holy ointment, salt, and such other laudable ceremonies, which no christian man will deny.

Smith. That is a shameful blasphemy against Christ, so to use any mingle mangle in baptizing young infants.

Bonner. I believe, I tell thee, that if they die before they be baptized, they be damned.

Smith. You shall never be saved by that belief. But I pray you, my lord, shew me, are we saved by water, or by Christ?

Bonner. By both.

Smith. Then the water died for our sins: and so must you say, that the water hath life, and it being our servant, and created for us, is our Saviour. This, my lord, is a good doctrine, is it not?

Bonner. Why, how understandest thou the scriptures? "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

And again, "Suffer (saith our Saviour) these children to come unto me:" and if thou wilt not suffer them to be baptized after the laudable order, thou hindereest them to come unto Christ.

Smith. Where you alledge St. John, "Except a man be born," &c. and will thereby prove the water to save, and so the deed or work to save and put away sins, I will send you to St. Paul, who asketh of the Galatians, "Whether they received the Spirit by the deeds of the law, or by the preaching of faith?" and there concludeth, that the Holy Ghost accompanieth the preaching of faith, and with the word of faith entereth into the heart. So now if baptism preach to me the washing in Christ's blood, so doth the Holy Ghost accompany it, and it is unto me as a preacher and not a Saviour. And where you say, I hinder the children to come unto Christ, it is manifest by our Saviour's words that you hinder them to come, that will not suffer them to come unto him without the necessity of water. For he saith, Suffer them to come unto me, and not unto the water; and therefore if you condemn them, you condemn both the merits and words of Christ. For our Saviour saith, "Except ye turn and become as children, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of God." And so I brought out many other examples, to make manifest that Christ hath cleansed original sin, bringing in examples out of the scriptures for the same.

Bonner. Then thou makest the water of none effect, then put away water.

Smith. "It is not (saith St. Peter) the washing away of the filth of the flesh, but in that a good conscience consenteth unto God." And to prove that water only bringeth not the Holy Ghost, it is written in Acts viii. that Simon received water, but would have received the Holy Ghost for money. Also, that the Holy Ghost hath come before baptism. Yea, and although your generation have set at nought the word of God, and like swine turned his words upside down, yet must his church keep the same in that order which he left them, which his church dare not break; and to judge children damned that be not baptized, it is wicked.

Mordaunt. By our lady, sir, but I believe that if my child die without water, he is damned.

Bonner. Yea, and so do I, and all catholic men, good Mr. Mordaunt.

Smith. Well, my lord, such catholic, such salvation!

Bonner. Well, sir, what say you to the sacrament of orders?

Smith. You may call it the sacrament of mis-orders: for all orders are appointed of God. But as for your shaving, anointing, greasing, poling, and rounding, there are no such things appointed in God's book, and therefore I have nothing to do to believe your orders. And as for you, if you had grace and intelligence, you would not so disfigure yourself as you do.

Bonner. Sayest thou so? Now, by my troth, I will go shave myself to anger thee withal; and so he sent for his barber, who immediately came: and before my face at the door of the next chamber, he shaved himself, desiring me before he went, to answer to these articles.

Bonner. What say you to holy bread and holy water, to the sacrament of anointing, and to all the rest of such ceremonies of the church?

Smith. I say they be baubles for fools to play withal, and not for the children of God to exercise themselves in, and therefore they may go among the refuse. Then Mr. Mordaunt went away, and my lord went to be shaved, leaving there certain doctors, as he called them, to try what they could do, by whom I was baited for half an hour: of whom I also asked this question, Where were you all the days of king Edward, that you spake not that which you speak now?

Doct. We were in England.

Smith. Yea, but then you had the faces of men, but now you put on lion's faces again, as saith St. John, "Ye shew yourselves as full of malice, as ye may be." For you have for every time a vizor; yea, and if another king Edward should arise, you would then say, Down with the pope, for he is Antichrist, and so are all his angels.

Then was I reviled and sent away, and brought in again before these men; and one of them that baited me before, asked me if I disallowed confession?

Smith. Look in mine articles, and they shall shew you what I allow.

Doct. Your articles confess that you allow not auricular confession.

Smith. I allow it not, because the word alloweth it not, nor commandeth it.

Doct. Why, it is written, thou shalt not hide thy sins and offences.

Smith. No more do I when I confess them to Almighty God.

Doct. Why you cannot say that you can hide them from God, and therefore you must understand the words are spoken to be uttered to them that do not know them.

Smith. You have made a good answer, then the priest must confess himself to me, as well as I to him; for I know his faults and secrets, no more than he knoweth mine. But if you confess to the priest and not unto God, you shall have the reward that Judas had: for he confessed himself to the priest, and presently went and hanged himself; and so many as do not acknowledge their faults to God, are said to hide them.

Doct. What did they that came to John to be baptized?

Smith. They came and confessed their sins to Almighty God.

Doct. And not unto John?

Smith. If it were unto John, as you are not able to prove, yet it was to God, before John and the whole congregation.

Doct. Why, John was alone in the wilderness.

Smith. Why, and yet the scriptures say he had many disciples, and that many pharisees and sadducees came to his baptism. Here the scriptures and you agree not. And if they confessed themselves to John, as you say, it was to all the congregation, as St. Paul doth to Timothy, and to all that read his epistle, in opening to all the hearers, that he was not worthy to be called an apostle, because he had been a tyrant. But as for ear-confession, you never heard it allowed by the word. For the prophet David made his confession unto God, and saith, "I will confess my sins unto the Lord." Daniel maketh his confession unto the Lord; Judith, Toby, Jeremy, Manasseh, with all the forefathers, did even so. For the Lord hath said, "Call upon me in the time of trouble, and I will deliver thee." Knock, ask, seek, with such like; and this is the word of God; now bring somewhat of the word to help yourself withal. Then they raged, and called me dog, and said I was damned.

Smith. Nay, you are dogs, that because holy things are offered, will slay your friends. For I may say with St. Paul, "I have fought with beasts in the likeness of men." For here I have been baited these two days, of my lord, and his great bulls of Basan, and in his hall beneath have I been baited of the rest of his band. With this came my lord from shaving, and asked me how I liked him.

Smith. Forsooth, you are even so wise as you were before you were shaven.

Bonner. How standeth it, Mr. Doctors, have you done any good?

Doct. No, by my troth, my lord, we can do no good.

Smith. Then it is fulfilled which is written, "How can an evil tree bring forth good fruit?"

Bonner. Nay, naughty fellow, I set these gentlemen to bring thee home to Christ.

Smith. Such gentlemen, such Christs! and as truly as they have that name from Christ, so truly do they teach Christ.

Bonner. Well, wilt thou neither hear them nor me?

Smith. Yes, I am compelled to hear you; but you cannot compel me to follow you.

Bonner. Well, thou shalt be burnt at a stake in Smithfield, if thou wilt not turn.

Smith. And you shall burn in hell, if you repent not: but, my lord, to put you out of doubt, because I am weary, I will strain courtesy with you: I perceive you will not with your doctors come unto me, and I am determined not to come unto you, by God's grace. For I have hardened my face against you as hard as brass. Then after many railing sentences I was sent away.

And thus have I left the truth of mine answers in writing, gentle reader, being compelled by my friends to do it: that you may see how the Lord hath according to his promise given me a mouth and wisdom to answer in his cause, for which I am condemned, and my cause not heard.

The last EXAMINATION of Mr. SMITH.

THE 12th of July I was with my brethren brought into the consistory, and mine articles read before my lord mayor and sheriffs, with all the assistants; to which I answered, as followeth.

Bonner. By my faith, my lord mayor, I have shewed him as much favour as any man living might do: but I perceive all is lost, both in him and all his company.

At this word, which he coupled with an oath, Mr. Smith came in, and said to the bishop, My lord, it is written, "You must not swear."

Bonner. Ah, Mr. Controller, are you come? Lo, my lord mayor, this is Mr. Speaker, pointing to my brother Tankerfield; and this is Mr. Controller, pointing to me. And then beginning to read my articles, he persevered till he came at my tale of the gentleman of Norfolk, and then demanded of my lord mayor, if he heard of the same before. To which he answered, No. To whom I said:

Smith. My lord mayor, will it please you to hear me recite it, as I heard it, and told it, and then you shall hear the truth? For this tale that my lord hath told is untrue.

Bonner. How say you, good Mr. Mordaunt, spake he not this here as it is written? Were you not by?

Mordaunt. Yes, my lord, that it is: I heard him say it.

Smith. How heard you me say it, and were not present when I spake it? It is manifestly proved what the prophet saith: "Even as the king saith, so saith the judge, that he may do him a pleasure again." And then my jailor was brought out for proof thereof, who there openly professed that neither Mr. Mordaunt, nor the doctors before-mentioned, were present when I spake it.

At which Mr. Mordaunt, with blushing cheeks, said, he heard them read, and heard me affirm the same; which also was not true. Then my lord proceeded with the rest of my articles, demanding of me if I said not as was written. To which I answered, No. And turning to my lord mayor, I said, I require you, my lord mayor, in God's behalf, unto whom pertaineth your sword and justice, that I may here before your presence answer to these objections that are laid against me, and have probation of the same; and if any thing that I have said, or will say, be proved (as my lord saith) heresy, I shall not only with all my heart forsake the same, and cleave to the truth, but also recant wheresoever you shall assign me, and all this audience shall be witness to the same.

Lord Mayor. Why, Smith, thou canst not deny but this thou saidst.

Smith. Yes, my lord, I deny that which he hath written, because he hath both added to, and diminished from the same: but what I have spoken I will never deny.

Lord Mayor. Why, thou speakest against the blessed sacrament of the altar.

Smith. I denied it to be any sacrament, and I do stand here to make probation of the same; and if my lord or any of his doctors be able to prove either the name or usage of the same, I will recant mine error. Then spake my brother Tankerfield, and defended the probation of things which they called heresy. To which the bishop answered,

By my troth, Mr. Speaker, you shall preach at a stake.

Smith. Well sworn, my lord, you keep a good watch.

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, I am no faint.

Smith. No, my lord, nor yet a good bishop. For a bishop, saith St. Paul, should be faultless, and a vessel dedicated unto God; and are you not ashamed to sit in judgment and be a blasphemer, condemning innocents?

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, you are faultless.

Smith. My lord mayor, I require you in God's name, that I may have justice. We be here to-day a great many innocents wrongfully accused of heresy.

And I require you, if you will not seem to be partial, let me have no more favour at your hands, than the apostle had at the hands of Festus and Agrippa, who being heathens and infidels, gave him leave not only to speak for himself, but also heard the probation of his cause. This require I at your hands, who being a christian judge, I hope will not deny me that right, which the heathen have suffered: if you do, then shall all this audience, yea, and the heathen, speak shame of your fact. For all that do well come to the light, and they that do evil hate the light.

Then the lord mayor hanging down his head, said nothing, but the bishop told me, I should preach at the stake, and so the sheriff cried with the bishop, away with me.

Thus came I in before them four times, desiring justice, but could have none: and at length my friends required the same with one voice, and could not have it; so we had sentence; and then being carried out, were brought in again, and received it separately. But before the bishop gave me sentence, he told me in derision of my brother Tankerfield, a tale between a gentleman and his cook. To which I answered, My lord, you fill the people's ears with fantasies and foolish tales, and make a laughing matter at blood; but if you were a true bishop, you should leave these railing sentences, and speak the words of God.

Bonner. Well, I have offered to that naughty fellow, Mr. Speaker, your companion the cook, that my chancellor should here instruct him, but he hath with great disdain refused it. How sayest thou, wilt thou have him instruct thee, and lead thee into the right way?

Smith. My lord, if your chancellor will do me any good, and take any pains, as you say, let him take mine articles in his hands, that you have objected against me, and either prove one of them heresy, or any thing that you do to be good: and if he be able so to do, I stand here with all my heart to hear him; if not, I have no need, I praise God, of his sermon: for I come to answer for my life, and not to hear a sermon.

Then began the sentence, "In the name of God," &c. To which I answered, that he began in a wrong name, requiring of him, where he learned in scripture to give sentence of death against any man for his conscience sake. To which he made no answer, but went forward to the end, and immediately cried, Away with him. Then I turned to the mayor, and said, Is it not enough for you, my lord mayor, and you that are the sheriffs, that you have left the straight way of the Lord, but you must condemn Christ causeless?

Bonner. Well, Mr. Controller, now you cannot say, but I have offered you fair, to have instruction. And now, I pray thee, call me Bloody Bishop, and say, I seek thy blood.

Smith. Well, my lord, if neither I nor any of this congregation do report the truth of your fact, yet shall these stones cry it out, rather than it shall be hidden.

Bonner. Away with him, away with him.

Woodrofe. Away with him, take him away.

Smith. Well, good friends, you have seen and heard the great wrong that we have received this day, and you are all witnesses that we have desired the probation of our cause by God's book, and it hath not been granted: but we are condemned, and our cause not heard. Nevertheless, my lord mayor, forasmuch as you have here exercised God's sword causeless, and will not hear the right of the poor, I commit my cause to Almighty God, who will judge all men according to right, before whom we shall both stand without authority; and there will I stand in the right, and have judgment, to your great confusion, except you repent, which the Lord grant you to do, if it be his will. And then was I with the rest of my brethren carried away to Newgate.

Thus, gentle reader, as near as I can, I have set forth the truth of my examination, and the verity of mine unjust condemnation for the truth, praying to God that it may not be laid to the charge of thee, O England, requiring your hearty prayers to God for his grace and spirit of boldness, with hope even shortly to set to my seal at Uxbridge the 8th day of August, by God's grace: pray that it may be to his honour, my salvation, and your consolation, I pray you.

Da gloriam Deo.

ROBERT SMITH.

Thus art thou (good reader) not only to note, but also to follow in this man a singular example of christian fortitude, who so valiantly stood in defence of his master's cause: and as thou seest him here boldly stand in examination before the bishop and doctors; so was he no less comfortable also in the prison among his companions: which also is to be observed no less in his other fellow-prisoners, who being together in an outward room in Newgate, had godly conference with themselves, with daily praying and public reading, which they to their great comfort used in that room together; amongst whom Smith was the chief; whose industry was always solicitous, not only for them of his own company, but also his diligence was careful for other prisoners, whom he ceased not to dissuade from their old accustomed iniquity; and many he converted to his religion. While he was in prison he wrote several letters to his friends, some in verse, and others in prose. And the first are in verse as follow.

LETTER I.

"O ye that love the Lord, see that ye hate the thing that is evil."

THE God that giveth life and light,
And leadeth into rest:
That breaketh bonds, and bringeth out
The poor that are oppress'd:
And keepeth mercy for the meek,
His treasure and his store:
Increase thy life in perfect love,
Both now and evermore.
That as thou hast begun to ground
In faith and fervent love,
Thou may'st be made a mighty mount,
That never may remove.
That thine ensample may be shew'd
Among all thine increase;
That they may live and learn the like,
And pass their time in peace.
Thy salutations that were sent,
I heartily retain:
And send thee seventy times as much,
To thee and thine again.
And now because I know the goal,
That thou dost most desire:
I send thee here a paper full,
As fired in the fire.
In hope thou wilt accept it well,
Although it be but small;
Because I have no other good,
To make amends withal.
For all thy free and friendly facts,
Which thy good will hath wrought,
I send thee surely for a shift
The thing that cost me nought.
Abstain from all ungodliness,
In dread direct your days:
Possess not sin in any wise;
Beware of wicked ways.
Hold fast your faith unfeignedly;
Build as you have begun:
And arm yourself in perfect faith,
To do as ye have done:
Lest that the wicked make a mock
At what ye take in hand,
In leaving of the perfect rock,
To build upon the sand.
Beware of filthy pharisees,
Their building is in blood:
Eat not with them in any wise,
Their leaven is not good.
Their salt is all unsavoury:
And under good intents
They maintain all their knavery,
And murder innocents.
They seek to sit in Christ his seat,
And put him out of place:
And make all means that may be made,
His doings to deface.
They keep him down with bills and bats,
That made the blind to see:
They make a god for mice and rats,
And say the same is he.

They look like sheep, and act like wolves,
Their baits be all for blood:
They kill and slay the simple souls,
And rob them of their good.
The dark illusions of the devil
Have dimmed so their eyes,
That they cannot abide the truth
To stir in any wise.
And if ye keep the perfect path,
(As I have hope you do)
Ye shall be sure to have such shame
As they may put you to.
For all that lead a godly life,
Shall surely suffer loss:
Likewise the world will seek their shame,
And make them kiss the cross.
Ye shall be killed all, faith Christ:
Your sorrows shall not cease:
And yet in your afflictions
I am your perfect peace.
For in the world ye shall have woe,
Because ye are unknown:
Also because ye hate the world,
The world will love his own.
Be fervent therefore to the death,
Against all their decrees:
And God shall surely fight for thee,
Against thine enemies.
Commit your cause unto the Lord,
Revenge not any ill;
And thou shalt see the wicked want,
When thou shalt have thy will.
For all afflictions that may fall,
That they can say or do:
They are not sure of all the wealth,
That we attain unto.
For I have seen the sinners spread
Their branches like a bay;
And yet ere one could turn his head,
Were wither'd clean away.
Beware that money make you not In riches to arise
Against the goodness of the Lord,
Among the worldly wise.
For many mischiefs it hath made,
That may not be express'd:
And many ills it hath begun,
Which may not be redress'd.
For money maketh many a one
In riches to rebel,
And he that maketh gold a god,
He hath a soul to sell.
It maketh kings to kill and slay,
And waste their wits in war;
In leaving of the wolf at home,
To hunt the fox afar.
And where they should see justice done,
And set their realm in rest;
By money they be made a means
To see the poor oppress'd.
It maketh lords obey the laws,
That they do ill and naught;
It maketh bishops suck the blood,
That God hath dearly bought.
And where they should be faithful friends,
And fathers to their flock,
By money they do turn about,
Ev'n like a weather-cock.
The priest doth make a money mean,
To have again his whores,
To put away his wedded wife,
And children out of doors.
It holdeth back the husbandman,
Which may not be forborn;
And will not suffer him to sow,
And cast abroad his corn.
In like case it doth let again,
When that the seed they sow;
It choaketh up the corn again,
So that it cannot grow.
The husband he would have a wife,
With nobles new and old:
The wife would have the husband hang'd,
That she might have his gold.
It maketh murd'ers many a one,
And beareth much with blood:
The child would see the parents slain,
To seize upon their good.
And though it be a blessed thing,
Created in the kind;
It is a necessary ill
Annexed to the mind.
For whoso playeth with the pitch,
His fingers are defil'd;

And he that maketh gold a god,
 Shall surely be beguil'd.
 Be friendly to the fatherless,
 And all that are oppress'd:
 Assist them always out of hand,
 And see them set at rest.
 In all your doings and your deeds,
 Let mercy still remain;
 For with the measure that you mete,
 Shall ye be met again.
 Be always lowly in your life;
 Let love enjoy her own:
 The highest trees are seldom sure,
 And soonest overthrown.
 The lions lack and suffer fore,
 In hunger and in thirst:
 And they that do oppress the poor,
 Continue still accurs'd.
 The bee is but a little beast
 In body or in sight,
 And yet she bringeth more increase Than either crow or kite.
 Therefore beware in any wise,
 Keep well your watch alway:
 Be sure of oil within your lamp;
 Let not your light decay.
 For death despiseth them that lack,
 And hateth them that have;
 And treadeth down the rich and poor
 Together in the grave.
 Exhort your children to be chaste,
 Rebuke them for their ill,
 And let them not in any wise
 Be wedded to their will.
 Laugh not with them, but keep them low,
 Shew them no merry cheer,
 Lest thou do weep with them also;
 But bring them up in fear.
 And let your light and living shine,
 That ye be not suspected
 To have the same within yourself,
 For which they are corrected.
 Be meek and modest, in a mean;
 Let all your deeds be done,
 That they which are without the law
 May see how right ye run.
 Keep well the member in your mouth,
 Your tongue see that ye tame;
 For out of little sparks of fire
 Proceedeth forth a flame.
 And as the poison doth expresse
 The nature of the toad;
 Ev'n so the tongue doth manifest
 The heart that feareth God.
 For therewith blest we God above,
 And therewith curse we men;
 And thereby murders do arise,
 Through women now and then.
 And seeing God hath giv'n a tongue,
 And put it under power,
 The surest way it is, to set
 A hatch before the door.
 For God hath set you in a seat
 Of double low degree;
 First unto God, and then to man,
 A subject for to be.
 I write not that I see in you
 These things to be suspected,
 But only set before your face,
 How sin should be corrected.
 For flesh and blood I know ye are,
 As other women be;
 And if ye dwell in flesh and blood,
 There is infirmity.
 Receive a warning willingly,
 That to thy teeth is told:
 Account the gift of greater price
 Than if he gave thee gold.
 A wise man will, faith Solomon,
 A warning soon embrace:
 A fool will sooner (as he saith)
 Be smitten on the face.
 And as your members must be dead
 From all things that are vain:
 Ev'n so by baptism ye are born
 To live with Christ again.
 Thus farewell free and faithful friend:
 The Lord that is above
 Increase in thee a perfect faith,
 And lead thee in his love.
 And as I pray with perfect love,
 And pour out bitter tears
 No. 3.

For you and all that are at large Abroad among the briers;
 Ev'n so I pray thee to prefer
 My person and my bands,
 Unto the everlasting God
 That hath me in his hands.
 That I may pass out of this pond,
 Wherein I am oppress'd,
 Inclosed in a clod of clay,
 That here can have no rest.
 That as he hath begun in me
 His mercies many one,
 I may attain to overtake
 My brethren that are gone.
 That when the death shall do his worst,
 Where he shall point a place,
 I may be able like a man
 To look him in the face.
 For though he catch away my cloak,
 My body into dust:
 Yet am I sure to have a soul,
 When death hath done his worst.
 And though I leave a little dust Dissolved without blood;
 I shall receive it safe again,
 When God shall see it good.
 For my Redeemer I am sure
 Doth live for evermore,
 And sitteth high upon the heavens,
 For whom I hunger sore.
 Ev'n as the deer with deadly wounds
 Escaped from the spoil,
 Doth haste by all the means he may
 To seek unto the foyl.
 Of whom I hope to have a crown,
 That always shall remain;
 And to enjoy a perfect peace,
 For all my woe and pain.
 The God that giveth all increase,
 And seeketh still to save,
 Abound in thee that perfect peace,
 Which I do hope to have.
 And I beseech the living God
 To hold thee in his hands,
 And wish thee ev'n with all my heart,
 The blessing of my bands;
 Which I esteem of higher price
 Than pearl or precious stone;
 And shall endure for evermore,
 When earthly things are gone.
 For though the fire do now consume
 Our treasure and our store,
 Yet shall the goodness of the Lord
 Endure for evermore.
 And where thou art a friend to him
 That is to me full dear,
 That God of might make thee amends,
 When all men shall appear.
 That hath shewed mercy to the meek,
 And rid them out of pain:
 And thus the Lord possess thy spirit,
 Till we do meet again.
 If thou wilt have a recompence,
 Abide still in obedience.

L E T T E R II.

The Exhortation of ROBERT SMITH to his Children commonly set forth in the Name of Mr. ROGERS.

GIVE ear, my children, to my words,
 Whom God hath dearly bought:
 Lay up my law within your heart,
 And print it in your thought.
 For I your father have foreseen
 The frail and filthy way,
 Which flesh and blood would follow fain,
 Even to their own decay.
 For all and every living beast,
 Their crib do know full well:
 But Adam's heirs above the rest,
 Are ready to rebel:
 And all the creatures on the earth
 Full well can keep their way:
 But man, above all other beasts,
 Is apt to go astray.
 For earth and ashes is his strength,
 His glory and his reign;
 And unto ashes at the length,
 Shall he return again.
 For flesh doth flourish like a flower,
 And grow up like the grass,

And is consumed in an hour,
 As it is brought to pass.
 In me the image of your years,
 Your treasure and your trust:
 Whom ye do see before your face,
 Dissolved into dust.
 For as you see your father's flesh Converted into clay:
 Even so shall ye, my children dear,
 Consume and wear away.
 The sun and moon, and all the stars,
 That serve the day and night:
 The earth and ev'ry earthly thing Shall be consumed quite.
 And all the worship that is wrought,
 That have been heard or seen,
 Shall clean consume and come to nought,
 As it had never been:
 Therefore that ye may follow me,
 Your father and your friend,
 And enter into that same life,
 Which never shall have end:
 I leave you here a little book,
 For you to look upon:
 That you may see your father's face
 When I am dead and gone.
 Who for the hope of heav'nly things,
 While he did here remain,
 Gave over all his golden years
 In prison and in pain,
 Where I among mine iron bands,
 Inclosed in the dark,
 Not many days before my death
 Did dedicate this work,
 To you mine heirs of earthly things,
 Which I have left behind:
 That ye may read and understand,
 And keep it in your mind;
 That as you have been heirs of that Which once shall wear away:
 Even so ye may possess the part
 Which never shall decay.
 In following of your father's foot,
 In truth and also love:
 That ye may likewise be his heirs
 For evermore above.
 And in example to your youth,
 To whom I with all good,
 I preach you here a perfect faith,
 And seal it with my blood.
 Have God always before your eyes,
 In all your whole intents:
 Commit not sin in any wise,
 Keep his commandments.
 Abhor that arrant whore of Rome,
 And all her blasphemies;
 And drink not of her decretals,
 Nor yet of her decrees.
 Give honour to your mother dear,
 Remember well her pain:
 And recompense her in her age,
 In like with love again.
 Be always aiding at her hand,
 And let her not decay:
 Remember well your father's fall,
 That should have been her stay.
 Give of your portion to the poor,
 As riches do arise:
 And from the needy naked soul
 Turn not away your eyes.
 For he that will not hear the cry
 Of such as are in need,
 Shall cry himself and not be heard,
 When he would hope to speed.
 If God have giv'n you great increase,
 And blessed well your store:
 Remember ye are put in trust,
 To minister the more.
 Beware of foul and filthy lust,
 Let whoredom have no place:
 Keep clean your vessels in the Lord,
 That he may you embrace.
 Ye are the temples of the Lord,
 For ye are dearly bought:
 And they that do defile the same,
 Shall surely come to nought.
 Possess not pride in any case,
 Build not your nests too high:
 But have always before your face,
 That ye be born to die.
 Defraud not him that hired is,
 Your labours to sustain;
 But give him always out of hand,
 His penny for his pain.

And as ye would that other men Against you should proceed;
 Do ye the same again to them
 When they do stand in need.
 And part your portion with the poor,
 In money and in meat:
 And feed the fainted feeble soul,
 With that which ye should eat.
 That when your body lacketh meat,
 And clothing to your back,
 Ye may the better think on them
 That now do live and lack.
 Ask counsel also at the wise,
 Give ear unto the end:
 Refuse not you the sweet rebuke
 Of him that is your friend.
 Be thankful always to the Lord,
 With prayer and with praise:
 Desire you him in all your deeds,
 For to direct your ways:
 And sin not like that swinish sort,
 Whose bellies being fed,
 Consume their years upon the earth
 From belly unto bed.
 Seek first, I say, the living God;
 Set him always before;
 And then be sure that he will bless
 Your basket and your store.
 And thus if you direct your days
 According to this book,
 Then shall they say that see your ways,
 How like me ye do look.
 And when you have so perfectly,
 Upon your fingers ends,
 Possessed all within your book,
 Then give it to your friends.
 And I beseech the living God,
 Replenish you with grace,
 That I may have you in the heav'ns,
 And see you face to face.
 And though the sword have cut me off,
 Contrary to my kind,
 That I could not enjoy your love,
 According to my mind:
 Yet I do hope when that the heav'ns
 Shall vanish like a scrole,
 I shall receive your perfect shape,
 In body and in soul.
 And that I may enjoy your love,
 And you enjoy the land,
 I do beseech the living God
 To hold you in his hand.
 Farewel, my children, from the world,
 My children and my friends:
 I hope to God to have you all
 When all things have their ends.
 And if you do abide in God,
 As you have now begun;
 Your course I warrant will be short,
 Ye have not far to run.
 God grant you so to end your years
 As he shall think it best:
 That ye may enter into heav'n,
 Where I do hope to rest.

L E T T E R III.

To his BROTHER.

A S nature doth me bind,
 Because thou art my blood,
 According to my kind,
 To give thee of my good.
 That thou may'st have in mind
 How I have run my race,
 Although thou stay'st behind
 But for a little space.
 I give thee here a pearl,
 The price of all my good,
 For which I leave my life,
 To buy it with my blood.
 More worth than all the world,
 Or aught that I can note,
 Although it be be-clad
 In such a simple coat.
 For when I had obtain'd
 This pearl of such a price,
 Then was I sure I gain'd
 The way for to be wise.
 It taught me how to fight,
 My flesh for to despise,
 To stick unto the light,
 Also to leave the lies.

In sending out my feed,
With bonds and bitter tears,
That I might reap with joy,
In everlasting years.
And have for all my loss
My travail and my pain,
A thousand times and more,
Of better goods again.
And for because the good,
That hath been got and gain'd,
And that the Lord's elect,
Hath evermore obtain'd,
Is closed in this book
Which I do give to thee,
Wherein I have my part,
As thou thyself may'st see.
In which I hope thou hast
A stock also in store:
And will not cease to fail,
Till God hath made it more.

I will thee to beware,
Be sure thou keep it well:
For if thou do it lose,
Thy part shall be in hell.
And here I testify
Before the living God,
That I detest to do
The things that are forbid:
And as my judgment is,
My body to be brent,
My heart is surely set,
Therewith to be content.
And since it is his will,
To put me in his power,
Upon his holy hill
To fight against this whore;
Full well I am content,
If he allow it so,
To stand with all my might,
The whore to overthrow.
Even with a willing mind,
The death I will outface:
And as I am assur'd,
The battle to embrace.

That they which hear the truth,
How I have past the pike,
May set aside their youth,
And learn to do the like.

And though it be my lot,
To let her suck my blood,
Yet I am well assur'd,
It shall do her no good.

For she is set to kill
The things she thinks accurst,
And shall not have her fill
Of blood until she burst.

And when thou shalt perceive,
Or hear of my decease,
Pray to the living God,
That I may sleep in peace.

And when I am at rest,
And rid out of my pain;
Then will I do the like,
For thee to God again.

And to my woful wife,
And widow desolate,
Whom I do leave behind,
In such a simple state;

Encompassed with tears,
And mournings many one;
Be thou her staying staff
When I am dead and gone.

My mouth may not express
The colours of my mind:
Nor yet my heaviness,
To leave her here behind.

But as thou art my bone,
My brother and my blood,
So let her have thy heart,
If it may do her good.

I took her from the world,
And made her like the cross,
But if she hold her own,
She shall not suffer loss.

For where she had before A man unto her make,
That by the force of fire
Was strangled at the stake:

Now shall she have a king
To be her helping hand:
To whom pertain all things
That are within the land.

Also my daughter dear,
Whom I bequeath to thee,

To be brought up in fear,
And learn the A B C.

That she may grow in grace,
And ruled by the rod:
To learn and lead her life
Within the fear of God.

And always have in mind,
Thy brother being dead,
That thou art left behind
A father in my stead.

And thou, my brother dear,
Who art my mother's son,
Come forth out of all fear,
And do as I have done.

And God shall be thy guide,
And give thee such increase,
That in the flames of fire
Thou shalt have perfect peace.

Into eternal joy,
And pass out of all pain;
Where we shall meet with mirth,
And never part again.

If thou wilt do my daughter good,
Be mindful of thy brother's blood

Written at the Request of a Lady in her Book.

IF you will walk the way
That Christ hath you assign'd,
Then learn this little verse,
Which I have left behind.

Be servent in the truth,
Although it bear the blame;
Likewise apply your youth,
To stick unto the same.

That when old age is come,
And death begins to call,
The truth may be your staff,
To stay you up withal.

And though it bring rebuke,
And make you kiss the cross,
Yet is it a reward
To all that suffer loss.

For here we do lay out
The things that be but vain;
But we are sure to reap
The things that do remain.

For all that ye do lose,
Is but a sinful slime,
And like unto a rose
That tarrieth but a time.

But if ye carry Christ,
And walk the perfect way,
Ye shall possess the gold,
That never shall decay.

And all your father's goods
Shall be your recompence,
If ye confess the word
With double diligence.

Not only for to hear
His pure and perfect word,
But also to embrace
The fire and the sword.

And if ye keep this path,
And do not run a-crook,
Then shall ye meet the man
That writ this in your book,

In that eternal joy,
That always shall remain:
Thus farewell, faithful friend,
Till we do meet again.

Legem Ponit.

TEACH me, O Lord, to walk thy ways,
My living to amend,
And I shall keep it all my days,
Even to my life's end.
Give me a mind to understand,
So shall I never start:
But I shall keep all thy precepts,
Ev'n wholly with my heart.
Make me to go a perfect pace
In what I have begun:
For all my love and my delight
Is in thy ways to run.
Incline my heart unto thy ways,
Set thou thereon my thought:
And let me not consume my days,
To covet what is naught.
O quicken me in all thy ways,
The world now to despise:

And from all fond and foolish toys,
 Turn thou away mine eyes.
 O plant in me thy perfect word,
 Which is to me so dear:
 Lay up thy laws within my heart,
 To keep me still in fear.
 And rid me of that great rebuke
 Which I do fear full sore;
 For all thy judgments and thy law
 Endure for evermore.
 Behold, O Lord, in thy precepts
 Is all my whole delight:
 O quicken me in all thy ways,
 That I may walk aright.

LETTER IV.

To all who love God unfeignedly, and intend to lead a godly Life according to his Gospel, and to persevere in his Truth unto the End.

GRACE and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, Amen.

Be not afraid, most dearly beloved in our Saviour Jesus Christ, at these most perilous days, wherein by the sufferance of God, the prince of darkness is broken loose, and rageth in his members against the elect of God with all cruelty, to set up the kingdom of Antichrist: against whom see that you be strong in faith, to resist his most devilish doctrine with the pure gospel of God, arming yourselves with patience to abide whatsoever shall be laid to your charge for the truth's sake, knowing that thereunto you be called, not only to believe in him, but also to suffer for him. O how happy are you that in the sight of God are counted worthy to suffer for the testimony of Christ! Quiet therefore yourselves, O my loving brethren, and rejoice in him for whom you suffer: for unto you do remain the unspeakable joys, which neither the eye hath seen, nor the ear hath heard, neither the heart of man is able to comprehend in any wise. Be not afraid of bodily death, for your names are written in the book of life. And the prophets do record, that in the sight of the Lord precious is the death of his saints. Watch therefore and pray, that you be not prevented in the day of temptation. Now cometh the day of your trial, wherein the waters rage, and the stormy winds blow. Now shall it appear whether you have built upon the fleeting sand, or upon the immovable rock Christ, which is the foundation of the apostles and prophets: whereon every house that is built, groweth into an holy temple of the Lord, by the mighty working of the Holy Ghost. Now approacheth the day of your battle, wherein it is required that you shew yourselves the valiant soldiers of Christ Jesus, with the armour of God, that you may stand fast against the crafty assaults of the devil. Christ is your captain, and you be his soldiers, whose cognizance is the cross, to which he willingly humbled himself even unto death, and thereby spoiled his enemies, and now he triumpheth over them in the glory of his Father, making intercession for them that here do remain to suffer the afflictions that are to be fulfilled in his mystical body.

It behoveth, therefore, every one that would be counted his scholar, to take up his own cross and follow him, as you have him for example: and I assure you that he being on your side, nothing shall be able to prevail against you. And that he will be with you even to the world's end, you have his promise in Matth. xxviii. He go will forth with his host as a conqueror to make a conquest. He is the man that sitteth on the white horse, crowned with immortality, and you brethren are his fellowship, whereof he is the head. He hath your heart in his hand, as a bow bent after his godly will; he shall direct the same according to the riches of his glory, into all spiritual and heavenly cogitations. He is faithful, and will not suffer you to be further assaulted, than he will give you strength to overcome, and in the most danger he will make a way that you may be able to bear it.

Shrink not therefore, dear hearts, when you shall be called to answer for the hope that is in you: for we have the Comforter, even the Spirit of truth, which was sent from the heavens to teach us: he shall speak in us, he shall strengthen us: what is he then that shall be able to confound us? Nay, what tyrant is he that now boasteth himself of his strength to do mischief, whom the Lord shall not with the same Spirit, by the mouth of his servants, strike down to hell-fire? Yea, suddenly will the Lord bring down the glory of the proud Philistines, by the hands of his servant David. Their strength is in the spear and shield, but our help is in the name of the Lord, which made both heaven and earth. He is our buckler and wall, and a strong tower of defence. He is our God, and we are his people. He shall bring the counsels of the ungodly to nought. He shall take them in their own net. He shall destroy them in their own inventions. The right hand of the Lord shall work this wonder. His power is known among the children of men. Their fathers have felt it, and are confounded. In like manner shall they know that there is no counsel against the Lord, when their secrets are opened to the whole world, and are found to be against the living God. Work they ever so craftily, build they ever so strongly, yet down shall their rabble fall, and the builders themselves shall then be scattered upon the face of the earth, as accursed of God. The just shall see this and be glad, and praise the name of the Lord, that so marvellously hath dealt with his servants, as to bring their enemies under their feet. Then shall the fearful seed of Cain tremble and quake. Then shall the mocking Ishmaelites be cast out of door. Then shall the Nimrod see his labour lost. Then shall the beast of Babylon be trodden under foot. Then shall the scribes and pharisees for madness fret and rage. Then shall their painted wisdom be known for extreme folly. Then shall the bloody dragon be void of his prey. Then shall the whore of Babylon receive double vengeance. Then they shall scratch their crowns for the fall of their mistress harlot, whom they now serve for filthy lucre; when no man will buy their wares any more. Then shall the popish priesthood cry, Alas! with care, even when the Lord shall help his servants; which day is not far off, the day wherein the kingdom of Antichrist shall have an end, and never rise any more. In the mean time abide in sure hope, cleaving to the promises of God, which in their own time shall be fulfilled.

Acquit yourselves like men against the enemies of God in all humility of mind; be strong in spirit to acknowledge one God, one holy Saviour Jesus Christ, one only, everlasting and sufficient sacrifice for the remission of sins, even the precious body of the Lord Jesus once offered for all and for ever. Who now sitteth at the right hand of God, and from thence shall he come to judge both the quick and the dead at the last day; and until that time occupieth the blessed body none other place to dwell in, to be kept in, to be enclosed in, but only in the heavens, even in the glorious Majesty of God, personally abiding there in the flesh, not coming down from thence till the last hour. And as he never ceaseth to be man, so doth he never lose the similitude of man; his body there hath his lineaments, he leaveth them not, so hath that body there his highness, and shrinketh not, and his bodily shape he altereth not at any time. He is, in that he took of the virgin Mary, a natural man in all conditions, except sin.

And what he took of his blessed mother, by the working of the Holy Ghost, he took it for ever, and will not exchange the same for any other. He took the shape of man with the substance of his manhood, in one sacred womb. There were they two coupled together by the Holy Ghost, never to be divided asunder. He retaineth the one with the other inseparably. As he will not alter the substance of his flesh into the substance of bread, no more will he alter the shape of his body into the form of bread. There cannot be a greater absurdity against the truth, than to think that he would leave the shape that he took in the virgin's womb, being an accident unto his manhood, and join unto the same a wafer cake baked in an oven, or between a pair of irons. As he is in heaven very man, but only mediator between God and man, even the man Christ Jesus, he it is that is the propitiation for our sin. Be bold therefore, to confess this most pure and apostolical doctrine; and also that all favour, mercy, and forgiveness cometh only by him. He only of God the Father was made for us all wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption. All these are the gifts of God the Father, freely given unto us by Christ Jesus, God and man, through faith in his blood, and not by the merits of men; gifts they are, I say, freely given unto us of favour, without our desert, by believing and not by deserving. To this do the law and the prophets witness.

This doctrine have all the blessed martyrs of Christ's church witnessed with their blood to be true. To this truth have all the consciences of all true believers subscribed ever since the ascension of Christ. This witness is not of man, but of God. What better quarrel then can ye have to give your lives for, than the truth itself? That man that giveth his life for the truth, taketh the readiest way to life. He that hath the pope's curse for the truth, is sure of Christ's blessing. Well then, my brethren, what shall now hinder you from going forward as ye have begun? Nay, rather run with the runners, that ye may obtain the appointed glory. Hold on the right way, look not back; have the eye of your heart fixed upon God; and so run, that ye may get hold of it. Cast away all your worldly self, and worldly respects, as the favour of friends, the fear of men, sensual affection, respect of persons, honour, praise, shame, rebuke, wealth, poverty, riches, land, possessions, carnal fathers and mothers, wife and children, with the love of your yourselves; and in respect of that heavenly treasure ye look for, let all these be denied, and utterly refused of you, so that in no condition they do abate your zeal, or quench your love towards God. In this case make no account of them, but rather repute them as vile in comparison of everlasting life. Away with them as thorns that choke the heavenly seed of the gospel, where they be suffered to grow. They are burdens of the flesh, which encumber the soul. Exchange them therefore for advantage. Doth not he gain, that findeth heavenly and immortal treasure, for earthly and corruptible riches? Loseth that man any thing, who is forsaken of his carnal father and mother, when he is received of God the Father, to be his child and heir in Christ? Heavenly for earthly; immortal for mortal; permanent manent for transitory, is infinite gain for a christian conscience. Therefore, as I began, I exhort you in the Lord, not to be afraid. Shrink not, my brethren; mistrust not God; be of comfort; rejoice in the Lord; hold fast your faith, and continue to the end. Deny the world, and take up your cross, follow him who is your leader, and is gone before. If you follow him, you shall reign with him. What way can you go with him, you shall reign with him. What way can you glorify the name of your heavenly Father better, than by suffering death for his Son's sake? What a spectacle shall it be to the world to behold so godly a fellowship as you servants of God, to just a quarrel as the gospel of Christ is, with so pure a conscience, so strong a faith, and so lively a hope, to offer yourselves to suffer most cruel torments at the hands of God's enemies, and so to end your days in peace, to receive in the resurrection of the righteous, life everlasting!

Be strong therefore in your battle: the Lord God is on your side, and his truth is your cause; and against you be none but the enemies of the cross of Christ, as the serpent and his seed, the dragon with his tail, the marked men of the beast, the offspring of the pharisees, the congregation malignant, the generation of vipers, murderers, as their father the devil hath been in the beginning. To conclude, such are they as the Lord hath always abhorred, and in all ages resisted and overthrown. God, from whom nothing is hid, knoweth what they do. He that searcheth the hearts of men, hath found out them to be crafty, subtle, full of poison, proud, disdainful, stiff-necked, devourers, ravengers, and barkers against the truth, and shameless: and therefore doth the Spirit of God, by the mouths of his holy prophets and apostles, call them by the names of foxes, serpents, cockatrices, lions, leopards, bulls, wolves, dogs, swine, beasts, teaching us thereby to understand, that their natural inclination is, to deceive, poison, destroy (as much as in them lieth) the faithful and elect of God: but the Lord with his right arm shall defend his little flock against the whole rabblement of these worldlings, who conspired against him: he hath numbered all the hairs of children's head, so that one of them shall not perish without his fatherly will. He keepeth the sparrows, much more will he preserve them whom he hath purchased with the blood of the immaculate Lamb. He will keep them unto the hour appointed, wherein the name of God shall be glorified in his saints. In the mean time let them work their wills, let them envy, let them malign, let them blaspheme, let them curse, betray, whip, burn, hang and burn: for by these means God will try his gold in the furnace; and by these fruits shall they also know themselves to be known what they be, for all their sheeps. For as he that in suffering patiently for the gospel of Christ, is thereby known to be of Christ; even so is the persecutor of him known to be a member of Antichrist. Besides this, their extreme cruelty shall be a means the sooner to provoke God to take pity upon his servants, and to destroy them who so tyrannically treat his people; as we may learn by the stories, as well in the bondage of Israel under Pharaoh in Egypt, as also in the miserable captivity of Judah in Babylon: where, when the people of God were in most extreme thraldom, then did the Lord stretch forth his mighty power to deliver his servants. Though God for a time suffer them to be ruled in their own pride, yet shall they not escape his vengeance. They are his rods, and when he hath worn them to stumps, he will cast them into the fire; this shall be their eternal reward. In the mean while our duty is, patiently to do the will of God, which worketh all things for the best.

Thus dealeth he with us, partly for our trial, partly also for our sins, which we most grievously have committed to the great dishonour of his gospel, whereby the name of God was evil spoken of among his enemies; for which he now punisheth us with his fatherly corrections in this world, that we should not be damned with the world. By this means he seeketh his sheep that were lost, to bring them home to the fold again. In this way seeketh he to reform us, that we may be like unto him after the image of his Son Jesus Christ, in all holiness and righteousness before him. Finally, this way he useth his godly wisdom, to make us thereby know him, and ourselves in him, as aforetime had in a manner forgotten him, praised be his name therefore. And as for those Balaamites who now molest us, commit them to the hands of God, give him the vengeance, and he will reward them. Fall ye to prayer, and let those belly-gods prate. For he is in heaven, and sleepeth not, that keepeth Israel. He is in heaven that made the seas calm, when his disciples were afraid. Let us now faithfully call upon him, and he will hear us. Let us cry unto the Lord, for he is gracious and merciful. When we are in trouble, he is with us, he will deliver us, and he will glorify us. If we come unto him, we shall find him turned unto us. If we repent of our wickedness done against him, then shall he take away the plague that he hath devised against us.

Let us therefore earnestly repent, and bring forth the worthy fruits of repentance. Let us study to be his, then shall we not need to fear what these hypocrites do against us, who with their pretended holiness deceive the hearts of the simple, and abuse the authority of God in his princes, causing them (by their procurement) to testify their ambitious prelacy, and to erect up their idol again with the Romish mass. God, in whose hands are the hearts of kings, open the heart of the queen's highness, to espy them out what they be, and so to weed them out, that they be no longer suffered to trouble the congregation of God, and to poison the realm with pope-holy doctrine. God Almighty, for his Son Jesus Christ's sake, deliver the queen's highness, and this her church and her realm from the proud prelates, who are as profitable in the church of Christ as a polecat in the midst of a warren of conies.

To conclude, my brethren, I commit you to God, and to the power of his word, which is able to establish you in all truth. His Spirit be with you, and work always that ye may be mindful of your duties towards him, whose ye are both body and soul. Whom see that ye love, serve, dread, and obey, above all worldly powers, and for nothing under the heavens defile your conscience before God. Dissemble not with his word; God will not be mocked, nay, they that dissemble with him deceive themselves. Such shall the Lord deny, and cast out at the last day: such, I say, as bear two faces in one hood; such as deny the known truth; such as obstinately rebel against him. All such, with their partakers, shall the Lord destroy. God defend you from all such, and make you perfect unto the end. Your sorrow shall be turned into joy.

LETTER V.

From Mr. ROBERT SMITH to his WIFE.

THE God and Father eternal, who brought again from death our Lord Jesus Christ, keep thee, dear wife, now and ever, Amen; thy parents, and all thy friends. I praise God for his mercy, I am in the same state that you left me in, rather better than worse, looking daily for the living God, before whom I hunger full sore to appear, and receive the glory, of which I trust thou art willing to be partaker. I give God most hearty thanks therefore, desiring thee of all things to stand in that faith which thou hast received; and let no man take away the seed that Almighty God hath sown in thee, but lay hands on everlasting life which shall ever abide, when both the earth and all earthly friends shall perish, desiring them also to receive thankfully our trouble which is momentary and light, and as St. Paul saith, not worthy to be compared with those things which God hath prepared for us; that we patiently carrying our cross, may attain to the place where our Saviour Christ is gone before, to which I beseech God of his mercy bring us speedily. I have been much troubled about your deliverance, fearing much the persuasions of worldlings, and have found a friend, who will (I trust) find a means for you, if you be not already provided, desiring you in any case to abide such order, as those my friends shall appoint in God. And bear well in mind the words which I spake at our parting, that as God hath found us, and also elected us as worthy to suffer for him, we may endeavour ourselves to follow uprightly in this our vocation, desiring you to present my hearty commendations to all our friends, and especially to your parents, keeping your sentiments close in any wise. Give most hearty thanks to my friend, who is come to Windsor only for our cause. Continue in prayer. Do well. Be faultless in all things. Beware of abominations. Keep yourself clean from sin. Pray for me, as I do for you. I have sent you a piece of gold for a token, and most intirely desire you to send me word if you lack any thing. The Lord Jesus preserve you and your's, Amen. From Newgate, April 15.

By your husband here and in heaven,

ROBERT SMITH.

The said Robert Smith, the valiant and constant martyr of Christ, being thus replenished, as ye have heard, with the fortitude of God's Spirit, was condemned at London by Bonner their bishop on the 12th day of July; and suffered at Uxbridge the 8th day of August; who as he had been before a comfortable instrument of God to all them that were in prison with him; so now also being at the stake, he did no less comfort the people, there standing about him, willing them to think well of his cause, and not to doubt but that his body dying in that quarrel, should rise again to life. And, said he, I doubt not but God will shew you some token thereof. At length he being well nigh half burnt, and all black with fire, clustered together as in a lump like a black coal, all men thinking him for dead, suddenly rose upright before the people, lifting up the stumps of his arms, and clapping the same together, declaring a rejoicing heart unto them; and so bending down again, and hanging over the fire, slept in the Lord, and ended this mortal life.

LETTER VI.

From Mr. SMITH to his WIFE.

SEEK first to love God, dear wife, with your whole heart, and then shall it be easy to love your neighbour.

Be friendly to all creatures, and especially to your own soul.

Be always an enemy to the devil and the world, but especially to your own flesh.

In hearing of good things, join the ears of your head and heart together.

Seek unity and quietness with all men, but especially with your conscience; for it will not be easily intreated.

Love all people, but especially your enemies.

Hate the sins that are past, but especially those to come.

Be as ready to further your enemy, as he is to hinder you, that you may be a child of God.

Defile not that which Christ hath cleansed, lest his blood be laid to your charge.

Remember that God hath hedged in your tongue with the teeth and lips, that it might speak under correction.

Be ready at all times to look at your brother's eye, but especially in your own eye: for he that warneth others of what he himself is guilty, doth give his neighbour the clear wine, and keepeth the dregs to himself.

Beware of riches and worldly honour; for without understanding, prayer, and fasting, it is a snare; and also poverty, all which are like to a consuming fire, of which if a man take a little, it will warm him, but if he take too much, it will consume him. For it is hard for a man to carry fire in his bosom, and not be burnt.

Shew mercy to the saints for Christ's sake, and Christ shall reward you for the saints' sake. Among all other prisoners visit your own soul, for it is inclosed in a perilous prison.

If you will love God, hate evil, and you shall obtain the reward of well-doing.

Thus fare you well, good Anne. Have me heartily commended to all that love the Lord unfeignedly. I beseech you, have me in your prayer whilst I am living, and I am assured the Lord will accept it. Bring up my children and your's in the fear of God, and then I shall not fail to receive you together, in the everlasting kingdom of God, which I go unto.

Your husband,

ROBERT SMITH.

If you will meet with me again,
Forfake not Christ for any pain.

LETTER VII.

From the SAME to the SAME.

THE grace of Almighty God be always with you, and comfort, strengthen, and establish you in all things, that what his blessed will is, you may follow faithfully, to his honour, my comfort, and your own salvation, and the good example to our posterity.

I have received your letter, and I praise God, without any danger: nevertheless, if God's marvellous goodness had not brought it to my hands by Peter, the keeper, there might have risen great trouble upon the same. For you well know, George is a wicked man, utterly without all fear of God; and if he had gotten it, the council would surely have seen it. But Peter, like an honest man, never opened it. Wherefore I desire you from henceforth, let your letters be delivered at Chancery-lane end, to my sister Tankerfield, and she may deliver them safe into my hand. We are very straitly kept, I praise God for his mercy. Nevertheless, Almighty God is always with us. I have sent you what you wrote for. The two nutmegs that should have gone by Nicholas to our friends, I send now, and desire them to accept as a poor prisoner's gift, until God give more largely. Thomas Iveson sendeth you a penny, I pray you give him thanks for the same, and Dirick also. I have sent you of that little that I have, two pieces of Spanish money. The Lord Jesus have you in his custody, and send you good speed. In any case keep yourself close, I doubt much of your walkings. Have my hearty commendations to your parents, and desire them with you, to have me in their prayers. Be fervent in prayer, pray, pray, that God would of his mercy put up his sword, and look on his people. Tell my brother, with commendations, that the next comer shall bring up the epistle and exhortation. I have written all this fortnight for my lady, yea, and almost done nothing else. I would have sent him the articles of William Flower, and my talk with him, if I could have delivered it from the prison. The Holy Ghost keep you. I wish you could make a means for your money, to send a cheese to Peter, for I find much kindness at his hands. You shall always hear of me at Tankerfield's house. All the congregation salute you. Farewel most heartily.

I have not yet, tell my brother, spoke with the person. There is come a strict commandment, that no man must come to us, because Tooley cursed the pope at the gallows. They charge it to be our counsel.

Your's, and ever your's,

ROBERT SMITH.

LETTER VIII.

From the SAME to the SAME.

GRACE, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ, be with you, dear wife, now and ever, Amen, and prevent your ways through his holy Spirit, that you may eschew evil, to his honour, and your salvation; that they which see your conversation may in all things learn to do the like, even to the utter shame and confusion of the wicked and ungodly, Amen.

I sent you by Mr. Alexander a purse with money. I sent certain tokens for you, sent by my fellow-prisoners to you, is, from Mr. Haukes, 12d. from Mr. Simpson, 12d. from Mr. wife 4d. from Mr. Watts, five new groats; from Mr. Arden 12d. from Mr. Bradford, 12d. which men are all gone to death, except Mr. Bradford, who still remaineth. There is also gone to death Nicholas Chamberlain, Thomas Omer, and William Bamford. There is also condemned this Monday Dirick Carver, Thomas Iveson, John Launder, and William Vassay is reprieved. Pray God to have mercy on his people, and bid my brother, if he can conveniently, come down Monday next; if he cannot well do it, let him bide at home. Commend me heartily to your parents. I have sent each of them a token, a bowed groat, and desire them for God's sake to help us with their prayers. Have little Katharine in mind. Commend me to all good friends. Continue in prayer, and beware of vanity. Let not God be dishonoured in your conversation, but like a good matron keep your vessel in holiness. The peace of God remain with you for ever, Amen.

My brother Iveson sendeth to you a token, to your mother a token, and to Katharine a token, three pence. John Launder sendeth you a piece of Spanish money. Father Heral, a penny piece. William Andrews sendeth a race of ginger; I send your mother one, and a nutmeg. I send Katharine comfits, for a token to eat. I have sent you a key-clog token.

Your husband,

ROBERT SMITH.

LETTER IX.

From Mr. SMITH to his FRIEND.

THE eternal God keep you in his fear. I have heard many commendations to you and your husband, beseeching Almighty God to preserve you in well-doing, and in perfect knowledge of his Christ, that you may be found faultless the day of the Lord. I have heard say, that my friend is given over to vanity; it breaketh my heart not only to hear that he so doth, but also teacheth others that it is no crime to go to all abominations, which now stand in the idols temples; nevertheless, dear friend, be you not moved to follow sinners, for they have no inheritance with God and Christ. But let that by going into the idol temple, you defile not the temple of God: for light hath no fellowship with darkness. But let us do what the Lord hath commanded, that do. For if not going to church were without persecution, they would not learn you this lesson. But all things that are sweet to the flesh, are allowed to the fleshly. The Lord shall reward every man according to his works, and he that leadeth into captivity, shall go into captivity; and he that by the fleshly man is led in the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption. The Lord Jesus give you the holy Spirit, Amen.

I have sent thee an epistle in metre, which is not to be put up in thy coffer, but in thy heart.

Seek peace and insure it. Fear God, love God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, and with all thy strength.

Thy friend, and all men's, in Christ Jesus.

Scribbled in much haste from Newgate, May 12.

ROBERT SMITH.

ROBERT SMITH to all the faithful SERVANTS OF CHRIST, exhorting them to be strong under Persecution.

CONTENT thyself with patience,
With Christ to bear the cross of pain,
Which can and will thee recompense,
A thousand fold with joys again.

Let nothing cause thy heart to quail,
Launch out thy boat, haul up thy sail,

Put from the shore:

And be thou sure thou shalt attain,
Unto the port that shall remain

For evermore.

MARTYRDOM of STEPHEN HARWOOD, and THOMAS FUST.

ABOUT this time also died these two martyrs of God, Stephen Harwood at Stratford, and Thomas Fust at Ware. Who, as they were burnt much about the same time (though not at the same place) with the said Robert Smith and George Tankerfield, so they likewise examined and openly condemned together with them; and as the proceedings against them all were alike, I thought it needless to repeat the same; only there is one thing more to be added concerning Thomas Fust, who at his last appearance on the 12th of July, being moved by the bishop to revoke his opinion, answered thus: No, my lord, for no truth cometh out of your mouth, but all lies: you condemn me, and will not hear the truth. Where can you find anointing or greasing in God's book? I speak nothing but the truth, and I am certain that it is the truth that I speak. This answer of Thomas Fust only, I find by the register; and how unfaithful these registers have been, (I mean in omitting those things that are most worthy of note, in order to render the martyrs ridiculous to the people) is very evident in many places of this history. But to be short, when they had their answers, both he and Stephen Harwood were, for their faithful perseverance, condemned together by the bishop in his accustomed pity, to be burnt as heretics, and so (as you have heard before) they finished their martyrdom, the one at Stratford, and the other at Ware, the month of August, and year above said.

The MARTYRDOM of WILLIAM HALE, at BARNET.

OF the same company with those ten before recorded, who were sent to bishop Bonner by sir Nicholas Bore and other commissioners, in the company of George Tankerfield and Robert Smith, was also William Hale, of Thorp, in the county of Essex, who likewise being examined with the rest, the 12th of July, received with them also the sentence of condemnation; giving this exhortation withal to the lookers on: Ah, good people, said he, beware of this idolater, and this antichrist (pointing to the bishop of London); and so he was delivered to the sheriffs to be burnt as an heretic, who sent him to Barnet, where about the latter end of August he most constantly sealed up his faith with the consuming of his body by cruel fire, yielding his soul to the Lord Jesus, his only and most sure Redeemer.

ACCOUNT of GEORGE KING, THOMAS LEYES, who died, and were buried in the Fields.

Mention was made before of ten persons sent out of Newgate by Mr. Hare and other commissioners, to be examined by Bonner, bishop of London: of whom already have been executed in several places, as hath been shewed; whose names were Elizabeth Warn, George Tankerfield, Robert Smith, Stephen Harwood, Thomas Fust, and William Hale. The other three, namely George King, Thomas Leyes, and John Wade, falling sick in Lollard's Tower, were so weak that they were removed into sundry houses within the city of London, and there died, and were thrown out into the fields, and there buried in the night by some of the faithful brethren; when none in the day time durst do Propter metum Judæorum. The last that remained of this company aforesaid was Joan Laysh, or Layshard, the daughter-in-law of John Warn, and Elizabeth Warn, martyrs: but because she was reprieved to another time, her story and martyrdom we will defer till the month of January the next year following.

An ACCOUNT of WILLIAM ANDREW.

THE like catholic charity was also shewed upon William Andrew, of Horsley, in the county of Essex, carpenter, who was brought to Newgate the first day of April, 1555, by John Motham, constable of Malden in Essex. The first and principal promoter of him was the lord Rich, who sent him first to prison. Also sir Richard Southwell, knight, was another great enemy to him, as appeareth by a letter written by him to Bonner, which here followeth.

A LETTER

From Sir RICHARD SOUTHWELL to BONNER, BISHOP of LONDON.

MAY it please your lordship to understand, that the lord Rich did about seven or eight weeks past, send up unto the council one William Andrew, of Thorp, within the county of Essex, an arrogant heretic. Their pleasure was to command me to commit him to Newgate, where he remaineth; and as I am informed, hath infected a number in that prison with his heresy. Your lordship shall do very well if it please you to convent him before you, and to take order with him as his case doth require. I know the council meant to have writ herein unto your lordship, but by occasion of other business, the thing hath been omitted. Wherefore knowing their good pleasure, I did advise the keeper of Newgate to wait on you with these few lines. And so referring the rest to your virtuous consideration, I remain your lordship's to command, June 12, 1555.

RICHARD SOUTHWELL.

This William Andrew being twice examined before bishop Bonner, there manfully stood in defence of his religion. At length, by the severe usage he met with in Newgate prison, he there lost his life, which otherwise would have been taken away by fire: and so after the popish manner he was cast out into a field, and by night was privately buried by the hands of good men and faithful brethren.

The MARTYRDOM of ROBERT SAMUEL,
MINISTER of BARFOLD, in SUFFOLK.

MR. Foster, a justice, dwelling at Cobdock, near Ipswich, in the county of Suffolk, being in continual hatred against the truth and the professors of the same, his constant study night and day was how to bring those into thralldom and captivity, that were honest and piously inclined to religion; but also whatsoever they were that once came into his claws, could not easily escape without clog of conscience or loss of life, so greedy was he of blood. Among many whom he had troubled, there was one Samuel, in king Edward's days, a very godly and faithful preacher of God's word, who for his valiant and constant behaviour in his sermons, seemeth worthy of high admiration. He was minister at Barfold, in Suffolk, where he industriously and successfully taught the flock which the Lord had committed to his charge, so long as the time would suffer him to do his duty.

At last being removed from the ministry, and put from his benefice, (as many other good pastors were) when he could not avoid the raging violence of the time, yet would he not give over his care that he had for his flock, but would teach them privily and by stealth, when he could not openly do so. At which time order was given by the queen, to be published by the commissioners, that all priests which had been married in king Edward's days, should put away their wives from them, and be compelled to return again to their chastity and single life. This decree Mr. Samuel would not stand to, because he knew it to be manifestly wicked and abominable; but determining with himself, that God's laws were not to be broke for man's traditions, still kept his wife at Ipswich, and gave his diligence in the meantime to the instructing of others which were about him, as occasion served. At last Mr. Foster having intelligence hereof, being a great doer in those parts, spared no time nor diligence, but quickly sent his spies abroad, laying close wait for Mr. Samuel, that if he came home to his wife at any time, they might apprehend him, and carry him to prison.

In conclusion, when such as should betray him espied him at home with his wife, they brought word to the officer, who came to the house, and beset it with a great company, and so took him in the night-season, because they durst not do it in the day-time for fear of trouble and tumult, although good Mr. Samuel did not withstand them at all, but meekly yielded himself into their hands of his own accord. When they had thus caught him, they put him into Ipswich jail, where he patiently spent his time among his pious brethren, so long as he was permitted to continue there. However, not long after, being taken from thence, he was carried (through the malice of the wicked sort) to Norwich, where Dr. Hopton, bishop of that diocese, and Dr. Dunning, his chancellor, exercised great cruelty against him, as indeed they were men, in that time of persecution, as had not their matches for cruel tormenting the bodies of the martyrs among all the rest; and especially through the procuring of Dunning. For although the others were sharp enough in their generation, yet would they be satisfied with imprisonment and death, and could go no farther. Neither did I ever yet hear of any besides these, who so far exceeded all bounds of pity and compassion in tormenting their poor brethren, as this bishop did; in such sort, that many of them he perverted, and brought quite from the truth, and some from their wits also.

The bishop therefore, or else his chancellor, thinking that he might as easily prevail with Mr. Samuel, as he had done with the others before, kept him in a very close prison at his first coming, where he was chained bolt-up-right to a great post, in such sort, that standing only on tip-toe, he was fain to stay up the whole poise or weight of his body thereby. And to make amends for the cruelty or pain that he suffered, they added a far more grievous torment, keeping him without meat and drink, whereby he was unmercifully vexed through hunger and thirst; saving that he had every day allowed him two or three mouthfuls of bread, and three spoonfuls of water, to the end rather that he might be reserved to farther torment, than that they would preserve his life. O worthy constancy of the martyr! O pitiless hearts of papists, worthy to be complained of, and to be accused before God and nature! O the wonderful strength of Christ in his members! Whose heart, though it had been made of adamant stone, would not have relented at the intolerable vexations, and extreme pains above nature! How often would he have drunk his own water; but his body was so dried up with his long emptiness, that he was not able to make one drop.

At last, when he was brought forth to be burned, which was but a trifle in comparison of those pains that he had passed, there were several that heard him declare what strange things had happened unto him during the time of his imprisonment: to wit, that after he had been famished or pined with hunger two or three days together, he then fell into a sleep, as it were one half in a slumber, at which time one clad all in white seemed to stand before him; which administered comfort unto him by these words: "Samuel, Samuel, be of good cheer, and take a good heart unto thee. For after this day shalt thou never be either hungry or thirsty." Which came to pass accordingly, for soon after he was burned; and from that time till he suffered, he felt neither hunger nor thirst. And this he declared, to the end as he said, that all men might behold the wonderful works of God. Many other matters concerning the great comfort he had of Christ in his afflictions he could utter, he said, besides this, but that shamefacedness and modesty would not suffer him to utter it. And yet if it had pleased God, I wish he had been less modest in that behalf, that the love and care that Christ hath of his servants, might have the more appeared thereby unto us by such present arguments, for the more plentiful comfort of the godly, though there be sufficient testimonies of the same in the holy scriptures already.

No less memorable it is, and worthy also to be noted, concerning the three ladders which he told to divers, he saw in his sleep set up towards heaven; of which there was one somewhat longer than the rest, but yet at length they became one, joining (as it were) all three together. This was a forewarning revealed unto him, declaring undoubtedly the martyrdom first of himself, and from the death of two honest women, who were brought forth and suffered in the same town not long after.

As this pious martyr was going to the stake, a certain maid came to him, and took him about the neck and kissed him, which being marked by them that were present, was sought for the next day after to be had in prison and burned, as the very party herself informed me: however, as God of his goodness would have it, she escaped their fiery hands, keeping herself secret in the town a good while after. But as this maid, called Rose Nottingham, was marvellously preserved by the providence of God; so there were two other honest women that fell into the rage and fury of that time. The one was a brewer's wife, the other was a shoemaker's wife, but both together now espoused to a new husband Christ.

With these two this maid aforesaid was very familiar and well acquainted, who on a time giving counsel to one of them, that she should convey herself away while she had time and space, seeing she could not away with the queen's proceedings; had this answer at her hand again: I know well, saith she, that it is well enough to fly away, which remedy you may use if you please. But my case standeth otherwise. I am tied to an husband, and have besides young children at home; and then I know not how my husband, being a carnal man, will take my departure from him; therefore I am minded, for the love of Christ and his truth, to stand to the extremity of the matter.

And so the next day after Mr. Samuel suffered, these two pious wives, the one named Anne Potten, the other Joan Trunchfield, wife of Michael Trunchfield, shoemaker of Ipswich, were apprehended, and both had to prison together. Who, as they were both by sex and nature somewhat tender, so were they at first less able to endure the straitness of the prison, and especially the brewer's wife was cast into marvellous great agonies and troubles of mind thereby. But Christ beholding the weak infirmity of his servant, did not fail to help her when she was in this necessity. So at length they both suffered after Samuel, Feb. 19, 1556, as shall be by God's grace declared hereafter. And these, no doubt were those two ladders, which being joined with the third, Samuel saw stretched up into heaven. This blessed Samuel, the servant of Christ, suffered the 31st of August, 1555.

The report goeth among some that were there present and saw him burn, that his body in burning did shine as bright and white as new tried silver in the eyes of them that stood by, as I am informed by some that were there, and did behold the sight.

From Mr. ROBERT SAMUEL, exhorting to the patient Suffering of Affliction for the Cause of Christ.

A Man knoweth not his time; but as the fish is taken with the angle, and as the birds are caught with a snare, so are men caught and taken in the perilous time when it cometh upon them. The time cometh; the day draweth near, Ezekiel saith. Better it were to die (as the preacher saith) than to live and feel the miserable works which are done under the sun; such sad den and strange mutation, such woeful, heinous, and lamentable divisions so fast approach, and none, or very few, thoroughly repent. Alas, for this sinful nation, a people of great iniquity and seed of ungraciousness, corrupting their ways. They have forsaken the Lord, they have provoked the Holy One of Israel to anger, and are gone backward. Who now liveth not in such security and rest, as though all dangers were clean overpast? Who now blindeth and buffeteth not Christ, which seeth me, and seeth me not? Yea, who liveth not now in such felicity, worldly pleasures and joys, wholly seeking the world, providing, and craftily shifting for the earthly clock of carnal appetites, as though sin were clean forgotten, overthrown and devoured? Like hoggish Gergelites, now are we made afraid and ashamed of Christ our Messiah, fearing the loss of our filthy pigs, I mean our transitory goods, and disquieting our sinful and mortal bodies in this short, uncertain, and miserable life, than of a legion of devils, seducing and driving in hearing, reading, and believing Christ, God's eternal word, the power to save our souls, unto vanities, and fables, and to this bewitching world. The perilous abundance of goods, too much satirity of meats, and quietness, which destroyed with so many souls, Sodom and Gomorrah! Jeroboam; so long the goodly cities, Sodom and Gomorrah! Jeroboam; so long he was but a poor man, not yet advanced to his dignity, in the laws of God, and without reprehension; but in the laws of wealth and a prosperous state, he became a wicked and most shameful idolator. And what made the covetous young man so loth to follow Christ, when he was bid to forsake the worldly wealth which he then enjoyed? He was enticed unto these false allusions of the world, baits of perdition, hooks of the devil, which have so shamefully deceived and misled full many from the right path unto the Lord, into the ways of confusion and perpetual perdition.

We might now worthily, dear christians, lament and bewail our heavy state, miserable condition, and sorrowful chance: I say, we might well accuse ourselves, and with Job curse our turbulent, wicked, and bloody last days of this world, were it not that we both see and believe, and find in God's sacred book, that God hath reserved a remnant in all ages, I mean the faithful, as many as have been from the beginning of the world exercised, whetted, and polished with divers afflictions, troubles, and tossings; cast and dashed against all evil and dangers, as the very dross and out-casts of the earth, and yet will in no wise halt between God and Baal; for God will not part with two men in one; he cannot away with them that are between both, but casteth them away as a filthy vomit. Christ will not part spoil with his mortal enemy the devil; he will have all, or lose all: he will not permit the devil to have the service of the body, and he to stand contented with the heart and mind: but "He will be glorified both in your bodies and in your spirits, which are his," as Saint Paul saith, 1 Cor.

For he hath made all, bought all, and dearly paid for all, St. Peter saith, "With his own immaculate body hath he redeemed your bodies from sin, death, and hell, and with his most precious blood paid your ransom and full price for all and for ever."

Now what harm, I pray you, or what loss sustain you by this? Why are you, O vain men, more afraid of Jesus your gentle Saviour, and his gospel of salvation, than of a legion of cruel devils, going about with false delusions utterly to destroy both your souls and bodies? Think you to be more sure than under your captain, Christ? Do you promise yourselves to be more quiet in Satan's service, than in Christ's religion? Esteem you more these transitory and pernicious pleasures, than God and all his heavenly treasures? O palpable darkness, horrible madness, and wilful blindness, without comparison, too much to be suffered any longer! We see and will not see; we know and will not know; yea, we smart and will not feel, and that our conscience well knoweth. O miserable and brainless souls, which would for foolish pleasures and slippery wealth lose the royal kingdom and permanent joys of God, with the everlasting glory which he hath prepared for them that truly love him, and renounce the world. The children of the world live in pleasure and wealth; and the devil, who is their god, and prince of this world, keepeth their wealth which is proper unto them, and letteth them enjoy it. But let us, which be of Christ, seek and inquire for heavenly things, which by God's promise and mercy in Christ shall be peculiar unto us. Let, I say, the Cretians, and Epicures, and such other beastly Belials and carnal people, delight in things that be pleasant for the body, and do appertain to this transitory life: "Yet shall they once (as the kindly prophet saith) run about the city of God, to and fro, howling like dogs, desiring one scrap of the joys of God's elect," but all too late, as the rich glutton did.

Let us therefore follow those things that do pertain to the Spirit, and are celestial. "We must be here (saith St. Paul) not as inhabitants, and home-dealers, but as strangers;" not as strangers only, but after the mind of Paul, as painful soldiers appointed by our governor, to fight against the governor of darkness of this world, against spiritual craftiness in heavenly things. The time is come; we must to it; the judgment must begin first at the house of God. Began they not first with the green and sappy tree? And what followed then, on the dry branches? Jeremy, speaking in the person of God, saith, "In the city wherein my name is invoked, will I begin to punish:" but as for you (meaning the wicked), shall you be as innocents, and not once touched? Nay, the dregs of God's wrath, the bottom of all sorrows, are reserved unto them in the end: but God's household shall drink the flower of the cup of his mercy. And therefore let us say with Ezechias, "Play the men and shrink not: let us comfort ourselves, for the Lord is with us, our helper, and fighteth for us. The Lord is (saith he) with you, when you be with him; and when you seek him, he will be found of you: and again, when you forsake him, he will forsake you."

Wherefore we ought not to be dismayed, or discourage ourselves, but rather to be of good comfort: not to be sad, but merry, not sorrowful, but joyful, in that God of his goodness will vouchsafe to take us as his beloved children, to subdue our sinful lusts, our wretched flesh and blood unto his glory, the promoting of his holy word, and edifying of his church. What if the earthly house of this our habitation (St. Paul meaning the body) be destroyed? We know assuredly we shall have a building not made with hands, but everlasting in heaven, with such joys as faith taketh not, hope toucheth not, and charity apprehendeth not. They pass all desires and wishes. Gotten they may be by Christ, esteemed they cannot be. Wherefore the more affliction and persecution the word of God bringeth, the more felicity and greater joy abideth in heaven. But the worldly peace, idle ease, wealthy pleasure, and this present and pleasant transitory life and felicity, which the ungodly foolishly imagine to procure unto themselves by persecuting and thrusting away the gospel, shall turn unto their own trouble, and at last unto horrible destructions and mutations of realms and countries; and after this life, if they repent not, unto their perpetual infelicity, perdition, and damnation. For they had rather, with Nabal and his temporal pleasures, descend to the devil, than with Christ and his bodily troubles, ascend unto the kingdom of God his Father. "But an unwise man," saith the Psalmist, "comprehendeth them not, neither doth the foolish understand them;" that is, these bloody persecutors grow up and flourish like the flower and grass in the field. But unto this end do they so flourish, that they might be cut down and cast into the fire for ever. For as Job saith, "their joy lasteth but the twinkling of an eye," and death shall lie gnawing upon them as doth the flock upon the pasture; yea, the cruel worm, late repentance, (as St. Mark saith) shall lie gnawing, tormenting, and accusing their wretched conscience for evermore.

Let us therefore (good christians) be constant in obeying God rather than men. For although they slay our sinful bodies (yea, rather our deadly enemies) for God's verity; yet they cannot do it, but by God's sufferance and good will; to his praise and honour, and to our eternal joy and felicity. For our blood, shed for the gospel, shall preach it with more fruit, and greater furtherance, than did our mouths, lives, and writings, as did the blood of Abel, Stephen, with many others. What though they laugh Christ and his word to scorn, who sit in the chair of perverse pestilent scorers. To whom, as to the wise gentiles of the world, the gospel of Christ is but foolishness, as it was to the Jews a slander and a stumbling stone, whereat they now being fallen, have provoked the wrath and vengeance of God upon them.

These are the days of vengeance, saith Luke, that all things written may be fulfilled. And surely it shall be no less than a huge storm of evils that shall come upon us, because that a long and obstinate maliciousness of us hath gone before, crying in the ears of the Lord God of hosts, who so many times and so many ways have been provoked with the unspeakable riches of his goodness, his patience, and long-suffering, to amendment, and have nevertheless contemned the same, and proceeded forward to worse and worse, provoking and stirring the presence of God's Majesty to anger.

Now, therefore, saith God by the mouth of his prophet, "I will come unto thee, and I will send my wrath upon thee:" upon thee, I say, O England, and punish thee according to thy ways, and reward thee after all thine abominations. Thou hast kindled the fire of God's wrath, and hast stirred up the coals. For thou wast once enlightened, and hadst tasted of the heavenly gift, and wast become partaker of the Holy Ghost, and hadst tasted of the good word of God: yea, it is yet in thy mouth, saith the prophet. Alas! O England, thou knewest thy Lord and Master's will, but didst not do it; thou must therefore, saith he, suffer many stripes, and many sharp strokes, and walk in the glittering and hot flame of thine own fire, and on the coals that thou hast kindled. This cometh to thee from my hand, saith the Lord, namely, that thou shalt sleep in sorrow and in bitterness. The plain truth telleth the tale, the irremittable justice of the ever-living God, and the ordinary course of his plagues from the beginning confirmeth the same. The joy of our heart, saith Jeremy, is gone, our glory is fallen away, our merry singing is turned into mourning, the garland of our head is fallen: alas! that ever we sinned so sore!

Let all the wicked enemies of Christ, and all the unbelievers, look to be tormented and vexed with all hellish furies, and clean without hope of God's accounting day, who know not God in Christ to be their very righteousness, their life, their only salvation and alone Saviour, nor believe in him. They must, as St. John saith, needs abide and perish with their sins in death and in eternal damnation. But we be the children of saints, as the elder Toby did answer, and look for another life, which God shall give to all them who change not their faith, and shrink not from him. Rejoice therefore, ye christian afflicted brethren, for they cannot take our souls and bodies out of the hands of the Almighty, which be kept as in the bosom of our most sweet and loving Father: and if we abide fast in Christ, and turn not away like weather-cocks, surely we shall live for ever. Christ affirmeth the same, saying, "My sheep hear my voice, I know them, they hearken unto me, and to no strangers, and I give them everlasting life; for they shall not be lost, and no man shall pluck them out of my hands:" no nor yet this flattering world with all his vain pleasures, nor any tyrant with his great threats and stout brags can once move them out of the way of eternal eternal life. What consolation and comfort can we have more pleasant and effectual than this? God is on our side, and fighteth for us; he suffereth, he smareth, and is afflicted with us. As the world can do nothing against his might, neither in taking away or diminishing from his glory, nor putting him from his celestial throne; so neither can it hurt any one of his children without his good will. For we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones, and as dear to him as the apple of his eye.

Let us therefore with an earnest faith lay fast hold on the promises in the gospel, and let us not be separated from the same by any temptation, tribulation, or persecution. Let us consider the verity of God to be invincible, inviolable, and immutable, promising and giving us, his faithful soldiers, life eternal. It is he only that hath deserved it for us: it is his only benefit, and of his only mere mercy, and unto him only must we render thanks. Let not therefore the vain fantasies and dreams of men, and foolish gaudy toys of the world, nor the crafty delusions of the devil, drive and separate us from our hope of the crown of righteousness that is laid up in store for us against the last day. O that happy and joyful day, I mean to the faithful, when Christ by his covenant shall grant and give unto them that overcome, and keep his words to the end, that they may ascend and sit in seats with him, as he ascended and sitteth on the throne with his Father. The same body and soul that is now with Christ afflicted, shall then with Christ be glorified: now in the butcher's hands, as sheep appointed to die; then sitting at God's table with Christ in his kingdom, as God's honourable and dear children; where we shall have heavenly riches for earthly poverty, satiation of the pleasant presence of the glory of God, for hunger and thirst; celestial joys in the company of angels, for sorrows, troubles, and cold irons; and life eternal for bodily death. O happy precious souls! O precious death and evermore blessed, right dear in the eyes of God; to you the spring of the Lord shall ever be flourishing. Then (as saith Isaiah) "The redeemed shall return and come again into Sion, praising the Lord, and eternal mercies shall be over their heads: and they shall obtain mirth and solace; sorrow and woe shall be utterly vanquished." Yea, I am he, saith the Lord, that in all things giveth you everlasting consolation. To whom with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be glory and praise for ever, Amen.

ROBERT SAMUEL.

L E T T E R II.

From Mr. ROBERT SAMUEL, to the CHRISTIAN CONGREGATION, wherein he declareth the CONFES-SION of his FAITH.

CONSIDERING with myself these perilous times, perishing days, and the unconstant state of man, the decay of our faith, the sinister report and false slander of God's most holy word, these urgent causes in conscience do constrain me to acknowledge and confess my faith and meaning in Christ's holy religion, as St. Peter teacheth me, saying, "Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, and that with meekness and fear, having a good conscience, that when they back-bite you as evil-doers, they may be ashamed, forasmuch they have falsely accused your good conversation in Christ."

As touching my doctrine, for that little talent that God hath given me, God I take to record, mine own conscience and mine auditory knoweth, that I neither in doctrine nor manners willingly taught any other thing than I received of the holy patriarchs, prophets, Christ, and his apostles. For it were not only sin, but also the very part of a cursed miscreant, to deny, belie, or betray the innocency of that heavenly doctrine, or to be ashamed to confess and stand to the defence of the same; seeing that Christ planted it with his most precious blood, and all good men have more esteemed the true and infallible word of God, than all this transitory world, or their own mortal lives. And I believe this doctrine of the patriarchs, prophets, Christ, and his apostles, to be sufficient and absolutely necessary to instruct and teach me, and all the holy church, of our duty towards God, the magistrates, and our neighbours.

First, and principally, I do assuredly believe, without doubting, that there is one Deity, or Divine Essence, and Infinite Substance; which is both called, and is indeed, God Everlasting, unbodily, unpartable, unmeasurable in power, wisdom, and goodness, the maker and preserver of all things, as well visible as invisible; and yet there be three distinct persons, all of one Godhead, or Divine Being, and all of one power, coequal, consubstantial, coeternal, the Father, Son, and the Holy Ghost.

I believe in God the Father Almighty, &c. As touching God the Father of heaven, I believe as much as holy scripture teacheth me to believe. The Father is the first person in the Trinity, first cause of our salvation, who hath blessed us with all manner of blessings in heavenly things by Christ, who hath chosen us before the foundations of the world were laid, that we should be holy and without blame before him; who hath predestinated and ordained us to be his children of adoption, through Christ Jesus; in him, as it is said, we live, we move, and have our being; he nourisheth, feedeth, and giveth meat to every creature.

And in Jesus Christ our Lord. I believe that the Word, that is, the Son of God, the second person in the Trinity, did take man's nature in the womb of the blessed virgin Mary: that there be in him two natures, a divine nature and an human nature, in the unity of one person inseparable, conjoined in one Christ, truly God, and truly man, the express and perfect image of the invisible God, wherein the will of God the Father apparently shineth, and wherein man, as it were in a glass, may behold what he ought to do, that he may please God the Father.

Born of the virgin Mary; truly suffering his passion, crucified, dead, and buried, to the intent to bring us again into favour with God the Father Almighty, and to be a sacrifice and oblation, not only for original sin, but also for the actual sins of the whole generation of mankind. For all the works, merits, deservings, doings, and obedience of man towards God, although they be done by the Spirit of God, in the grace of God, yet being thus done, be of no validity, worthiness, or merit before God, except God for his mercy and grace account them worthy for the worthiness and merits of Jesus Christ.

The same Christ went down to the hells, and truly rose again the third day, and ascended into the heavens, that he might there still reign and have dominion over all creatures, and from thence shall come, &c.

I believe in the Holy Ghost, coequal with God the Father and the Son, and proceeding from them both; by whose virtue, strength, and operation, the true catholic church, which is the communion and society of saints, is guided in all truth and verity, and kept from all power of sin. Which church is sanctified and hallowed with the precious blood and Spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ; which hath also her sign and mark, that she heareth and followeth the voice of her only and true pastor Christ, and no strangers. This church also is the house of God, the pillar of truth, the lively body of Christ, a church both in name and in deed.

I believe the remission of sins, by the only means and merit of Christ's death and passion; who is made unto us of God, that only sacrifice and oblation offered once for all, and for ever, for them that be sanctified.

I believe the resurrection of the body, whereby in the last day all men shall rise again from death, the souls joined again to the bodies, the good to everlasting life, the wicked to everlasting pain and punishment. And nothing may more certainly establish and confirm our faith, that we shall rise again immortal both in body and soul, than the resurrection of our Saviour, and the first fruits of the dead. Now that Christ our head is risen, we being his body and members must follow the head. Death, hell, and sin, cannot separate or pluck us from him. For as the Son cannot be divided nor separated from the Father, nor the Holy Ghost from them both, no more may we, being the faithful members of Christ, be separated from Christ. And for a confirmation of our resurrection, Christ would be seen after his resurrection in his most glorious body, his wounds being handled and felt, speaking and teaching, and eating and drinking, &c. We look (saith St. Paul) for Christ Jesus our Saviour, who shall change our vile bodies, and conform them to his glorious body by the same power and virtue, whereby he is able to subdue all things; even like as the grain of wheat sown in the ground is first putrified and brought, as it were, to nothing, yet after that it springeth up afresh with a more goodly colour, form, and beauty, than it had before. The body is sown in corruption, and riseth in incorruption; it is sown in dishonour, and riseth in glory.

Thus I verily know, and assuredly believe the resurrection of our bodies, and to have life eternal by Christ, and for Christ's sake. Verily, verily, I say unto you, saith Christ, he that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into damnation, but is escaped from death to life. It is Christ that once died for our sins, and is risen again, never more to die: it is he that swalloweth up death, and hath cast it under his feet for ever. What now can death do unto us? Verily nothing else, but for a little time separate our precious souls from our wretched bodies, that divine substance from a mass of sin, that eternal life from a body of death, and so send our souls out of this miserable, wretched, and sorrowful life, cumbered with all calamities, unto that most blessed felicity and joys eternal.

As concerning the holy and reverend sacraments of Christ's church, which are two in number, the sacrament of baptism, and the supper of the Lord; I believe them to be as St. Paul calleth them, confirmations or seals of God's promises, which have added to them a promise of grace; and therefore they are called visible signs of invisible grace.

The sacrament of baptism is a mark of Christ's church, a seal and confirmation of our acceptation into the grace and favour of God, for Christ's sake. For his innocency, his righteousness, his holiness, his justice, is our's, given us of God, and our sins and unrighteousness, by his obedience and abasing of himself to the death of the cross, are his, whereof baptism is the sign, seal, and confirmation.

Baptism is also a sign of repentance, to testify that we are born the waves of perils, and changes of life, to the intent that should die continually, as long as we live from sin, and rise in like new men unto righteousness, Rom. vi. The other sacrament, which is the supper of our Saviour Christ, whereby the church of Christ is known, I believe to be remembrance of Christ's death and passion, a seal and confirmation of his most precious body given unto death, even to the death of the cross, wherewith we are redeemed and delivered from sin, death, hell, and damnation. It is a visible sign, because it worketh the same thing in the eyes, which the word worketh in the ears. For like as the word is a means to the ears, whereby the Holy Ghost moveth the heart to believe, so this sacrament is a means to the eyes, whereby the Holy Ghost moveth the heart to believe: it preacheth peace between God and man; it exhorteth to mutual love and all godly things, and teacheth to contemn the world for the life to come, in as Christ shall appear, which is now in heaven, and no where else as concerning his human body.

Yet do I believe assuredly, that his very body is present in his holy supper at the contemplation of our spiritual eyes, and verily eaten with the mouth of our faith. For as soon as I hear these most comfortable and heavenly words spoke and pronounced by the mouth of the minister: "This is my body which is given for you:" when I hear (I say) this heavenly harmony of God's infallible promises and truth; I look not upon, neither do I behold bread and wine; for I take and believe the same simply and plainly, even as Christ spake them. For when I hear these words, my senses be wrapt and utterly excluded; faith wholly taketh place, and not flesh, nor carnal imaginations of our gross, fleshly, and unreverent eating after the manner of our bodily food, which profiteth nothing at all, as Christ teacheth, John vi. but with a sorrowful and wounded conscience, an hungry and thirsty soul, a pure and faithful mind do I embrace, behold, and feed, and look upon that most glorious body of Christ in heaven, at the right hand of God the Father, very God and very man, which was crucified and slain, his blood shed for our sins, there now making intercession, bringing and giving his holy body for me, for my body, for my soul, for my full price and satisfaction, who is my Christ, all that ever he hath; and by this spiritual and faithful eating of this lively and heavenly bread, I feel the most sweet sap and taste of the fruits, benefits, and unspeakable joys of Christ's death and passion, fully digested into the bowels of my soul. My mind is quieted from all worldly adversities, turmoils, and troubles, my conscience is pacified from sin, death, hell, and damnation; my soul is full, and hath even enough, desires no more; for all things are but loss, vile dung, dross, vain vanity, for the excellent knowledge sake of Christ Jesus, my Lord and Saviour.

Thus now is Christ's flesh my very meat indeed, and his blood my very drink indeed, and I am become flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bones. Now I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; for through faith in Christ, and for Christ's sake I am one, that is, of one consent, mind and fellowship, with the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, John xvii. Thus I am assured and fully persuaded, and on this rock have I built, God's grace, my dwelling and resting-place for body and soul, life and death. And thus I commit my cause unto Christ righteous and just judge, who will another day judge these states and controversies; whom I humbly beseech to cast his merciful eyes upon the afflicted and ruinous churches, and shortly to reduce them into godly and perpetual concord, peace.

Thus do I believe, and thus is my faith and my understanding in Christ my Saviour, and his true and holy religion. And whosoever is ashamed to do among this adulterous and sinful generation, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels.

ROBERT SAMUEL.

ACCOUNT of WILLIAM ALLEN, MARTYR.

NOW after the suffering of Robert Samuel, about the beginning of September, William Allen was sent into Walsingham, a labouring man, sometime servant to John Houghton, of Somerton. He being brought before the bishop, and asked the cause why he was imprisoned, answered, That he was put in prison because he would not follow the cross, saying, that he would never go in procession.

Then being willed by the bishop to return again to the catholic church; he answered, That he would turn to the catholic church, but not to the Romish church: he said, That if he saw the king and queen, and all others follow the cross, or kneel down to the cross, he would not. For which sentence of condemnation was given against him the 12th of August, to be burnt at Walsingham about the beginning of Sept. who declared his constancy at his martyrdom, and had such credit with the justices, by reason of his well-tryed conversation among them, that he was suffered to go untied to his suffering, and there being fastened with a chain, stood quietly without shrinking until he died.

The MARTYRDOM of ROGER COO, first Examined by the BISHOP of NORWICH, and by him Condemned; August 12, 1555.

ROGER COO, being brought before the bishop, was first asked by him, why he was imprisoned?

Coo. At the justice's commandment.

Bishop. There was some cause why.

Coo. Here is my accuser, let him declare.

And his accuser said, that he would not receive the sacrament.

Then the bishop said, that he thought he had transgressed a law.

But Coo answered, that there was no law to transgress.

The bishop then asked, What he said to the law that then was?

Coo answered, That he had been in prison a long time, and knew it not.

No, said his accuser, nor will not. My lord, ask him when he received the sacrament.

When Coo heard him say so, he said, I pray you, my lord, let him sit down and examine me himself.

But the bishop would not hear that, but said, Coo, why will you not receive?

He answered him, That the bishop of Rome had changed God's ordinances, and given the people bread and wine instead of the gospel, and the belief of the same.

Bishop. How prove you that?

Coo. Our Saviour said, "My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him;" and the bread and wine doth not so.

Bishop. Well, Coo, thou dost slander our holy fathers. Did not Christ take bread, give thanks, and break it, and said, "This is my body?"

Yes, said he; and so he went further with the text, saying, "Which shall be given for you: do this in remembrance of me."

Bishop. You have said the truth.

Then Coo replied further, and said, Christ commanded to do this in remembrance of him, and not to say this in remembrance of him; neither did the Holy Ghost so lead the apostles, but taught them to give thanks, and to break from house to house, and not to say as the bishop said.

Bishop. How prove you that?

Coo. It is written in Acts ii.

Then the bishop's chaplain said it was true.

The bishop asked him if he could say his creed.

He answered yea, and so said part of the creed; and then after, he said he believed more; for he believed the Ten Commandments, that it was meet for all such as look to be saved, to be obedient unto them.

Bishop. Is not the holy church to be believed also?

Coo. Yes, if it be built upon the word of God.

The bishop said to Coo, that he had the charge of his soul.

Coo. Have you so, my lord? Then if you go to the devil for your sins, what shall become of me?

Bishop. Do you not believe as your father did? Was not he an honest man?

Coo. It is written, that after Christ hath suffered, "There shall come a people with the prince that shall destroy both city and sanctuary. I pray you shew me whether this destruction was in my father's time, or now?"

The bishop not answering his question, asked him, whether he would not obey the king's laws?

Coo. As far as they agree with the word of God I will obey them.

Bishop.

Bishop. Whether they agree with the word of God or not, we are bound to obey them, if the king were an infidel.

Coo. If Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, had so done, Nebuchadnezzar had not confessed the living God.

Bishop. These two and twenty years we have been governed by such kings.

Coo. My lord, why were you then dumb, and did not speak or bark?

Bishop. I durst not for fear of death. And thus they ended.

But after this done, it was reported that I railed; wherefore I recollected, and wrote down my railing (as they called it) that light should not be taken for darkness, nor sin for holiness, and the devil for God, who ought to be feared and honoured both now and for ever, Amen.

This Roger Coo, an aged father, after his sundry troubles and conflicts with his adversaries, at length was committed to the fire at Yexford, in the county of Suffolk, where he most blessedly ended his aged years, in the month of September, 1555.

An ACCOUNT of THOMAS COB, of HAVERHILL, BUTCHER, and MARTYR.

THOMAS COB, of Haverhill, butcher, was condemned on the 12th day of August, and executed in the month of September. Being brought and examined by Michael Dunning, the bloody chancellor of Norwich; first, whether he believed that Christ is really and substantially in the sacrament of the altar; answered, That the body of Christ, born of the virgin, was in heaven, and otherwise (he said) he would not answer, because he had read it in the scripture, that Christ did ascend, and did never descend since; and therefore said, that he had not learned in the scripture, that Christ should be in the sacrament.

Furthermore, being demanded whether he would obey the laws of the realm of England, made for the unity of the faith, or no; he answered, That his body should be at the king and queen's commandment so far as the law of God would suffer, &c. In fine, he being condemned, was burnt in the town of Thetford, in September, 1555.

An ACCOUNT of the MARTYRDOM of GEORGE CATMER, ROBERT STREATER, ANTHONY BURWARD, GEORGE BRODBRIDGE, and JAMES TUTTY.

NOW to return to Norfolk and Suffolk, in the diocese of Canterbury, where we shall treat of five worthy martyrs, whose blood in the same year and month of September, was spilt for the true testimony of Christ and his gospel, the names of whom are as follow:

George Catmer, of Hith; Robert Streater, of Hith; Anthony Burward, of Calote; George Brodbridge, of Bromfield; James Tutty, of Brenchley.

These upon the third day of August were brought before Dr. Thornton, the aforesaid bishop of Dover, and his accomplices, and there were both jointly and severally examined upon certain articles, touching the sacrament of the altar, auricular confession, and other such like.

To which the said Catmer (being first examined) made answer in this wise: Christ, said he, sitteth in heaven on the right hand of God the Father, and therefore I do not believe him to be in the sacrament of the altar; but he is in the worthy receiver spiritually; and the sacrament, as you use it, is an abominable idol.

Next unto him Robert Streater was called forth, who being also asked, Whether he did believe the real presence of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, said, that he did not so believe; for you do maintain hereby and idolatry (says he) in that you teach to worship a false god in the sacrament, enclosed in a box. It is you that are the malignant of the church: for in your church there are twenty things used against the law of God.

The like objection was likewise made against Anthony Burward, who also said that their sacrament was an idol.

After him it was demanded of George Brodbridge what he said to those articles. Who answered, that he would not be confessed of a priest, because he could not forgive his own sins. And further said, that the sacrament of the altar there is no real body of our Saviour Christ, but bread given in remembrance of him. Moreover, as for your holy bread, your holy water, and your mass, I do (says he) utterly detest them.

And last of all, James Tutty made and confirmed the foregoing answers.

And therefore they were all five condemned as heretics, and were all five burned at Canterbury in the fire, about the 6th day of September then next following.

Although the rage and vehemency of this terrible persecution in queen Mary's days did chiefly light upon London, Essex, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Kent, as before been partly already declared; yet notwithstanding, in almost all places some were put to death for the righteous cause. And now to begin with the diocese of Litchfield and Coventry, where we shall just mention two persons, namely, Thomas Hayward, and John Goreway, who were both condemned as heretics, and were burnt at Litchfield about the middle of September.

The HISTORY of ROBERT GLOVER, Gentleman, and Mr. JOHN GLOVER, in the Diocese of LITCHFIELD.

ROBERT GLOVER, gentleman, was likewise apprehended, and put to death in the month of September, in the diocese of Litchfield and Coventry. whose apprehension and troubles I cannot well treat without mentioning some things relating to John Glover, his brother, because the commission was chiefly sent down for John, and not for Robert, (although it pleased God that John escaped, and Robert in his stead was apprehended) therefore I thought it necessary to comprehend them both in one story. In describing some part of their virtuous institution and order of life I shall first begin with John the eldest brother; who being a gentleman, and heir to his father in the town of Mancetter, was endowed with fair possessions and worldly goods, but much more plentifully enriched with God's heavenly grace, and inward virtues: which grew so wrought in him, that he with his other brethren Robert and William, not only received and embraced the happy light of Christ's holy gospel, but also most zealously professed, and no less diligently in their lives and conversation followed the same.

John Glover was a man of a very tender conscience, and seemed to have a deeper taste and contemplation of heavenly things, and more mortified from worldly cares than the others were. His spiritual conflicts were very extraordinary, and because the consideration of the same both is worthy of memory, and the example may be of experience to the comfort of the godly, it may not be amiss to rehearse some part of them. It pleased God so to lay his heavy hand of inward afflictions and grievous passions upon him, that though he suffered not the pains of the outward fire, as his brothers and other martyrs did; yet if we consider what he suffered inwardly, and that for a long time, he may well be counted a martyr with his brother Robert, being no less desirous with him of the same martyrdom; yea, and in comparison may seem to be chronicled for a double martyr.

For as the said Robert was speedily dispatched with the sharp and extreme torments of the fire in a short time; so this no less blessed saint of God, what, and how much more grievous pangs, what sorrowful torments, what boiling heats of the fire of hell he inwardly felt, his tongue is able to express. Being young, I remember I was once or twice with him, who partly by his talk I perceived ved, and partly by mine own eyes saw to be so worn and consumed by the space of five years, that he could hardly digest any meat, enjoy the quietness of sleep, pleasure of life; yea, and almost no kind of senses left in him. And truly I have often greatly wondered at the miraculous operation of Christ shewed upon him, who unless he had relieved in time his poor wretched servant so far worn, with some seasonable consolation and then, it could not be possible for him to subsist under such intolerable agonies. And yet the occasion thereof was of no great moment neither. But nothing more common amongst the holiest and best of men, how much the more devout and watchful there are, having the fear of God before their eyes) so much the more they mistrust and suspect themselves; whereby it cometh to pass, that they are often so terrified and perplexed with small matters (in comparison) as though they were huge mountains; whereas, on the contrary, there be whom the blackest and most heinous crimes will nothing touch or move.

The occasion of this was, that he being first called to the light of the Holy Spirit to the knowledge of the gospel, and having received a wonderful, sweet, and feeling sense of Christ's heavenly kingdom, his mind, after that, falling to some cogitation of his former affairs belonging to his vocation, began by and by to misdoubt himself upon the occasion of these words written in the chapter to the Hebrews; "For it is impossible for them who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance: seeing they crucify themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to open shame." Upon the consideration of which words, he fully persuaded himself that he had sinned against the Holy Ghost; even so much, that had he been in hell, he could hardly despair much more of his salvation. Every good man may readily judge, by himself, what terrors, boilings, and convulsions, troubled in the mean time in his woful breast; although it be hard for any man to judge of the misery thereof, but he who hath by experience felt the like.

Now in comparing the torments of all martyrs with pains, I pray you, what pains, punishment, and flames could he not willingly have suffered, to have had some small ease and refreshment? Being under such intolerable agonies of mind, that he could have no enjoyment of his God, yet was he compelled to eat against his appetite, and purpose to defer the time of his damnation as long as he could, thinking with himself, that he must needs be thrown into hell, as soon as the breath went out of his body. However, he thought Christ pitied his case, and was sorry for him; yet he could not (as he imagined) sleep, because of the verity of the word, which said, "It is impossible for those who were once enlightened," &c.

And this I mention not to open his wound and expose his misfortunes; but to encourage all good men by his example to glorify the Son of God, who suffereth none to be tempted above his strength, but so tempereth and seasoneth the asperity of evils, that what seemeth to us intolerable, he doth not only alleviate, that we may bear it, but also turneth it more to our advantage than we can imagine; which manifestly appeared in this good servant of God, and in no man more. And although (as we have said) he suffered many years these sharp temptations and strong buffetings of Satan; yet the Lord, who graciously preserved him all the while, did at last rid him out of all discomfort, but also armed him thereby to such mortification of life, as the world probably hath not been seen, in such sort as he being like one placed in heaven already, and dead to this world, both in word and meditation led a life altogether celestial, abhorring in his mind all prophane doings. Neither was his talk any thing different from the fruits of his life, never throwing out an idle, vile, or vain word. The most part of his lands he distributed to the use of his brethren, and committed the rest to the guiding of his servants and officers, whereby he might the more quietly give himself up to his godly study, as to a continual Sabbath rest. This was about the latter end of king Henry's reign, and continued in the time of king Edward VI.

After this in the persecuting days of queen Mary, as soon as the bishop of Coventry heard of his fame, and of his being so ardent and zealous in the gospel of Christ, he immediately wrote a letter to the mayor and officers of Coventry to apprehend him as soon as possible. But by the good providence of God, it happened otherwise: for God disposeth all things after his own secret pleasure, who seeing his old and trusty servant so many years with so extreme and many torments broken and dried up, would in no wise heap too many sorrows upon one poor silly wretch: neither would he commit him to the flames of fire, who had been already baked and scorched with the sharp fires of inward affliction, and had sustained so many burning darts and conflicts of Satan so many years: God therefore, of his divine providence, thinking it too much that one man should be so overcharged with so many plagues and torments, did graciously provide, that Robert his brother being both stronger in body, and also better furnished with helps of learning to answer the adversaries, (being a Master of Arts in Cambridge) should sustain that conflict, and even so it came to pass.

For as soon as the mayor of Coventry had received the bishop's letters for the apprehending of Mr. John Glover, he forthwith sent private notice to the said John to convey himself away: who with his brother William was not so soon departed out of his house, but that yet, in the sight of the sheriff and others, the searchers came and rushed in to take him, according to the bishop's order.

But when the person they sought for could not be found, one of the officers going into an upper chamber, found there Robert the other brother lying on his bed, who had been long sick; and was by him immediately brought before the sheriff. Which sheriff, notwithstanding, favouring Robert and his cause, would indeed fain have dismissed him, and wrought what means he could, saying, that he was not the man for whom they were sent: yet nevertheless, being terrified with the threats of the officer, contending with him to have him detained till the bishop's coming, he was constrained to carry him against his will, and so laid him fast till the bishop came. And thus much by way of preamble, concerning the worthy remembrance of Mr. John Glover.

Now to enter upon the matter which principally we have in hand, that is, to consider the story and martyrdom of Mr. Robert Glover; as the whole narration was sent in a letter of his own writing to his wife, concerning the manner of his being handled; therefore it seemeth best, for the more credit of the matter, to exhibit his own letter, the contents of which are as follow.

LETTER

From Mr. ROBERT GLOVER to his WIFE, containing the whole DESCRIPTION of his TROUBLES.

THE peace of conscience with passeth all understanding, the sweet consolation, comfort, strength, and boldness of the Holy Ghost, be continually increased in your heart, through a fervent, earnest, and stedfast faith in our most dear and only Saviour Jesus Christ, Amen.

I thank you heartily (most loving wife) for your letters sent to me in my imprisonment. I read them with tears more than once or twice; with tears (I say) for joy and gladness, that God had wrought in you so merciful a work; first, an unfeigned repentance; secondly, an humble and hearty reconciliation; thirdly, a voluntary submission and obedience to the will of God in all things. Which when I read in your letters, and judged them to proceed from the bottom of your heart, I could not but be thankful to God, rejoicing with tears for you, and these his great mercies poured upon you.

These your letters, and the hearing of your most godly proceedings and constant doings from time to time, much relieved and comforted me at all times, and shall be a goodly testimony with you at the great day, against many worldly and dainty dames, who set more by their own pleasure and self in this world, than by God's glory, little regarding (as it appeareth) the everlasting health of their own souls or others. My prayer shall be whilst I am in this world, that God, which of his great mercy hath begun his good work in you, will finish it to the glory of his name; and by the mighty power and inspiration of his Holy Spirit, so strengthen, establish, and confirm you in all his ways to the end, that we may together shew forth his praises in the world to come, to our unspeakable consolation everlastingly, Amen.

So long as God shall lend you continuance in this miserable world, above all things give yourself continually to prayer, lifting up, as St. Paul saith, clean or pure hands without anger, wrath, or doubting, forgiving (as he saith also) if you have any thing against any man, as Christ forgiveth us. And that we may be the better willing to forgive, it is good often to call to remembrance the multitude and greatness of our sins, which Christ daily and hourly pardoneth and forgiveth us; and then we shall, as St. Peter affirmeth, be ready to cover and hide the offences of our brethren, be they ever so many. And because God's word teacheth us, not only the true manner of praying, but also what we ought to do, or not to do in the whole discourse and practice of this life, what pleaseith or displeaseth God, and that, as Christ saith, "The word of God that he hath spoken, shall judge in the last day;" let your prayer be to this end especially, That God of his great mercy would open and reveal more and more daily to your heart, the true sense, knowledge, and understanding of his most holy word, and give you grace in your living to express the fruits thereof.

And forasmuch as it is, as the Holy Ghost calleth it, the word of affliction, that is, it is seldom without hatred, persecution, peril, danger of loss of life and goods, and whatsoever seemeth pleasant in this world, as experience teacheth you in this time; call upon God continually for his assistance always, as Christ teacheth, casting your accounts what it is like to cost you, endeavouring yourself, through the help of the Holy Ghost, by continuance of prayer, to lay your foundation so sure, that no storm or tempest shall be able to overthrow or cast it down; remembering always (as Christ saith) Lot's wife; that is, to beware of looking back to that thing that displeaseth God. And because nothing displeaseth God so much as idolatry, that is, false worshipping of God, otherwise than his word commandeth; look not back (I say) nor turn your face to their idolatrous and blasphemous mass, manifestly against the word, practice, and example of Christ; as it is most manifest to all that have any taste of the true understanding of God's word, that there remaineth nothing in the church of England at this present, profitable or edifying to the church and congregation of the Lord, all things being done in an unknown tongue, contrary to the express commandment of the Holy Ghost.

They object that they be the church, and therefore they must be believed. My answer was, The church of God knoweth and acknowledgeth no other head but Jesus Christ the Son of God, whom ye have refused, and chosen the man of sin, the son of perdition, enemy to Christ, the devil's deputy and lieutenant, the pope.

Christ's church heareth, teacheth, and is ruled by his word, as he saith, "My sheep hear my voice. If you abide in me, and my word in you, you be my disciples." Their church repelleth God's words, and forceth all men to follow their traditions.

Christ's church dare not add or diminish, alter or change his blessed testament; but they be not afraid to take away all that Christ instituted, and go a whoring (as the scripture saith) with their own inventions, to glory and rejoice in the works of their own hands.

The church of Christ is, hath been, and shall be in all ages under the cross, persecuted, molested, and afflicted, the world ever hating them, because they be not of the world. But these persecute, murder, slay, and kill such as profess the true doctrine of Christ, be they in learning, living, conversation, and other virtues ever so excellent.

Christ and his church reserved the trial of their doctrine to the word of God, and gave the people leave to judge thereof by the same word, "Search the scriptures." But this church taketh away from the people and suffereth neither learned nor unlearned to examine or prove their doctrine by the word of God.

The true church of God laboureth by all means to resist and withstand the lusts, desires, and motions of the world, the flesh, and the devil: these for the most part give themselves to all voluptuousness, and secretly commit such things, which (as St. Paul saith) it is a shame to speak of.

By these and such like manifest probations, they declare themselves to be none of the church of Christ, but rather of the synagogue of Satan. It shall be good for you oftentimes to confer and compare their proceedings and doings with the practice of those whom the word of God doth teach to have been true members of the church of God, and it shall work in you by knowledge, erudition, and boldness, to withstand and suffering their doings. I likened them therefore to Nimrod, whom the scripture calleth a mighty hunter, or a stout champion, telling them, that that which they could not have by the word, they would have by the sword, and be the church whether men will or no; as called them with good conscience, as Christ called the forefathers, the children of the devil; and as the father the devil is a liar and a murderer, so their kingdom and church (as they call it) standeth by lying and murdering.

Have no fellowship with them therefore, my dear wife, nor with their doctrine and traditions, lest you be partaker of their sins, for whom is reserved a heavy damnation, without speedy repentance. Beware of such as shall advertise you to bear with the world for season as they do. There is no dallying with God's matters: "It is a fearful thing (as St. Paul saith) to fall into the hands of the living God." Remember the prophet Elias. "Why halt ye on both sides?" Remember what Christ saith, "He that putteth his hands to the plough, and looketh back, is not worthy of me." As seeing God hath hitherto allowed you as a good soldier in the fore front, play not the coward, neither draw back to the rearward. St. John numbereth among them that shall dwell in the fiery lake, such as be fearful of God's cause. Set always before your eyes the example of such as have behaved themselves boldly in God's cause, as Stephen, Peter, Paul, Daniel, the three children, the widow's sons, and in your days Anne Askew, Laurence Saunders, John Bradford, with many other faithful witnesses of Christ. "Be afraid in nothing (saith St. Paul) of the adversaries of Christ's doctrine, which is to them the sign of perdition, but to you of eternal salvation." Christ commandeth the same, saying, "Fear them not." Let us not follow the example of him which asketh time first to take leave of his friends. If we so do, we shall find few of them that will encourage us to go forward in our business, please it God ever so much. We do not read that James, John, Andrew and Simon, when they were called, put off the time till they had known their fathers or friends' pleasure. But the scripture saith, "They forsook all and by and by followed Christ." Christ likened the kingdom of God to a precious pearl, which whosoever findeth, selleth all that he hath to buy it. Yea, who ever hath but a little taste or glimmering how precious a treasure the kingdom of heaven is, will gladly forego both life and goods for the obtaining of it. But the most part now-a-days are like Esop's cock, which when he had found a precious stone, wished rather to have found a barley corn. So ignorant are they how precious a jewel the word of God is, that they chuse rather the things of this world, which being compared to it, are less in value than a barley-corn.

If I would have given place to worldly reasons, they might have moved me: first, the leaving of you and my children; the consideration of the state of my children being yet tender of age, and young, apt and able to virtue and learning, and so having the need of my assistance, being not altogether destitute of gifts to help them withal; possessions above the common sort of men; because I was never called to be a preacher or minister; and (because of my sickness) of death in imprisonment before I should come to answer, and so my death to be unprofitable. But these and such like, I thank my heavenly Father, for his infinite mercy inspired me with his Holy Spirit, for his Son's sake, my only Saviour and Redeemer, prevailed not in me: but when I had by the wonder-permission of God fallen into their hands, at the first of the sheriff, nature a little abashed; yet before I came to the prison, by the working of God, and through his goodness, fear departed. I said to the sheriff at his coming to me, What matter have you, Mr. Sheriff, to charge me withal? He answered, You shall know when you come before the masters; and so taking with him, I expected to have been carried before the masters, and to have heard what they could have burdened me withal: but, contrary to my expectation, I was committed forthwith to the gaol, not being called to my answer, little justice being shewed therein. But let's justice a man findeth at their hands, the more consolation in conscience shall he find from God; for whoever is of the world, the world will love him. After I came into prison, and had reposed myself a while, I wept for joy and gladness, my belly-full, singing much of the great mercies of God, and (as it were) saying to myself after this sort: O Lord, who am I on whom thou shouldst bestow this thy great mercy, to be numbered among the saints that suffer for the gospel's sake? And so beholding and considering on the one side my imperfection, unability, sinful misery, and unworthiness, and on the other side the greatness of thy mercy, to be called to so high promotion, I was, I were, amazed and overcome for a while with joy and gladness, concluding thus with myself in my heart; O Lord, thou shewest power in weakness, wisdom in foolishness, mercy in sinfulness; who shall hinder thee these where and whom thou wilt? As I have zealously loved the confession of thy word, so I ever thought myself to be most unworthy to be partaker of the affliction for the same.

Not long after Mr. W. Brasbridge, Mr. C. Phineas, Mr. N. Hopkins, came unto me, persuading with me to be dismissed upon bonds. To whom my answer (to my remembrance) after this sort: Forasmuch as the masters have imprisoned me, having nothing to burden me withal; if I should enter into bonds, I should in so doing accuse myself; and seeing they lay no matter to my charge, they may as well let me pass without bonds as with them.

Secondly, If I shall enter bonds, covenant and promise to appear, I shall do nothing but excuse, colour, cloak their wickedness, and endanger myself needlessly, being bound by my promise to appear. I refused many worldly persuasions to me to avoid the present peril, and also how to avoid the forfeiture if I broke my promise. I said unto them, I had cast up pennyworth by God's help. They undertook also to make the bond easy.

And when they were somewhat importunate, I said to Mr. Hopkins, That liberty of conscience was a precious thing; and took, as it were, a pause, lifting up my heart to God earnestly for his aid and help, that I might do the thing that might please him. And so when they had let their suit fall, my heart (methought) wonderfully comforted. Mr. Dudley communed with me in like manner; whom I answered in effect as I did before.

Afterwards debating the matter with myself, these considerations came into my head; I have from time to time lived with good conscience (God I take to record) of all such as I had conference withal to be no dalers in God's matters, but to shew themselves, after so much light and knowledge, hearty, earnest, constant, and stable in so manifest a truth, and not to give place for contrary to the same. Now thought I, if I shall withdraw myself, and make any shifts to pull my own neck out of the collar, I shall give great offence to my weak brethren in Christ, and advantage to the enemies to slander God's word: It will be said, He hath encouraged others to be earnest and fervent, to fear no worldly perils or dangers, but he himself will give no such example.

Wherefore I thought it my bounden duty, both to God and man, being (as it were) by the great goodness of God marvellously called and appointed hereto, to set aside all fear, perils and dangers, all worldly respects and considerations, and like as I had heretofore, according to the measure of my small gift within the compass of my vocation and calling, from the bottom of my heart unfeignedly moved, exhorted, and persuaded all that profess God's word, manfully to persist in the defence of the same, not with sword and violence, but with suffering and loss of life; rather than to defile themselves again with the whorish abomination of the Romish Antichrist; so the hour being come, with my fact and example to ratify, confirm, and protest the same to the hearts of all true believers: and to this end, by the mighty assistance of God's Holy Spirit, I resolved myself with much peace of conscience, willingly to sustain whatsoever the Romish Antichrist should do against me, and the rather, because I understood the bishop's coming to be at hand, and considered that poor men's consciences would then be sharply assaulted. So I remained prisoner in Coventry for the space of ten or eleven days, being never called to my answer by the masters, contrary to the laws of the realm, they having neither statute, law, proclamation, letter, warrant, nor commandment for my apprehension. They would have laid all the matter upon the sumner; who being examined, denied it before their faces, as one of my friends told me, saying, that he had no commandment concerning me, but for my elder brother. God lay not their extreme doings against me to their charge at the great day.

The second day after the bishop's coming to Coventry, Mr. Warren came to the Guildhall, and ordered the chief jailor to carry me to the bishop. I laid to Mr. Warren's charge the cruel seeking of my death; and when he would have excused himself, I told him he could not wipe his hands so; he was as guilty of my blood before God, as though he had murdered me with his own hands.

And so he departed from me, saying, I needed not to fear if I would be of his belief. God open his eyes if it be his will, and give him grace to believe this, which he and all of his inclination shall find (I fear) too true for their parts; that is, that all they which cruelly, maliciously, and spitefully persecute, molest, and afflict the members of Christ for their conscience sake, and for the true testimony of Christ's word, and cause them most unjustly to be slain and murdered, without speedy repentance shall dwell with the devil and his angels in the fierce lake everlastingly, where they shall wish and desire, cry and call, but in vain (as their right companion did) to be refreshed by them whom in this world they contemned, despised, disdained, as slaves, misers, and wretches.

When I came before the bishop in Mr. Denton's house, he began with this protestation, That he was my bishop for lack of a better, and willed me to submit myself.

I said to him, I am not come to accuse myself, what have you to lay to my charge?

He asked me, whether I was learned? I answered, Smallly learned.

Mr. Chancellor standing by, said I was a master of arts.

Then my lord laid to my charge my not coming to the church.

Here I might have dallied with him, and put him to his proofs, forasmuch as I had not been in his diocese for a long season, neither was any of the citizens able to prove any such matter against me. Notwithstanding, I answered him through God's merciful help, that I neither had, nor would come to their church, as long as their mass was used there, to save (if I had them) five hundred hundred lives. I desired him to shew me one jot or tittle in the scriptures for the proof and defence of the same.

He answered, he came to teach, and not to be taught.

I was content (I told him) to learn of him, so far as he was able to teach me by the word of God.

Bishop. Who shall judge the word?

Glover. Christ was willing that the people should judge his doctrine by searching the scriptures, and so was Paul; methinks you should claim no further privilege nor pre-eminence than they had.

Thus spake Robert Glover, offering him further, that he was content that the primitive church next to the apostles' time, should judge between the bishop and him. But the bishop refused that. Then he said, he was his bishop, and therefore he must believe him.

Glover. If you will be believed because you are a bishop, why find you fault with the people that believed bishop Latimer, bishop Ridley, and bishop Hooper, and the residue of them that were bishops?

Bishop. Because they were heretics.

Glover. And may not you err as well as they? I expected my lord to use some learned arguments to persuade me, but instead of that, he oppressed me only with his authority. He said, I dissented from the church, and asked me where my church was before king Edward's time?

I desired him to shew me where their church was in Elias's time, and what outward shew it had in Christ's time.

Bishop. Elias's complaint was only of the ten tribes that fell from David's house, whom he called heretics.

Glover. You be not able to shew any prophets that the other two tribes had at that same time.

My lord making no answer to that, Mr. Rogers, one of the masters of the city, cometh in the mean season, taking upon him as though he would answer to the text. But my lord forthwith commanded me to be committed to some tower, if they had any besides the common jail, saying, he would at the end of the visitation of his diocese, weed out such wolves. Mr. Rogers willed him to content himself for that night, till they had taken further order for me. Even where it pleaseth you, said I to my lord, I am content; and so I was returned at that time to the common jail again from whence I came.

On the Friday morning, being the next day, I had warning by one of the prisoners to prepare myself to ride with my fellow-prisoners the same day to Litchfield, there to be bestowed at the bishop's pleasure. Which tidings at first somewhat discouraged me, fearing lest I should by means of my great sickness, through hard usage, (which I expected) have died in prison before I should come to answer: but immediately with God's word, I rebuked this infidelity in myself, and by the same corrected mine own distrust in the following manner. What make I of God? Is not his power as great in Litchfield as in Coventry? Doth not his power extend as well to Litchfield as to Coventry? Was he not with Habakkuk, Daniel, Meshach, and Jeremy, in their most dangerous imprisonments? He knoweth what things we have need of. He hath numbered all the hairs of our head. The sparrow falleth not to the ground, without our heavenly Father's will; much more will he care for us if we be not faithless, whom he hath made worthy to be witnesses of his truth. So long as we put our trust in him, we shall never be destitute of his help, neither in prison, in sickness, nor in health, neither in life, nor in death, neither before kings, bishops, or the devil himself, much less one of his ministers shall be able to prevail against us. With such meditations I grew cheerful, of good consolation and comfort: so that hearing one say that they could not provide horses enough for us, I said, Let them carry us in a dung-cart for lack of horses, if they please, I am willing for my part.

Notwithstanding, at the request of my friends, I wrote to Mr. Mayor, and his brethren, briefly requiring them that I might make answer here to such things as should be laid to my charge: the contents of which were to this purpose.

"I beseech you to understand, that it is not known, as well to the keeper of the jail, as to the inhabitants about me where I dwell, that I am a subject to very great sickness, and have been for the space of seven years and more, so that it is not likely that I should be removed without great peril and danger of life. And because I was here committed ward by your appointment, I would gladly here answer to such things as should be laid to my charge. If I may obtain this of you, I have cause thankfully to acknowledge your indifferency; if otherwise, I pray God it be not laid to your charge at the great day, when every man shall have just judgment without respect of persons."

But receiving no answers to my letters, I conjectured that when the bishop and the chancellor had seen the copy, they moved them rather to have me away, being more desirous (as I suppose) to have had me dispatched privily in prison, than to bring me openly to my answer, as did in some measure appear by the treatment I received with at my first coming to prison.

Certain serjeants and constables of Coventry being appointed to have the conveying of us to Litchfield, were delivered there to one Jephcot, the chancellor's servant from Coventry with us for the same purpose. We were commanded to be on horseback about eleven or twelve o'clock on Friday, being a market day, that might be the more gazed at: and to set the people's hearts more against us, they did proclaim a letter concerning a proclamation made for calling in, and annulling of all such books as truly expound and interpret the scriptures. We came to Litchfield about three o'clock, and had leave to repose ourselves for some time. We put up at the sign of the Swan, where we were entertained friendly and gently.

After supper Jephcot repaired to us, whom we treated that upon former liberties we might rest ourselves that night, being unprovided of any thing to help ourselves withal in the prison at that present. He seemed willing at first, but afterwards (whether by persuasion, but I rather suppose out of policy, till he could gather a multitude to stare and gaze upon us, and also that we should provide nothing to ease ourselves withal) he revoked his promise, and so by consent we were carried to prison, in the sight of a great multitude of people. I desired Jephcot before to execute his office with mercy, telling him, that they should have judgment without mercy, that shewed no mercy. This mercy I found at his hand.

He put me into a prison that same night, where I continued till I was condemned, in a place next to a dungeon, where was small room, strong building, very cold, with little light; and there he allowed me a bundle of straw instead of my bed, with some chairs, form, or any thing else to ease myself with. God of his mercy gave me great patience through prayer that night, so that if it had been his pleasure, I could have been contented to have ended my life. Jephcot, and one Persey, the bishop's man, who afterwards was my continual keeper for the most part, came to me in the morning, to whom I said, This is a great extremity, God send us patience, and no more.

Then they were content that I should have a book of my own procuring. But I was allowed no help, neither night nor day, nor company of any man, notwithstanding my great sickness; nor yet paper, pen, ink, or books, except my New Testament in Latin, and a Prayer-book which I privily stole in.

Within two days after, Mr. Chancellor and Mr. Temsey, a prebendary there, came to me into my prison. Mr. Chancellor exhorted me to conform myself to my lord and to the church. He wished not more hurt to my soul than he did to his own; belike because I had laid to his charge at Coventry the seeking of blood unjustly and wrongfully.

Now thus the second time I answered Mr. Chan-his exhortation, That I refused not to be ruled by the church, that was content to be ordered and governed by the word of God.

Chancellor. How know you the word of God, but by the church?

The church sheweth which is the word of God: therefore the church is above the word of God: is no good reason in learning, said I to Mr. Chancellor. For it is like unto this; John shewed the people who was Christ: Therefore John was above Christ. I have a man that knoweth not the king, and him who was the king, am I therefore above the king?

Mr. Chancellor said, he came not to reason with me, so departed. And I remained for the space of eight days without any further conference with any man, till the bishop's coming: in which time I gave myself continually to prayer, and meditation of the merciful promises of God made unto all, without exception of person, that call upon the name of his dear Son Jesus Christ. I found in myself daily amendment of health and body, increase of peace in conscience, and many consolations from God, by the help of his Holy Spirit, sometimes as it were a taste and glimmering of the glory to come; all for his only Son Jesus Christ's sake: him be all praise for ever and ever.

The enemy ceased not many times sundry ways to tempt me, often objecting to my conscience mine own unworthiness, through the greatness of the benefit to be obtained among the number of them that should suffer for Christ, for his gospel's sake. Against him I replied in the word of God on this sort, What were all those whom God hath chosen from the beginning to be his witnesses, and to carry his name before the world? were they not men, as Paul and Barnabas said, as well subject to wickedness, sin, and imperfections, as other? Even such were Noah, Abraham, David, and Christ, "who gave first unto him," as Paul saith. I also speaking to every man, "Whast hast thou, that thou receivest not? Likewise John, "All have received of his fulness:" they were no bringers of any goodness to God, but altogether receivers. They chose God first, but he chose them. They loved not God, but he loved them first. Yea, he both loved and saved them when they were his enemies, full of sin and corruption, and void of all goodness. He is, and will be, the same God, as rich in mercy, as mighty, as ready, as willing to forgive sins without respect of persons, to the world's end, of all them that call upon him. "The Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon him: to all that call upon him in truth." God is near, he is at hand, he is with all, with all I say, refuseth none, excepteth none that faithfully in true confidence call upon him, in what hour, what place, at what time soever it be. It is no arrogancy nor presumption in any man, to burthen God (as it were) with his promise, and of duty to claim and challenge his aid, and assistance in all our perils, dangers, and difficulties, calling upon him, not in the confidence of our own godliness, but in the trust of his promises made in Christ, in whom, and by whom, and for whose sake, we ever boldly approacheth to the mercy-seat of the Father, is sure to receive whatsoever is expedient or necessary, either for body or soul, in a more bountiful manner, than he can well wish, or dare desire. His word cannot lie, "Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will hear thee, and thou shalt praise me."

I answered the enemy also on this manner; I am a sinner, and therefore unworthy to be a witness of this gospel. What then? Must I deny his word, because I am not worthy to profess it? What bring I to pass in professing, but add sin to sin? What is greater sin than to deny the truth of Christ's gospel? As Christ himself saith with witness, "He that is ashamed of me or of my gospel, of him also will I be ashamed before my Father and his angels." I might also, for the like reason, refuse obedience to any of God's commandments.

When I am provoked to pray, the enemy may say, I am not worthy to pray, therefore I shall not pray, and so in like manner of all the commandments,

I shall not forbear swearing, stealing, or murdering, because I am not worthy to keep any commandment of God. These be the delusions of the devil, and Satan's suggestions, which must be overcome by continual prayer, and with the word of God applied according to the measure of every man's gift, against all assaults of the devil.

At the bishop's first coming to Litchfield, after mine imprisonment, I was called into a bye chamber next to my prison, to my lord. Before whom when I came, and saw none but his officers, chaplains, and servants, except it were an old priest, I was partly amazed, and lifted up my heart to God for his merciful help and assistance.

My lord asked me how I liked my imprisonment; I gave him no answer touching that question. He proceeded to persuade me to be a member of his church, which had continued so many years. As for your church (said he to me), it was not known but lately in Edward's time.

I profess myself to be a member of that church (said I) that is built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the head corner-stone; and so alledged the place of St. Paul to the Ephesians. And this church hath been from the beginning (said I), though it bear no glorious shew before the world, being ever, for the most part, under the cross and affliction, contemned, despised, and persecuted. My lord contended on the other side, that they were the church.

So cried all the clergy (said I) against the prophets of Jerusalem, saying, "The church of the Lord, the church of the Lord." And always when I was about to speak any thing, my lord cried, Hold thy peace, I command thee by the virtue of thy obedience to hold thy peace, calling me a proud arrogant heretic.

I desired my lord to lay something to my charge in particular, and then to convince me with some scriptures and good learning.

Then my lord began to move certain questions. I refused to answer him in corners, requiring that I might make my answer openly. He said I should answer him there. I stood with him upon that point till he said I should go to prison again, and there have neither meat nor drink till I had answered him.

Then I lifted up my heart to God, that I might stand and agree with the doctrine of his most holy word.

The first question was this, How many sacraments Christ instituted to be used in the church?

The sacrament of baptism, said I, and the sacrament that he instituted at his last supper.

No more? said he.

The said I, To all those that declare a true and unfeigned repentance, a sure hope, trust and confidence in the death of Christ, to such, ministers (I grant) have authority to pronounce, by the authority of God's word, the remission of sins.

Here interrupting me, he would needs bear me in hand that I called this a sacrament. I would not greatly contend with him in that point, because the matter was of no great weight or importance; although he in so doing did me wrong, for I called it not a sacrament.

He asked me further, Whether I allowed their confession?

I answered, No.

Then the bishop would know my mind what I thought of the presence of Christ's body in the sacrament.

I answered, That their mass was neither sacrifice nor sacrament, because (said I) you have taken away the true institution, which when you restore again, I will tell you my judgment concerning Christ's body in the sacrament.

And thus much did this worthy martyr of God leave behind him in his own hand-writing, concerning the manner of his usage in prison, and also of his disputes with the bishop and his chancellor. More examinations he had (no doubt) with the bishop in the public consistory, when he was brought forth to be condemned, which he would also have left unto us, if either length of life, or leisure of time, or haste of execution, had permitted.

permitted him to finish what he intended; but by reason of the writ of his burning being come down from London, want of time did neither serve him so to do, neither yet could I get the records of his last examination, wheresoever they are become.

Only this which I could learn by the relation of one Augustine Bernher, a minister, and a familiar friend of his, concerning the going to his death, I can report; that the said Mr. Robert Glover, after he was condemned by the bishop, and was now at a point to be delivered out of this world, it so happened, that two or three days before, his heart being heavy, and desolate of all spiritual consolation, felt in himself no aptness or willingness, but rather a heaviness and dulness of spirit, full of much discomfort to bear the bitter cross of martyrdom ready to be laid upon him.

Whereupon fearing in himself lest the Lord had utterly withdrawn his wonted favour from him, made his moan to this Augustine, his friend above-mentioned, signifying unto him how earnestly he had prayed day and night unto the Lord, and yet could receive no motion nor sense of any comfort from him.

Unto whom the said Augustine answering again, desired him patiently to wait the Lord's pleasure, and howsoever his present feeling was, yet seeing his cause was just and true, he exhorted him constantly to stick to the same, and to play the man, nothing misdoubting but the Lord in his good time would visit him, and satisfy his desire with plenty of consolation; whereof (he said) he was right certain and sure; and therefore desired him, whensoever any such feeling of God's heavenly mercies should begin to touch his heart, that then he should shew some signification thereof, whereby he might witness with him the same, and so departed from him.

The next day, when the time came of his martyrdom, as he was going to the place, and was come within sight of the stake, (although all the night before praying for strength and courage he could feel none) suddenly he was so mightily replenished with God's holy comfort and heavenly joys, that he cried out, clapping his hands, to Austin, and saying these words, "Austin, he is come, he is come," &c. and that with such joy and alacrity, as one seeming rather to be risen from some deadly danger to liberty and life, than as one passing out of the world by any pains of death. Such was the change of the marvellous working of the Lord's hand upon that good man.

AN ACCOUNT of CORNELIUS BUNGEY, FELLOW-MARTYR with Mr. ROBERT GLOVER.

IN the same fire with Mr. Glover, Cornelius Bungey, of Coventry, was likewise burnt, who was condemned by the said bishop of Coventry and Litchfield. As concerning the articles which were objected to him, the effect thereof was this.

First, It was objected against him, that these three years last, in the city of Coventry and Litchfield, and places thereabout, he did hold, maintain, argue, and teach, that the priest hath no power here to absolve any sinner from his sins.

Secondly, That by baptism sins are not washed away, because he said that the washing of the flesh purgeth the flesh outwardly, and not the soul.

Thirdly, That there be in the church only two sacraments, that is, baptism, and the Lord's supper.

Fourthly, That in the sacrament of the popish altar, was not the real body and blood of Christ, but the substance of bread and wine there remaining still, because St. Paul calleth it bread and wine, &c.

Fifthly, That he, within the compass of the said years and time, did hold, maintain, and defend, that the pope is not the head of the visible church here on earth, &c.

Sixthly, That he was of the diocese and jurisdiction of the bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, &c.

Seventhly, That the premises are true, manifest, and notorious, and that upon the same there hath been is a public voice and fame, as well in the places above rehearsed, as in other quarters also about, &c.

To which articles he answered again:

To the first he granted, and to every part thereof meaning after the popish manner of absolution.

To the second he granted first, after revoked the same.

To the third also he granted, adding withal, that scripture there is no more contained.

To the fourth touching the sacrament, he granted and to every part thereof.

To the fifth, concerning the pope, likewise.

Also to the sixth he granted; and likewise to the seventh.

Upon these articles and his answers to the same, the said Radulph, the bishop, read the sentence, and committed him also, after condemnation of Mr. Robert Glover, to the secular power.

Thus this aforesaid Cornelius, falsely condemned by the bishop before-mentioned, suffered at the same place with the christian martyr, Mr. Robert Glover, at Coventry, about the 20th of September.

The HISTORY of JOHN GLOVER, and WILLIAM GLOVER, who were excommunicated after their Death, and buried in the FIELDS.

JOHN and William Glover, the two brothers Robert Glover, the martyr, ought not to be omitted in this history, although they were not called to finish their course in fire, as their brother, and other martyrs were; yet they were cast out of the church, and excommunicated even after they were dead, and denied christian burial.

And first concerning Mr. John Glover, the elder brother, what inward storms and agonies he sustained the ghostly enemy, you have partly heard before: now what his bodily enemies wrought against him, remaineth to be declared. Whose rage and malice, although God restrained, that they could not prevail against him so long as life endured, yet after decease, having power upon him, what they did shall now understand.

Whereupon the sheriffs, with their under officers and servants, being sent to seek him, came into his house where he and his wife were. It chanced as he was in the chamber by himself, the officers bursting into the house, and searching other rooms, came to the chamber where John Glover was, who being within, holding the latch softly in his hand, perceived and heard the officers bustling about the door, amongst whom of the said officers having the string in his hand, ready to draw and pluck at the same.

In the mean time another coming by, (whose name he heard and knew) bade them come away, saying, I had been there before. Whereupon they departed thence, went to search other corners of the house, where they found Agnes Glover his wife, who being carried to Litchfield, and there examined before the bishop length after much ado, was constrained to give place to their tyranny. John Glover, in the mean time partly for care of his wife, partly through cold raised in the woods where he did lie, took an ague, whereof not long after, he left this life, which the cruel party so long had sought for.

Thus by the mighty protection of the Almighty Lord how John Glover was delivered and defended from the hands of the persecuting enemies during all the time of his life, you have heard. Now what befel after the time of his death, both to him and his brother William, is worthy to be remembered. After he was buried in the church-yard, without priest, or clerk, Dr. Dracot, then chancellor, six weeks after, sent the parson of the town, and demanded how it happened that he was there buried. The parson answered that he was then sick, and knew not of it. Then the chancellor commanded the parson to go home, cause the body of the said John Glover to be taken and to be cast over the wall into the high-way: the parson again answered, that he had been six weeks in the earth, and so smelled, that none were able to bury it. Well, quoth Dr. Dracot, then take this, and pronounce him in the pulpit a damned soul; a twelvemonth after take up his bones, (for then flesh will be consumed) and cast them over the wall, that the carts and horses may tread upon them, then I will come and hallow again that place in the church-yard where he was buried. Recorded by the parson of the town, who told the same to Hugh Burrows, dwelling at Fynden, in Derbyshire, and to Mr. Robert Glover's wife, by whose credible information I received the same.

Not much unlike usage was practised also by these catholic children of the mother church, upon the body of William, the third brother, whom, after it had pleased almighty God about the same season to call out of this life of misery, the well-disposed people of the town of Weme, in Shropshire, where he died, brought the body to the parish church, intending there to have it buried. One Bernard, being then curate of the said church, in order to stop the burial thereof, rode to the bishop named Ralph Baine, to certify him of the matter, and to have his advice therein. In the meantime, the body lying there a whole day, in the meantime one Richard Morice, a taylor, would have buried him. But then came John Thorlyne, of Weme, with some others, of Weme, and would not suffer the body to be buried; expressing to us the contrary examples of good Tobit; for as he was religious in burying the dead, so this man's religion consists in not burying the dead; so that after he had lain there two days and one night, the aforesaid Bernard, the curate, with the bishop's letter, the contents of which after being copied out word for word, here follow.

COPY of the BISHOP's LETTER written to the PARISH of WEME.

UNDERSTANDING that one Glover an heretic is dead in the parish of Weme, which Glover hath, at the time of my being in this country, been known for a rebel against our holy faith and religion, a contemner of the holy sacraments and ceremonies used in the holy church, and hath separated himself from the holy communion of all good christian men, and never required to be reconciled to our mother holy church, nor in his last days did call for his spiritual father, but died without the sacraments belonging to a christian man; I thought it good not only to command the curate of Weme, that he should not be honoured with christian burial, but also will and command all the parish of Weme, that no man procure to bury nor speak to have him buried in holy ground: I do charge and command the church-wardens of Weme in special, and all the parish of the same, that they assist the said curate in defending and hindering, and procuring that he be not buried in the church, or within the walls of the church-yard: and likewise I charge those that brought the body to the place to carry away again, and that at their charge, as they will answer at their peril. At Ecclesch, this sixth of September, 1555.

By your Ordinary, RADULPH, COVENTRY and LITCHFIELD.

By virtue of this aforesaid letter, so it fell out, that they who brought the corps thither, were obliged to carry it back again at their own charges. But as the body was corrupted, and smelt so strong that no man could well come near it, they were forced to draw it with horses into a broom-field, and there he was buried. The like example of charitable affection in these catholic churchmen, is also to be seen and noted in the burying of one Edward Burton, Esq. who in the same month of Chester, departing out of this world the very day before queen Elizabeth was crowned, required of his friends, as they would answer for it, that his body should be buried in his parish church, (which was St. Chad's, in Shrewsbury) so that no mass-monger should be present thereat. Which thing being declared to the curate of that parish, named John Marshall, and the body being withal brought to the burial, upon the same day when the queen was crowned, the curate being therewith offended, said plainly, that he should not be buried in the church there. Whereupon one of the friends of the deceased, named George Torpelley, answering again, said, That God would judge him in the last day, &c. Then said the priest, Judge God or devil, the body shall not come there. And so they buried him in his own garden, where he is no doubt as near the kingdom of heaven as if he had been buried in the midst of the church.

Moreover, in the said county of Salop, I find that one Oliver Richardine, of the parish of Whitchurch, was burnt in Hartford-west, sir John Yonge being sheriff the same time, which seemeth to be about the last year of king Henry the eighth. Whose name, as it was not mentioned before, I thought here to give some little touch of him, having now in hand to speak of the persecution within the diocese of Coventry and Litchfield.

The MARTYRDOM of WILLIAM WOLSEY, and ROBERT PYGOT, PAINTER.

WILLIAM Wolsey and Robert Pygot, both inhabitants of the town of Wisbich, were the next condemned after the suffering of Robert Glover and Cornelius Bungey. These two blessed martyrs were judged and condemned at Ely, by John Fuller, the bishop's chancellor of Ely, Dr. Shaxtone, his suffragan, Robert Stewart, dean of Ely, John Christopherfon, dean of Norwich, October 9, 1555. The said William Wolsey, who was then a constable, through the means of one Richard Everard, gentleman, a justice appointed for those days, who cruelly treated the said William Wolsey, was caused to put in sureties for his good behaviour and appearance at the next general sessions held within the Isle of Ely. Being called again at the next sessions, he was still constrained to put in new sureties, which at length he refused to do, and so was committed to jail, at the assize held at Ely in Lent.

In the Easter week following, Dr. Fuller, the chancellor, with Christopherfon, and one Dr. Yong, came to confer with him, who laid earnestly to his charge that he was not of the catholic faith, desiring him to meddle no further with the scriptures, than it did become such a lay-man as he was, to do. The said William Wolsey standing still a great while, suffering them to say their pleasure, at last he answered in this wise; Good Mr. Doctor, What did our Saviour Christ mean, when he spake these words written in the 23d chapter of St. Matthew's gospel, "Woe be unto you scribes and pharisees, hypocrites; for ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men: for ye neither go in yourselves, neither suffer ye them that are entering to go in."

Yea, saith Dr. Fuller, you must understand, that Christ spake to the scribes and pharisees.

Nay, Mr. Doctor, Christ spake even to you, and your fellows here present, and to all others such as you be.

Away, Mr. Doctor, said Christopherfon, for you can do no good with this man. Yet, saith Dr. Fuller, I will leave thee a book to read, I promise thee of a learned man's doing, that is to say, of Dr. Watson's doing (who was then bishop of Lincoln).

Wolsey receiving the same book, did diligently read it over, which in many places did manifestly appear contrary to the known truth of God's word. At length, a fortnight or three weeks following, the said Dr. Fuller resorting again to the prison to confer with the said Wolsey, asked him how he liked the said book, (thinking that he had won him by the reading of the same) who answered him and said, Sir, I like the book no otherwise than I thought before I should find it. Whereupon the chancellor taking his book, departed home.

At night when Dr. Fuller came to his chamber to look on it, he found in many places, contrary to his mind, mind, the book rased with a pen by the said Wolsey. Which he seeing, and being vexed therewith, said, O this is an obstinate heretic, and hath quite marred my book.

Then the assizes to be held at Wisbich drawing nigh, Dr. Fuller cometh again to the said Wolsey, and spake unto him on this manner: Thou dost much trouble my conscience, wherefore I pray thee depart, and rule thy tongue, so that I hear no more complaint of thee, and come to the church when thou wilt, and if thou be complained upon, so far as I may, I promise thee I will not hear of it.

Mr. Doctor, said Wolsey, I was brought hither by a law, and by a law I will be delivered.

Then being brought to the sessions before named, Wolsey was laid in the castle at Wisbich, he and all his friends thinking, that he should have suffered there at that present time, but it proved otherwise.

Then Robert Pygot, the painter, being at liberty, was there presented by some evil disposed persons (sworn men as they called them) for not coming to the church.

The said Pygot being called in the sessions, would not absent himself, but there did plainly appear before sir Clement Hygham, being judge, who said unto him; Ah, are you the holy father the painter? How chance you came not to the church? Sir, quoth the painter, I am not out of the church, I trust in God.

No, sir, said the judge, this is no church, this is a hall. Yea, sir, said Pygot, I know very well it is a hall: but he that is in the true faith of Jesus Christ, is never absent, but in the church of God.

Ah, firrah, said the judge, you are too high learned for me to talk with, wherefore I will send you to them that are better learned than I, straightway commanding him to the jail where Wolsey lay. So the sessions being broke up and ended, the said Wolsey and Pygot were carried again to Ely to prison, where they both remained till the day of their death.

In the mean time some of their neighbours of Wisbich being at Ely, came to see how they did. There came hither also a chaplain of bishop Goodrick's, a Frenchman born, one Peter Valentius, who said to the said Wolsey and Pygot: My brethren, according to my office I am come to talk with you, for I have been amner here these twenty years and above. Wherefore I must desire you, my brethren, to take it in good part that I am come to talk with you, I promise you not to pull you from your faith. But I both require and desire, in the name of Jesus Christ, that you stand to the truth of the gospel and word, and I beseech the Almighty God, for his Son Jesus Christ's sake, to preserve both you and me in the same unto the end. For I know not myself (my brethren) how soon I shall be at the same point that you are. Thus with many other like words he made an end, causing all that were there present to water their cheeks, contrary to the expectation they all had of him. God be praised therefore.

Then within a short time after, Pygot and Wolsey were called to judgment about the 9th of October, before Dr. Fuller, then chancellor, with old Dr. Shaxton, Christopherfon, and others in commission, who laid earnestly to their charge for their belief in divers articles, but especially of the sacrament of the altar. Whereunto their answer was, That the sacrament of the altar was an idol, and that the natural body and blood of Christ was not present really in the sacrament; and to this opinion they said they would stick, perfectly believing the same to be no heresy that they had affirmed, but the very truth, whereunto they would stand. Then the doctors said, that they were out of the catholic faith.

Then Dr. Shaxton said unto them, Good brethren, remember yourselves, and become new men, for I myself was in this fond opinion that you are now in, but I am now become a new man.

Ah, said Wolsey, are you become a new man? Woe be to thee, thou wicked new man, for God shall justly judge thee.

Dr. Fuller then spake, saying, This Wolsey is an obstinate fellow, and one that I could never do good upon. But as for the painter, he is a man quiet and indifferent, (as far as I perceive) and is soon reformed, and may very well be delivered for any ill opinion I find in him.

Then Christopherfon called for pen and ink, and wrote these words following: I Robert Pygot do believe, that after the word of consecration spoken by the priest, there remaineth no more bread and wine, but the very body and blood of Christ really and substantially, the self-same that was born of the virgin Mary, and reading it to the painter, he said thus, Dost thou believe all this according as it is written?

No, sir, said the painter, that is your faith, and not mine.

Christopherfon. Lo, Dr. Fuller, you would have let this fellow go, he is as much an heretic as the other. And so immediately judgment was given upon them to die. Which done, after the sentence read, they were sent again to prison, where they lay till the day of their death. On which day, one Peacock, a bachelor of divinity, being appointed to preach, took his text out of the first epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, chap. v. of one that had lived inordinately by abusing his father's wife; likening the said Pygot and Wolsey to the same man, oftentimes saying, that such members must be cut off from the congregation; most maliciously reporting the said Wolsey to be clean out of the faith, and in many places quite denying the scriptures.

So his sermon being ended, the aforesaid Pygot and Wolsey were brought to the place of execution, and bound to the stake with a chain; thither came also Richard Collinson, a priest, at that time destitute of any abiding place or settled benefice, who said unto Wolsey, Brother Wolsey, the preacher hath openly reported in his sermon this day, that you are quite out of the catholic faith, and deny baptism, and that you do err in the holy scripture; wherefore I beseech you, for the clearing of my conscience, with others here present, that you declare in what place of the scripture you do err, and find fault.

Wolsey. I take the eternal and everlasting God to witness, that I do err in no part or point of God's book, the holy bible, but hold and believe in the same to be most firm and sound doctrine in all points most worthy for my salvation, and for all other christians to the end of the world. Whatsoever mine adversaries report of me, God forgive them therefore. With that came one to the fire with a great sheet full of books to burn, like as they had been New Testaments. O, said Wolsey, give me one of them, and Pygot desired another, both of them clapping them close to their breasts, saying the 106th Psalm, desiring all the people to say, Amen, and so received the fire most thankfully.

Concerning the story of William Wolsey, I received moreover from the university of Cambridge, by a credible person, and my faithful friend William Fulke, this relation, which I thought in this place not improper to be notified to the reader, in order and form as followeth.

There were two godly martyrs burnt at Ely, the one named Wolsey, the other Pygot. In these two appeared a different disposition of spirit. Pygot was mild, humble, and modest, promising that he would be conformable to his persecutors, if they could persuade him by the scripture. Wolsey was stout, strong, and vehement, as one having the fulness of the Spirit, and detested all their doing, as of whom he was sure to receive nothing but cruelty and tyranny. He was wonderfully jealous over his companion, fearing lest his gentle nature would have been overcome by the flattering enticements of the world, and therefore the same day that they were burnt when they would have talked with him alone, he pulled him away from them almost by force. He was so desirous to glorify God with his suffering, that being wonderfully sore tormented in the prison with the tooth-ach, he feared nothing more than that he should depart before the day of execution (which he called his good day) were come.

This Wolsey being in prison at Ely, was visited by Thomas Hobilo, brewer, in Ely. To him he delivered certain in money to be distributed (as he appointed) part to his wife, and part to his kinsfolks and friends, and specially six shillings and eight-pence, to be delivered to Richard Denton, a smith, dwelling at Wells, in Wiltshire, within the jurisdiction of the isle of Wight, with his commendation, that he marvelled that he was so long behind him, seeing that he was the first to deliver him the book of scripture into his hand, and told him that it was the truth, desiring him to come hither as fast as he could.

His Thomas Hodilo, both to avoid the danger of time, and to have a witness of his doings herein, delivered the said sum of money to one Mr. Lawrence, a teacher, in Essex, (who then resorted often to his house) to be distributed as Wolsey had appointed; which he performed, riding from place to place. And when his six shillings and eight-pence was delivered to Richard Denton, with the commendation aforesaid, his answer was this, I confess it is true, but alas! I cannot burn. This was almost one whole year after Wolsey was burnt. But he that could not burn for the cause of Christ, was afterwards burnt against his will, even after Christ had given peace to his church. For on Tuesday, the 18th of April, 1564, his house was set on fire, and he endeavouring to save his goods, perished in the flames, with two others that were in the same house.

Not much unlike this, was the example of Mr. West, chaplain to bishop Ridley, who refusing to die in the cause of Christ, with his master, said mass against his conscience, and died soon after.

C H A P. XII.

STORY of the LIFE, SUFFERINGS, and MARTYRDOM of BISHOP RIDLEY, and BISHOP LATIMER, with their LETTERS, &c. CHARACTER of STEPHEN GARDINER, BISHOP of WINCHESTER. — Further ACCOUNT of the EXAMINATIONS and MARTYRDOM of many PIOUS and GODLY MEN and WOMEN, during the BLOODY REIGN of QUEEN MARY I.

HISTORY of Dr. NICHOLAS RIDLEY and Mr. HUGH LATIMER, both BISHOPS, PREACHERS, and MARTYRS of CHRIST; with their CONFERENCES and SUFFERINGS described.

ON the 17th of October, 1555, (the day on which William Wolsey and Thomas Pygot suffered at) those two famous and singular captains, the principal pillars of Christ's church, Dr. Nicholas Ridley, bishop of London, and Mr. Hugh Latimer, sometime bishop of Worcester, were cruelly burnt in one fire at Oxford. Men, ever memorable for their piety, learning, and incomparable ornaments and gifts of grace, and with no less commendable sincerity of life, as the whole realm can sufficiently testify; so it needeth not greatly that we should stand exactly at this time in setting forth a full description of the same, but only to comprehend briefly in a few words, touching the order of their lives, so much as necessarily serveth to the due instruction of the reader, and maketh to the use of this present history, in declaring first their beginning and coming up, then their studies and acts in the university, their preferments also by their studies to higher dignity, at last their care and trouble in setting forth religion, and in maintaining the same to the shedding of their blood. And first to begin with the life of Dr. Ridley, whose story here ensueth.

Among many other worthy histories and notable acts such as of late days have been troubled, murdered, and martyred, for the true gospel of Christ, in queen Mary's reign, the tragical story and life of Dr. Ridley thought good to commit to writing, and leave to perpetual memory; beseeching thee (gentle reader) with care and study well to peruse, diligently to consider, and deeply to print the same in thy breast, seeing him to be a man beautified with such excellent qualities, so virtuously inspired, and godly learned, and now written up in the book of life, with the blessed saints of Almighty, crowned and enthroned amongst the glorious company of martyrs. First, descending of a noble right worshipful, he was born in the county of Northumberland, who being a child, learned his grammar with great dexterity in Newcastle, and was removed thence to the university of Cambridge, where he a short time became so famous, that for his singular talents, he was called to higher functions and offices of the university, by degrees pertaining thereunto, and was made to be head of Pembroke Hall, and there made doctor of divinity. After this, departing from thence, he travelled to Paris, and at his return was made chaplain to king Henry the eighth, and promoted afterwards by him to the bishopric of Rochester, and from thence translated to the see and bishopric of London, in king Edward's days.

In which calling and offices he so diligently applied himself by preaching and teaching the true and wholesome doctrine of Christ, that no good child was more singularly loved by his dear parents, than he by his flock and diocese. Every holiday and Sunday he preached in one place or other, except he were otherwise hindered by weighty affairs and business; to whose sermons the people resorted, swarming about him like bees, and coveting the sweet flowers and wholesome juice of the fruitful doctrine, which he did not only preach, but shewed the same by his life, as a glittering lanthorn to the eyes and senses of the blind, in such pure order and chastity of life (declining from evil desires and concupiscence) that even his very enemies could not reprove him in any one jot thereof.

Besides this, he was very well learned, his memory was great, and he of such reading withal, that of right he deserved to be compared to the best men of this our age, as his notable works, pithy sermons, and his sundry disputations in both the universities can well testify, and also his very adversaries will say the same themselves.

Besides all this, he was wise of counsel, deep of wit, and very politic in all his doings. How merciful and careful he was to reduce the obstinate papists from their erroneous opinions, and by gentleness to win them to the truth, his gentle ordering and courteous handling of Dr. Heath, late archbishop of York, being prisoner with him in king Edward's time, in his house, one year, sufficiently declareth. In fine, he was such a prelate, and in all points so good, pious and spiritual a man, that England may justly lament the loss of so worthy a treasure. And thus much concerning these public matters.

Now I will proceed something further, particularly of his person and conditions. He was a man right comely and well proportioned in all points, both in complexion and lineaments of the body. He took all things in good part, bearing no malice nor rancour from his heart, but straightways forgetting all injuries and offences done against him. He was very kind and natural to his kinsfolk, and yet not bearing with them any otherwise than right would require, giving them always for a general rule, yea, to his own brother and sister, that they doing evil should seek or look for nothing at his hand, but should be as strangers and aliens to him, and they to be his brother and sister, who used honesty and a godly trade of life.

He used all kinds of ways to mortify himself, and was much given to prayer and contemplation: for duly every morning, as soon as his apparel was put upon him, he forthwith went to his bed-chamber, and there upon his knees prayed the space of half an hour; which being done, immediately he went to his study (if no other business came to interrupt him) where he continued till ten o'clock, and then came to the common prayer, daily used in his house. The prayers being done, he went to dinner; where he used little talk, except otherwise occasion had been ministered, and then it was sober, discreet and wise, and sometimes merry, as cause required.

The dinner done, which was not very long, he used to sit an hour or thereabouts talking, or playing at the chess: that done, he returned to his study, and there would continue, except visitors, or business abroad were occasion of the contrary, until five o'clock at night, and then would come to common prayer, as in the forenoon; which being finished, he went to supper, behaving himself there as at his dinner before. After supper, recreating himself in playing at chess the space of an hour, he would then return again to his study; continuing there till eleven o'clock at night, which was his common hour of going to bed, then saying his prayers upon his knees as in the morning when he rose. Being at his manor of Fulham, as sometimes he used to be, he read daily a lecture to his family at the common prayer, beginning at the Acts of the apostles, and so going through all the epistles of St. Paul, giving to every man that could read, a New Testament, hiring them, besides, with money to learn by heart certain principal chapters, but especially the 13th chapter of the Acts of the apostles, reading also unto his household oftentimes the 101st Psalm, being marvellously careful over his family, that they might be a pattern of all virtue and honesty to others. To be short, as he was godly and virtuous himself, so nothing but virtue and godliness reigned in his house, feeding them with the food of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

Now remaineth a word or two to be declared of his gentle nature and kind behaviour to old Mrs. Bonner, mother to Dr. Bonner, sometime bishop of London, which I thought good to mention, as well for the rare clemency of Dr. Ridley, as the unworthy inhumanity and ungrateful disposition again of Dr. Bonner. Bishop Ridley being at his manor of Fulham, always sent for the said Mrs. Bonner, dwelling in a house adjoining to his house, to dinner and supper, with one Mrs. Mungey, Bonner's sister, saying, Go for my mother Bonner; who coming, was always placed in the chair at the head of the table, being so gently treated, welcomed and taken, as though she had been his own mother, being never displaced from her seat, although the king's council had been present; saying, when any of them were there, (as several times they were) By your lordship's favour, this place of right and custom is for my mother Bonner. But how well he was recompensed for this singular kindness, and gentle pity afterwards at the hands of the said Dr. Bonner, almost the least child that goeth on the ground can declare. For who afterwards was a greater enemy to Dr. Ridley than Dr. Bonner? Who went more about to seek his destruction than he? Recompensing this his gentleness with extreme cruelty; as well appeared by the strict handling of Dr. Ridley's own sister, and her husband, George Shipside, from time to time: whereas the gentleness of the other permitted Bonner's mother, sister, and others of his kindred, not only quietly to enjoy all that which they had from bishop Bonner, but also entertained them in his house, shewing much courtesy and friendship daily unto them: whereas on the other side, bishop Bonner being restored again, would not suffer the brother and sister of bishop Ridley, and other of his friends, not only not to enjoy that which they had by their said brother, bishop Ridley, but also churlishly, without all order of law or honesty, wrested from them all the livings they had.

And yet being not therewith satisfied, he sought all the means he could to work the death of the aforesaid

Shipside, saying that he would make twelve godfathers to go upon him; which had indeed been brought to pass, at the time he was prisoner at Oxford, had not God otherwise wrought his deliverance by the means of Dr. Heath, then bishop of Worcester. Witnessed by George Shipside.

Whereby all good impartial readers may easily understand what great diversity there was in the disposition of these two natures. Inasmuch, that as the one excelled in mercy and piety, so the other again, as much, or more, excelled in churlish ingratitude, and despised disdain. But of this matter enough.

Now concerning God's vocation, how Dr. Ridley was first called to the favouring and favouring of Christ and his gospel, partly by his disputation before, and by his other treatises it may appear, that the first occasion of his conversion was by reading of Bertram's book of the sacrament, whom also the conference with archbishop Cranmer, and with Peter Martyr, did not a little confirm in that behalf. Who now by the grace of God being thoroughly won and brought to the true way, as he was before blind and zealous in his old ignorance, so was he constant and faithful in the right knowledge, which the Lord had opened unto him, (as well appeared by his life and doctrine during all the time of his reign, Edward) and so long he did much good, when power and authority defended the gospel, and supported the peace and happiness of the church. But after it pleased God (in his wise providence) to bereave us of our first in taking from us that precious prince king Edward, the whole state of the church of England was left desolate and open to the enemy's hand: so that bishop Ridley, after the coming in of queen Mary, was one of the first that hands were laid on, and committed to prison, as before hath been sufficiently declared: first to the Tower, and from thence translated with the archbishop of Canterbury and Mr. Latimer to Oxford, and with them inclosed in the common prison of Bocconius, but at length being separated from them, he was committed to custody in the house of one Irish, where he was committed till the day of his martyrdom, which was from the year of our Lord 1554, till Oct. 16, 1555.

As for his disputations at Oxford, his determination at Cambridge, his reasons and conference at the lieutenant's table, enough hath been said already. Besides, he had other conferences in prison, both with Dr. Cranmer and Mr. Latimer, as here followeth to be read.

CONFERENCE between Dr. RIDLEY, and Mr. LATIMER, in Prison, upon the Objection of ANTONIAN, meaning by that Name some Popish Persecutor, as WINCHESTER, alluding thereby to the Story of VICTOR. lib. 3. De Persecut. Aphri.

Dr. RIDLEY to Mr. LATIMER.

IN writing again you have done me an unspeakable pleasure, and I pray that the Lord may requite it you in that day. For I have received great comfort at your words: but yet I am not so filled withal, but that I thirst much more now than before, to drink more of the cup of your's, wherein you mingle unto me profitable with pleasant. I pray you, good father, let me have one draught more to comfort my stomach. For surely, except the Lord assist me with his gracious aid, in the time of his service, I know I shall play but the part of a whilivered knight. But truly my trust is in him, that in mine infirmity he should try himself strong, and that he can make the coward in his cause to fight like a man.

Sir, now I daily look when Diotrophes with his warriors shall assault me: wherefore I pray you, good father, for that you are an old soldier, and an expert warrior, and God knoweth I am but a young soldier, and as yet of small experience in these feats, help me, I pray you, to buckle my harness. And now I would have you to think, that these darts are cast at my head by some of Diotrophes, or Antonius's soldiers.

Latimer. Except the Lord help me, you say. Truly it is. For without me, saith he, you can do nothing much less suffer death by our adversaries, through the bloody law now prepared against us. But it followeth you abide in me, and my word abide in you, ask what will, and it shall be done for you. What can be more comfortable? Sir, you make answer yourself so ill, that I cannot better it. Sir, I begin now to smell at you mean by travelling thus with me; you use me as Bilney once did, when he converted me, pretending though he would be taught by me, he sought ways means to teach me, and so do you. I thank you therefore most heartily. For indeed you minister armour to me, whereas I was unarmed before and unprovided, saving that I give myself to prayer for my refuge.

Objection 1. All men marvel greatly, why you, after the liberty you have granted unto you, more than rest, do not go to mass, which is a thing much esteemed of all men, yea, of the queen herself.

Ridley. Because no man that layeth hand on the plough looketh back is fit for the kingdom of God, and also the self-same cause why St. Paul would not suffer Timothy to be circumcised, which is, that the truth of the gospel might remain with us incorrupt, Gal. ii. And if I build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a trespasser. This is likewise another cause: I should seem by outward fact to allow the thing, which I am persuaded is contrary to sound doctrine, and should be a stumbling-block unto the weak. But woe unto him by whom offence cometh: it were better him that a mill-stone were hanged about his neck, and he cast into the midst of the sea.

Objection 2. What is it then that offendeth you so greatly in the mass, that you will not vouchsafe once either to hear or see it? And from whence cometh this new religion upon you? Have you not used in times past to say mass yourself?

Ridley. I confess unto you my fault and ignorance; I know you that for these matters I have done penance long ago, both at St. Paul's Cross, and also openly at the pulpit at Cambridge, and I trust God hath forgiven me this mine offence: for I did it ignorantly. If you be desirous to know, and will vouchsafe to tell me what things do offend me in the mass, I will re- volve those things which be most clear, and seem most manifestly to repugn against God's word, and they be these: The strange tongue, the want of the shewing of the Lord's death, the breaking of the Lord's commandment of having a communion; the sacrament is not communicated to all under both kinds, according to the word of the Lord; the sign is servilely worshipped, the thing signified; Christ's passion is injured, forasmuch as this mass-sacrifice is affirmed to remain for the purging of sins; to be short, the manifold superstitions, and trifling fooleries which are in the mass, and about the same.

Latimer. Better a few things well pondered, than to trouble the memory with too much; you shall prevail more with praying, than with studying, though mixture be best, for so one shall alleviate the tediousness of the other. I intend not to contend much with them in words, after a reasonable account of my faith given: it will be but in vain. They will say as their fathers said, when they have no more to say: We have a law, and by our law he ought to die. Be you steadfast and unmoveable, saith St. Paul: and again, Stand fast: how oft is this repeated, If you abide, &c. But you shall be called obstinate, sturdy, ignorant, heady, and what not; so that a man hath need of much patience, having to do with such men.

Objection 3. But you know how great a crime it is to separate yourself from the communion or fellowship of the church, and to make a schism, or division. You have been reported to have hated the sect of the Anabaptists, and always to have impugned the same. Moreover, this was the pernicious error of Novatus, and of the heretics called [Cathari], that they would not communicate with the church.

Ridley. I know that the unity of the church is to be maintained by all means, and the same is necessary to salvation. But I do not take the mass, as it is at this day, for the communion of the church, but a popish device whereby both the commandment and the institution of our Saviour Christ, for the oft frequenting of the remembrance of his death, is eluded, and the people of God are miserably deluded. The sect of the Anabaptists, and the heresy of the Novitians, ought of right to be condemned, forasmuch as without any just or necessary cause, they wickedly separated themselves from the communion of the congregation, for they did not allege that the sacraments were unduly administered, but turning their eyes from themselves, wherewith, according to St. Paul's rule, they ought to examine themselves, and casting their eyes ever upon others, either ministers, or communicants with them, they always reprov'd something, for which they abstained from the communion, as from an unholy thing.

Latimer. I remember that Calvin beginneth to confute the Interim after this sort, with this saying of Hilary, The name of peace is beautiful, and the opinion of unity is fair: but who doubteth that to be the true and only peace of the church, which is Christ? I would you had that little book, there would you see how much is to be given to unity. St. Paul, when he requireth unity, joineth with it, according to Jesus Christ, no further. Diotrophes now of late, did always harp upon unity, unity. Yea, sir, said I, but in verity, not popery. Better is diversity, than unity in popery. I had nothing again but scornful taunts, with commandment to the Tower.

Objection 4. But admit there be in the mass, that peradventure might be amended, or at least made better; yea, seeing you will have it so, admit there be a fault; if you do not consent thereto, why do you trouble yourself in vain? Do you not know both by Cyprian and Augustine, that communion of sacraments doth not defile a man, but consent of deeds?

Ridley. If it were any one trifling ceremony, or if it were some one thing of itself indifferent, (although I would wish nothing should be done in the church which doth not edify the same) yet for the continuance of the common quietness I could be content to bear it. But forasmuch as things done in the mass tend openly to the overthrow of Christ's institution, I judge that by no means either in word or deed I ought to consent unto it. As for that which is objected out of the fathers, I acknowledge it to be well spoken, if it be well understood. But it is meant of them which suppose they are defiled, if any secret vice be either in the ministers, or in them that communicate with them; and is not meant of them which do abhor superstition, and wicked traditions of men, and will not suffer the same to be thrust upon themselves, or upon the church, instead of God's word and the truth of the gospel.

Latimer. The very marrow-bones of the mass are altogether detestable, and therefore by no means to be borne withal; so that of necessity the mending of it is to abolish it for ever. For if you take away oblation and adoration, which do hang upon consecration and transubstantiation, most of the papists will not set a button by the mass, as a thing which they esteem not, but for the gain that followeth thereon. For if the English communion, which of late was used, were as gainful to them as the mass hath been heretofore, they would strive no more for their mass: from thence groweth the grief.

Objection 5. Consider into what dangers you cast yourself, if you forsake the church; and you cannot but forsake it, if you refuse to go to mass. For the mass is the sacrament of unity; without the ark there is no salvation. The church is the ark and Peter's ship. You know this saying well enough. He shall not have God to be his Father, which acknowledgeth not the church to be his mother. Moreover, without the church, (saith St. Augustine) be the life ever so well spent, none shall inherit the kingdom of heaven.

Ridley. The holy catholic or universal church, which is the communion of saints, the house of God, the city of God, the spouse of Christ, the body of Christ, the pillar and stay of truth; this church I believe according to the creed. This church I do reverence and honour in the

the Lord. But the rule of this church is the word of God, according to which rule we go forward unto life. And as many as walk according to this rule, I say with St. Paul, Peace be upon them, and upon Israel, which pertaineth unto God. The guide of this church is the Holy Ghost. The marks whereby this church is known unto me in this dark world, and in the midst of this crooked and froward generation, are these; The sincere preaching of God's holy word, the due administration of the sacraments, charity, and faithful observing of ecclesiastical discipline, according to the word of God. And that church or congregation which is garnished with these marks, is in very deed that heavenly Jerusalem, which consisteth of those that be born from above. This is the mother of us all, and by God's grace I will live and die the child of this church. Out of this (I grant) there is no salvation; and I suppose the rest of the places objected are rightly to be understood of this church only. In times past, (saith Chrysostom) there were many ways to know the church of Christ, that is to say, by good life, by miracles, by chastity, by doctrine, by administering the sacraments. But from that time that heresies did take hold of the church, it is only known by the scriptures, which is the true church. They have all things in outward show, which the true church hath in truth. They have temples like unto our's. Wherefore only by the scriptures do we know which is the true church. To that which they say, That the mass is the sacrament of unity, I answer; The bread which we break, according to the institution of the Lord, is the sacrament of the unity of Christ's mystical body. For we being many, are one bread and one body, forasmuch as we are all partakers of one bread. But in the mass, the Lord's institution is not observed; for we are not all partakers of one bread, but one devoureth all, &c. So that (as it is used) it may seem a sacrament of singularity, and of a certain special privilege for one sect of people, whereby they may be discerned from the rest, rather than a sacrament of unity, wherein our knitting together in one is represented.

Latimer. Yea, what fellowship hath Christ with Antichrist? Therefore it is not lawful to bear the yoke with papists. Come forth from among them, and separate yourselves from them, saith the Lord. It is one thing to be the church indeed, another thing to counterfeit the church. Would to God it were well known what is the forsaking of the church. In the king's days that is dead, who was the church of England? The king and his favourers, or mass-mongers in corners? If the king and the favourers of his proceedings, why be we not now the church, abiding in the same proceeding? If private mass-mongers might be of the church, and yet contrary to the king's proceedings, why may we not be of the church contrary to the queen's proceedings? Not all that are covered with the title of the church, are the church indeed. Separate thyself from them that are such, saith St. Paul. From whom? The text hath before, If any man follow other doctrine, &c. he is puffed up and knoweth nothing, &c. Weigh the whole text, that you may perceive what is the fruit of contentious disputations. But wherefore are such men said to know nothing, when they know so many things? You know the old verses,

Hoc est nescire, sine Christo plurima scire:
Si Christum bene scis, satis est, si cætera nescis.

That is, "This is to be ignorant, to know many things without Christ. If thou knowest Christ well, thou knowest enough, though thou know no more." Therefore would St. Paul know nothing but Jesus Christ crucified, &c. As many as are papists and mass-mongers, they may well be said to know nothing. For they know not Christ, forasmuch as in their massing, they take much away from the benefit and merit of Christ.

Objection 6. That church which you have described to me is invisible, but Christ's church is visible and known. For else why should Christ have said, Tell it unto the church. For he had commanded in vain to go unto the church, if a man cannot tell which it is.

Ridley. The church which I have described is visible; it hath members which may be seen; and also I have before declared, by what marks and tokens it may be known; but if either our eyes be so dazzled, that we cannot see, or that Satan hath brought such darkness into the world, that it is hard to discern the church, that is not the fault of the church, but either of our blindness or of Satan's darkness. But yet in this most deep darkness, there is one most clear candle, which of itself alone is able to put away all darkness. Thy word be a candle unto my feet, and a light unto my steps.

Objection 7. The church of Christ is a catholic or universal church, dispersed throughout the whole world; this church is the great house of God, in this are good men and evil mingled together, goats and sheep, corn and chaff; it is the net which gathereth all kinds of fishes; this church cannot err, because Christ hath promised it his Spirit, which shall lead it into all truth, and that the gates of hell shall not prevail against it; that it will be with it unto the end of the world; whatsoever shall loose or bind upon earth shall be ratified in heaven, &c. This church is the pillar and stay of truth; this is it for which St. Augustine saith, he believed the gospel. But this universal church alloweth the mass, because the greater part of the same alloweth it. Therefore, &c.

Ridley. I grant that the name of the church is taken after three divers manners in the scripture. Sometimes for the whole multitude of them who profess the name of Christ, of which they are also named Christians. As St. Paul saith of the Jews, not every one is a Jew, that is a Jew outwardly, &c. neither yet all that be of Israel are counted the seed; even so, not every one that is a christian outwardly is a christian indeed. For if a man have not the Spirit of Christ, the same is none of his. Therefore that church which is his body, and in which Christ is the head, standeth only on living stones and true christians, not only outwardly in name and title, but inwardly in heart and in truth. But forasmuch as this church, (which is the second taking of the church) as touching the outward fellowship, is contained within the great house, and hath with the same, outward society of the sacraments and ministry of the word, many things are spoken of that universal church (which St. Augustine calleth the mingled church) which cannot truly be understood, but only of that pure part of the church. So that the rule of Ticonius concerning the mingled church, may here well take place; where there is attributed unto the whole church that which cannot agree to the same, but by reason of the one part thereof; that is, either for the multitude of good men, which is the very true church indeed; or for the multitude of evil men, which is the malignant church and synagogue of Satan. And there is also a third taking of the church; of which although there be seldom mention in the scriptures, in that signification yet in the world, even in the most famous assemblies of Christendom, this church hath borne the greatest sway. This distinction presupposed of the three sorts of churches, it is an easy matter, by a figure called Synecdoche, to give to the mingled and universal church that which cannot truly be understood, but only of the one part thereof. But if any man will stiffly affirm, that Universal doth so pertain unto the church, that whatsoever Christ hath promised to the church, it must needs be understood of that, I would gladly know of the same man where that universal church was in the times of the patriarchs and prophets, of Noah, Abraham, and Moses, (at such time as the people would have stone him) of Elias, of Jeremiah, in the times of Christ, and the dispersion of the apostles, in the time of Arius, when Constantius was emperor, and Felix, bishop of Rome, succeeded Liberius. It is worthy to be noted, what Lyra writeth upon Matthew; The church (saith he) doth not stand in men by reason of their power or dignity, whether it be ecclesiastical or secular. For princes and es, and other inferiors, have been found to have en away from God. Therefore the church consisteth those persons, in whom is true knowledge and con-on of the faith, and of the truth. Evil men (as it a gloss of the decrees) are in the church in name, not in deed. And St. Augustine (Contra Cresconium inmaticum) faith, Whoever is afraid to be deceived the darkness of this question, let him ask counsel at same church of it: which church the scripture doth out without any doubtfulness. All my notes which ve written and gathered out of such authors as I have d in this matter, and such like, are come into the ds of such as will not let me have the least of all my ten books; wherein I am enforced to complain of unto God: for they spoil me of all my labours, ich I have taken in my study these many years. My mory was never good, for help whereof I have used the most part, to gather out notes of my reading, so to place them, that thereby I might have had the of them when the time required. But who knoweth ether this be God's will, that I should be thus ered, and spoiled of the poor learning I had (as I ight) in store, to the intent that I, now destitute of t, should from henceforth, with St. Paul, learn only know Christ, and him crucified? The Lord grant me ein to be a good young scholar, and to learn this on so well, that neither death nor life, wealth nor e, &c. make me ever to forget that, Amen, Amen.

Latimer. I have no more to say in this matter; for you urch have said all that is to be said. That same nement saying of St. Augustine, I would not believe gospel, &c. was wont to trouble many men; as I member, I have read it well qualified of Philip Mc-Elton: but my memory is altogether slippery. This s in effect; the church is not a judge, but a witness.
 ere were some in his time that lightly esteemed the imony of the church, and the outward ministry of aching, and rejected the outward word itself, sticking to their inward revelations. Such rash contempt e and provoked and drove St. Augustine into that e vehemency. In which, after the bare sound of words, he might seem to such as do not attain unto meaning, that he preferred the church far before the pel, and that the church hath a free authority over the ne; but that pious man never thought so. It were a ing worthy to be brought forth against the Anabapts, who think the open ministry to be a thing not cessary, if they any thing esteemed such testimonies.
 ould not stick to affirm, that the most part of the eat house, that is to say, of the whole universal urch, may easily err. And again, I would not stick affirm, that it is one thing to be gathered together the name of Christ, and another thing to come toge-er with a mass of the Holy Ghost going before. For the first, Christ ruleth; in the latter, the devil beareth sway; and how then can any thing be good they go out? From this latter shall our six articles come forth an into the light, they themselves being very darkness.
 t it is demanded, whether the fonder or better part the catholic church may be seen of men, or no? St. ul faith, The Lord knoweth them that are his. What inner of speaking is this in commendation of the ord, if we knew as well as he who are his? Well, us is the text: the sure foundation of God standeth ll, and hath this seal, The Lord knoweth them that his; and let every man that nameth the name of rit depart from iniquity. Now how many are there the whole catholic church of England who depart m iniquity? How many of the noblemen, how many the bishops or clergy, how many of the rich men, or echants, how many of the queen's counsellors, yea, w many of the whole realm? In how small room n, I pray you, is the true church within the realm of gland? And where is it? And in what state? I had conceit of my own well grounded (as they say) when began, but now it is fallen by the way.

Objection 8. General councils represent the universal urch, and have this promise of Christ; Where two or ee be gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them. If Christ be present with two or three, then much more where there is so great a multitude, &c. But in general councils mass hath been approved and used.
 No. 25.

Ridley. Of the universal church, which is mingled of good and bad, thus I think; Whensoever they which be chief in it, which rule and govern the same, and to whom the whole mystical body of Christ doth obey, are the lively members of Christ, and walk after the guiding and rule of his word, and go before the flock to everlasting life, then undoubtedly councils gathered together of such guides and pastors of the christian flock, do indeed represent the christian church; and being so gathered in the name of Christ, they have a promise of the gift and guiding of his Spirit into all truth. But that any such council hath at any time allowed the mass, such an one as our's was of late, in a strange tongue, and stuffed with so many absurdities, errors, and superstitions; that I utterly deny, and affirm it to be impossible.
 For like as there is no agreement betwixt light and darkness, betwixt Christ and Belial; so surely superstition and the sincere religion of Christ, will-worship and the pure worshipping of God, such as God requireth of his, that is, in spirit and truth, never can agree together. But you will say, where so great a company is gathered together, it is not credible but there are two or three gathered in the name of Christ. I answer, If there be one hundred good, and two hundred bad, (for as much as the decrees and ordinances are pronounced according to the greater number of the multitude of voices) what can the less number of voices avail? It is a known thing, and a common proverb, oftentimes the greater part overcometh the better.

Latimer. As touching general councils, at this present
 I have no more to say than you have said. Only I refer you to your own experience, to think of our country parliaments and convocations, how and what you have seen and heard. The greater part in my time did bring forth six articles; for then the king would have it so, being seduced of certain. Afterward the greater part did repel the same, our good Josias willing to have it so.
 The same articles now again (alas) another great but worse part hath restored. O what an uncertainty is this! But after this manner most commonly are man's proceedings. God be merciful unto us. Who shall deliver us from such torments of mind? Therefore is death the best physician unto the faithful, whom he together and at once delivereth from all griefs. You must think this was written upon this occasion, because you would needs have your paper blotted.

Objection 9. If the matter should go thus, that in general councils men should not stand to the greater number of the multitude (I mean of them which ought to give voices) then should no certain rule be left unto the church, by which controversies in weighty matters might be determined; but it is not to be believed, that Christ would leave his church destitute of so necessary a help and safeguard.

Ridley. Christ, who is the most loving spouse of his church, who also gave himself for it, that he might sanctify it unto himself, did give unto it abundantly all things which are necessary to salvation; but yet so, that the church should declare itself obedient unto him in all things, and keep itself within the bounds of his commandments, and further not to seek any thing which he teacheth not, as necessary unto salvation. Now further, for determination of all controversies in Christ's religion, Christ himself hath left unto the church not only Moses and the prophets, whom he willeth in all doubts to go unto, and ask counsel at, but also the gospels, and the rest of the body of the New Testament; in which whatsoever is heard of Moses and the prophets, and whatsoever is necessary to be known unto salvation, is revealed and opened.

So that now we have no need to say, Who shall climb up into heaven, or who shall go down into the depth, to tell us what is needful to be done? Christ hath done both, and hath commended to us the word of faith, which also is abundantly declared to us in his word written;

written; so that hereafter, if we walk earnestly in this way to the searching out of the truth, it is not to be doubted, but through the certain benefit of Christ's Spirit, which he hath promised unto us, we may find it, and obtain everlasting life. Should men ask counsel of the dead for the living? saith Isaiah. Let them go rather to the law and to the testimony, &c. Christ sendeth them that be desirous to know the truth, unto the scriptures, saying, Search the scriptures. I remember a like thing well spoken of St. Jerome; Ignorance of the scriptures is the mother and cause of all errors. And in another place, as I remember in the same author; The knowledge of the scriptures is the food of everlasting life. But now methinks I enter into a very broad sea, in that I begin to shew, either out of the scriptures themselves, or out of the ancient writers, how much the holy scripture is of force to teach the truth of our religion. But this is it that I am now about, that Christ would have the church, his spouse, in all doubts to ask counsel at the word of his Father written, and faithfully left, and commended unto it in both Testaments, the old and new. Neither do we read, that Christ in any place hath laid so great a burden upon the members of his spouse, that he hath commanded them to go to the universal church. Whatsoever things are written, saith St. Paul, are written for our learning. And it is true, that Christ gave unto his church, some apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, some shepherds and teachers, to the edifying of the saints, till we come all to the unity of faith, &c. But that all men should meet together out of all parts of the world, to define the articles of our faith, I neither find it commanded by Christ, nor written in the word of God.

Latimer. There is difference between things pertaining to God or faith, and politic and civil matters. For in the first we must stand only to the scriptures, which are able to make us all perfect and instructed unto salvation, if they be well understood. And they offer themselves to be well understood only to them, which have good-wills, and give themselves to study and prayer. Neither are there any men less apt to understand them, than the prudent and wise men of the world. But in the other, that is, in civil and politic matters, oftentimes the magistrates do tolerate a less evil, for avoiding of a greater, as they which have this saying often in their mouths; Better an inconveniency than a mischief. And it is the property of a wise man, saith one, to dissemble many things, and he that cannot dissemble, cannot rule. In which sayings they betray themselves, that they do not earnestly weigh what is just, and what is not. Wherefore forso much as man's laws, if they be but in this respect only, that they be devised by men, are not able to bring any thing to perfection, but are enforced of necessity to suffer many things out of square, and are compelled sometimes to wink at the worst things; seeing they know not how to maintain the common peace and quiet otherwise, they do ordain that the greater part shall take place. You know what these kind of speeches mean, I speak after the manner of men; you walk after the manner of men, all men are liars. And that of St. Augustine, If ye live after man's reason, ye do not live after the will of God.

Objection 10. If you say that councils have sometimes erred, or may err, how then should we believe the catholic church? since councils are gathered by the authority of the catholic church.

Ridley. From may be, to be indeed, is no good argument: but from being, to may be, no man doubteth but it is a most sure argument. But now that councils have sometimes erred, it is manifest. How many councils were there in the eastern parts of the world, which condemned the Nicene council? and all those who would not forsake the same, they called by a slanderous name (as they thought) Homousians. Was not Athanasius, Chrysostom, Cyril, Eustachius, men very well learned, and of godly life, banished and condemned as famous heretics, and that by wicked councils? How many things are there in the canons and institutions of the councils, which the papists themselves do much dislike?

But here peradventure one man will say unto me, We will grant you this in provincial councils, or councils of some one nation, that they may sometimes err, so much as they do not represent the universal church, but it is not to be believed, that the general and full council have erred at any time. Here if I had my books of councils, or rather such notes as I have gathered out of those books, I could bring something which should serve for this purpose. But now seeing I have them not, I will recite one place only out of St. Austin, which, in my judgment, may suffice in this matter instead of many. Who knoweth not (saith he) that the holy scriptures are so set before us, that it is not lawful to doubt of it, as that the letters of bishops may be reproved by other men's words, and by councils, and that the councils themselves which are gathered by provinces and countries, do give place to the authority of the general and full councils; and that the former and general councils are amended by the latter, when as by some experience of things, either what was shut up, is opened, or what which was hid, is known. Thus much out of St. Austin. But I will plead upon our Antonian, upon a matter confessed. Here with us as when popery reigned, I pray you how doth that book, which was called The bishop's book, made in the time of king Henry the eighth, whereof the bishop of Winchester is thought to be either the first father, or chief gatherer; how doth it (I say) sharply reprove the Florentine council, which was decreed the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, and that with the consent of the emperor of Constantinople, and of the Grecians? So that in those days our learned ancient fathers and bishops of England did not stick to affirm, that a general council might err. But methinks I hear another man despising all that I have brought forth, and saying, These which you have called councils, are not worthy to be called councils, but rather assemblies and conventicles of heretics. I pray you, sir, why do you judge them worthy of so scandalous a name? Because (saith he) they decreed things heretical, contrary to sound doctrine and true godliness, and against the faith of true religion. The cause is weighty for which they ought of right so to be called. But it shall be so that all councils ought to be despised which decree any thing contrary to sound doctrine, and the true word, which is according to godliness, forso much as the mass such as we had here of late, is openly against the word of God; forsooth, it must of necessity follow, that all such councils, as have approved such masses, ought to be shunned and despised, as conventicles and assemblies that stray from the truth.

Another man alledgeth unto me the authority of the bishop of Rome, without which, neither can the councils (saith he) be lawfully gathered, neither being gathered, determine anything concerning religion. But this objection is only grounded upon the ambitious and shameless maintenance of the Romish tyranny and usurped dominion over the clergy; which tyranny we Englishmen long ago, by the consent of the whole realm, have expelled and abjured. And how rightly we have done it, a little book set forth of both the powers, doth clearly shew. I grant that the Romish ambition hath gone about to challenge to itself, and to usurp such a privilege of old time. But the council of Carthage, in the year of our Lord 457, did openly withstand it, and also the council at Milevite, in which St. Austin was present, did prohibit any appellations to be made to bishops beyond the sea.

Objection 11. St. Austin saith, the good men are not to be forsaken for the evil, but the evil are to be borne withal for the good. You will not say (I suppose) that in our congregations all be evil.

Ridley. I speak nothing of the goodness or badness of your congregations; but I fight in Christ's quarrel against the mass, which doth utterly take away and overthrow the ordinance of Christ. Let that be taken quite away, and then the partition wall that made the strife shall be broken down. Now to the place of St. Austin, for bearing with the evil for the good's sake, there ought to be added other words, which the same writer expressed in other places; that is, if those evil do cast abroad no seeds of false doctrine, nor lead us to destruction by their example.

Objection 12. It is perilous to attempt any new thing in the church, which lacketh example of good men. How much more perilous is it to commit any thing unto which the examples of the prophets, of Christ, and of the apostles, are contrary? But unto this your argument, in abstaining from the church by reason of the examples of the prophets, of Christ, and of the apostles, are clean contrary: therefore, &c. The first part of the argument is evident, and the second part I prove thus. In the times of the prophets, of Christ, and his apostles, all things were most corrupt. The people were miserably given to superstition, the Jews despised the law of God; and yet notwithstanding we read not that the prophets made any schisms or divisions; and Christ himself frequented the temple, and taught in the temple of the Jews. Peter and John went up into the temple at the ninth hour of prayer, and after the reading of the law, being desired to say something to the people, did not refuse to do it. Yea rather, no man can shew, that either the prophets, or Christ, or his apostles, did refuse to pray together with others, to sacrifice, or to be partakers of the sacrament of Moses' law.

Ridley. I grant the former part of your argument; and to the second part I say, that although it contain any true things, as of the corrupt state in the times of the prophets, of Christ, and the apostles; and of the temple being frequented by Christ and his apostles; yet notwithstanding the second part of your argument is not sufficiently proved. For you ought to have proved, that either the prophets, either Christ or his apostles, did in the temple communicate with the people in any kind of worshipping which is forbidden by the law of God, repugnant to the word of God. But that can nowhere be shewed. And as for the church, I am not angry with it, and I never refused to go to it, and to pray with the people, to hear the word of God, and to do all other things whatsoever may agree with the word of God. St. Austin, speaking of the ceremonies of the Jews, (I suppose in the epistle ad Januarium) although he grants they grievously oppressed that people, both for the number and bondage of the same, yet he calleth them burdens of the law, which were delivered unto them in the word of God, not presumptions of men, which notwithstanding, if they were not contrary to God's word, might in some measure be borne withal. At now, seeing they are contrary to such things as are written in the word of God, whether they ought to be borne by any christian or no, let him judge who is spiritual, who feareth God more than man, and loveth everlasting life more than this short and transitory life. So that which was said, that my fact lacketh example of the godly fathers that have gone before, the contrary is most evident in the history of Toby: of whom it is said, that when all others went to the golden calves, which Jeroboam the king of Israel had made, he himself alone went from their company, and got him to Jerusalem to the Lord, and there worshipped the Lord God of Israel. Did not the man of God threaten grievous plagues both unto the priests of Bethel, and to the altar which Jeroboam had there made after his own fantasy? Which plagues king Josias, the true minister of God, did execute at the time appointed. And where do we read, that the prophets or the apostles did agree with the people in their idolatry, when the people went a worshipping with their hill-altars? For what cause, I pray you, did the prophets rebuke the people so much, as for their false worshipping of God after their own minds, and not after God's word? For what was so much as that? Wherefore the false prophets ceased not to accuse the true prophets of God: therefore they beat them, they banished them, &c. How else, I pray you, can you understand what St. Paul alledgeth, when he saith, that concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part the believer with the infidel? Or how agreeth the temple of God with images? For ye are the temple of the living God, as God himself hath said: I will dwell among them, and will be their God, and they shall be my people. Wherefore, come out from among them, and separate yourselves from them (saith the Lord), and touch no unclean thing; so will I receive you, and be a Father unto you, and you shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord God Almighty.

Judith, that holy woman, would not suffer herself to be defiled with the meats of the wicked. All the saints of God, which truly feared God, when they have been provoked to do any thing which they knew to be contrary to God's laws, have chose to die rather than forsake the laws of their God. Wherefore the Maccabees put themselves in danger of death for the defence of the law, and at length died manfully in the defence of the same. If we do praise (saith St. Augustine) the Maccabees, and that with great admiration, because they did stoutly stand even unto death, for the law of their country; how much more ought we to suffer all things for our baptism, for the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, &c.? But the supper of the Lord, such a one (I mean) as Christ commanded us to celebrate, the mass utterly abolisheth, and corrupteth most shamefully.

Latimer. Who am I, that should add any thing to this which you have spoken? Nay, I rather thank you, that have vouchsafed to minister so plentiful armour to me, being otherwise altogether unarmed, saving, that he cannot be left destitute of help, who rightly trusteth in the help of God. I only learn to die in reading of the New Testament, and am every now and then praying unto my God, that he will be an helper unto me in time of need.

Objection 13. Seeing you are obstinately set against the mass, that you affirm, because it is done in tongue not understood of the people, and for other causes, I cannot tell what; therefore is it not the true sacrament ordained of Christ? I begin to suspect you, that you think not catholicly of baptism also. Is our baptism which we do use in a tongue unknown to the people, the true baptism of Christ, or no? If it be, then the strange tongue doth not hurt the mass. If it be not the baptism of Christ, tell me how you were baptized. Or whether will you, (as the anabaptists do) that all which were baptized in Latin, should be baptized again in the English tongue?

Ridley. Although I would wish baptism to be given in the vulgar tongue, for the people's sake, which are present, that they may the better understand their own profession, and also be more able to teach their children the same, yet notwithstanding there is not like necessity of the vulgar tongue in baptism, as in the Lord's supper. Baptism is given to children, who by reason of their age are not able to understand what is spoken unto them, whatsoever it be. The Lord's supper is, and ought to be given to them that are at years of maturity. Moreover, in baptism, which is accustomed to be given to children in the Latin tongue, all the substantial points (as a man would say) which Christ commanded to be done, are observed. And therefore I judge that baptism to be a perfect and true baptism: and that it is not only not needful, but also not lawful for any man so baptized, to be christened again. But yet notwithstanding, they ought to be taught the catechism of the christian faith, when they come to years of discretion; which catechism whosoever despiseth, or will not desirously embrace and willingly learn, in my judgment he playeth not the part of a christian man. But in the popish mass are wanting certain substantials, that is to say, things commanded by the word of God to be observed in the ministration of the Lord's supper; of which there is sufficient declaration made before.

Latimer. Where you say [I would wish], surely I would wish that you had spoken more vehemently, and to have said, It is of necessity, that all things in the congregation should be done in the vulgar tongue, for the edifying and comfort of them that are present, notwithstanding that the child itself is sufficiently baptized in the Latin tongue.

Objection 14. Forasmuch as I perceive you are so stiffly, I will not say obstinately bent, and so wedded to your opinion, that no gentle exhortations, no wholesome counsels, no other kind of means can call you home to a better mind, there remaineth that which in like cases was wont to be the only remedy against stiff-necked and stubborn persons, that is, you must be hampered by the laws, and be compelled to obey whether you will or no, or else to suffer that which a rebel to the laws ought to suffer. Do you not know, that whosoever refuseth to obey the laws of the realm, he bewrayeth himself to be an enemy to his country? Do you not know this is the readiest way to stir up sedition and civil war? It is better that you should bear your own sin, than through the example of your breach of the common laws, the common quiet should be disturbed. How can you say, you will be the queen's true subject, when as you do openly profess that you will not keep her laws?

Ridley. O heavenly Father, the Father of all wisdom, understanding, and true strength, I beseech thee for thy only Son our Saviour Christ's sake, look mercifully upon me wretched creature, and send thy Holy Spirit into my breast, that not only I may understand according to thy wisdom, how this pestilent and deadly dart is to be borne off, and with what answer it is to be beaten back, but also when I must join to fight in the field for the glory of thy holy name, that then I being strengthened with the defence of thy right hand, may manfully stand in the confession of thy faith, and of thy truth, and continue in the same unto the end of my life, through our Lord Jesus Christ, Amen.

Now to the objection. I grant it to be reasonable, that he who by words and gentleness cannot be made to yield to that which is right and good, should be bridled by the strait correction of the laws: that is to say, He that will not be subject to God's word, must be punished by the laws. It is true that is commonly said, He that will not obey the gospel, must be tamed and taught by the rigour of the law. But these things ought to take place against him, who refuseth to do that which is right and just according to true godliness, not against him who cannot quietly bear superstitions, but doth hate and detest from his heart such kind of proceedings, and that for the glory of the name of God. To that which you say, a transgressor of the common laws bewrayeth himself to be an enemy of his country, surely a man ought to look unto the nature of the laws, what manner of laws they be which are broken. For a faithful christian ought not to think alike of all manner of laws. But that saying ought only truly to be understood of such laws as are not contrary to God's word. Otherwise, whosoever love their country in truth, (that is to say, in God) they will always judge, if at any time the laws of God and man be the one contrary to the other, that a man ought rather to obey God than man. And they that think otherwise, and pretend a love to that country, forasmuch as they make their country to fight as it were against God, in whom consisteth the only stay of their country, surely I do think such are to be judged most deadly enemies, and traitors to their country. For they that fight against God, who is the safety of their country, what do they else but go about to bring upon their country a present ruin and destruction! But they that do so are worthy to be judged enemies to their country, and betrayers of the realm. Therefore, &c.

But this is the readiest way (you say) to stir up sedition, to trouble the quiet of the commonwealth; therefore are these things to be repressed in time by force of laws. Behold, Satan doth not cease to practise his old guiles, and accustomed subtleties. He hath ever this dart in readiness to hurl against his adversaries, to accuse them of sedition, that he may bring them, if he can, in danger of the higher powers. For so hath he by his minister always charged the prophets of God. Ahab said unto Elias, "Art thou he that troubleth Israel?" The false prophets also complained to their princes of Jeremy, that his words were seditious, and not to be suffered: did not the scribes and pharisees falsely accuse Christ as a seditious person, and one that spake against Cæsar's friend? Did they not, at last, cry, "If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend?" The orator Terullus, how doth he accuse Paul before Felix the high deputy? "We have found this man, saith he, a pestilent fellow, and a stirrer of sedition, unto all the Jews in the whole world," &c. But, I pray you, were they men, as they were called, seditious persons? Christ, and the prophets? God forbid. But they were by false men falsely accused. And for what, I pray you? Because they reprov'd before the people their guile, superstition, and deceit. And when the others could not bear it, and would gladly have had them taken out of the way, they accused them as seditious persons, and trouble-bers of the commonwealth, that being by this made hateful to the people and princes, they might the more easily be snatched up to be tormented, and put to death. But how far they were from all sedition, their whole doctrine, life, and conversation doth well declare. For that which was objected last of all, that he cannot be a faithful subject to his prince, who professeth openly that he will not observe the laws which the prince hath made; here I would wish that I might have an impartial judge, and one that feareth God, to whose judgment in this cause, I promise I will stand. I answer therefore a man ought to obey his prince, but in the Lord, and never against the Lord. For he that knoweth he obeyeth his prince against God, doth not a duty to the prince, but is a deceiver of the prince, and an helper unto him to work his own destruction. He is also ungrateful who giveth not to the prince that which is the prince's, and to God that which is God's. Here cometh to my remembrance that notable saying of Valentinian the emperor for choosing the bishop of Milan. Set him (saith he) in the bishop's seat, to whom if we (as man) do offend at any time, we may submit ourselves. Polycarp the most constant martyr, when he stood before the chief rulers, and was commanded to blaspheme Christ, and to swear by the fortune of Cæsar, &c. answered with a mild spirit: We are taught (saith he) to give honour unto princes, and those powers which be of God; but such honour as is not contrary to God's religion.

Hitherto you see (good father) how I have in words only made as it were a flourish before the fight, which I shortly look for, and how I have begun to prepare certain kinds of weapons to fight against the adversary of Christ, and to muse with myself how the darts of the old enemy may be borne off, and after what manner I may smite him again with the sword of the Spirit. I learn also hereby to accustom myself to armour, and to try how I can go armed. In Tindal, where I was born, not far from the borders of Scotland, I have known my countrymen to watch night and day in their harness, such as they had, and their spears in their hands, especially when they had any private warning of the coming of the Scots. And so doing, although at every such bickering some of them spent their lives, yet by such means, like valiant men, they defended their country. And those that so died, I think that before God they died in a good quarrel, and their offspring and progeny were loved by all the country the better for their father's sake. And in the quarrel of Christ our Saviour, in the defence of his own divine ordinances, by which he giveth unto us life and immortality; yea, in the quarrel of faith and the christian religion, wherein resteth our everlasting salvation, shall we not watch? Shall we not go always armed? Always looking when our adversary (which like a roaring lion seeketh whom he may devour) shall come upon us by reason of our slothfulness? Yea, and what will be unto us, if he can oppress us unawares, which undoubtedly he will do, if he find us sleeping. Let us awake therefore. For if the good man of the house knew at what hour the thief would come, he would surely watch, and not suffer his house to be broken up. Let us awake therefore, I say: let us not suffer our house to be broken up. Resist the devil, saith St. James, and he will fly from you. Let us therefore resist him manfully, and taking the cross upon our shoulders, let us follow our captain Christ, who by his own blood dedicated and hallowed the way which leadeth to the Father, that is, to the light which no man can see, the fountain of the everlasting joys. Let us follow, I say, whither he calleth and inviteth us, that through these afflictions, which last but for a moment, whereby he trieth our faith, as gold by the fire, we may everlastingly reign and triumph with him in the glory of the Father, and that through the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; to whom, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory, now and ever, Amen.

Good father, forsomuch as I have determined with myself, to pour forth these my cogitations into thy ear, here, methinks, I see you suddenly lifting up your head towards heaven, after your manner, and then looking upon me with your propheticall countenance, speaking to me, with these or like words, Trust in my son (I beseech you vouchsafe me the honor of his name; for in so doing I shall think myself both honoured and beloved of you); trust not, I say, my son, to these word-weapons; for the kingdom of God cometh not in words, but in power. And remember always the words of the Lord: "Do not imagine beforehand, what and how you will speak; for it shall be given you the same hour what ye shall speak. For it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh for you." I pray you therefore, father, pray for me, that I may cast my whole care upon him, and trust upon him in all perils. For I know, and am surely persuaded, that whatsoever I can imagine or think beforehand, it doth nothing, except he assist me with his Spirit when the need is. I beseech you therefore, father, pray for me, that such a complete harness of the Spirit, such a boldness of mind may be given unto me, that I may out of a true faith say with David, "I will not trust in my bow, neither is it my sword that shall save me. For he hath pleasure in the strength of an horse, &c. but the Lord's delight is in them that fear him, and put their trust in his mercy." I beseech you, pray, pray that I may enter this fight only in the name of God, and that when all is past, I being not overcome, through his gracious aid, may remain and stand fast in him till that day of the Lord, in which to them that obtain the victory shall be given the lively manna to eat, and a triumph crown for evermore.

Now, father, I pray you help me to buckle on this harness a little better. For you know the deepness of my pain, being an old soldier, and you have collared with me ere now; blessed be God, that hath ever aided you well. I suppose he may well hold you at the bay. Truly he will not be so willing (I think) to join with us as with us youngsters. Sir, I beseech you, let your servant read this my babbling unto you, and now and then, as it shall seem unto you best, let your pen run on my book: spare not to blot my paper: I give you good leave.

Latimer. Sir, I have caused my man not only to read your armour unto me, but also to write it out, for it is not only solid armour, but also well buckled armour. I know not how it could be better. I thank you even from the bottom of my heart for it, and my prayers shall not lack, trusting that you do the like for me; indeed there is the help, &c. many things make mention in memory. And if I were learned as well as St. Paul, I would not bestow much amongst them, rather than to gall them, and spur-gall too, when and where occasion were given, and matter came to mind; the law shall be their sheet-anchor stay, and refuge. Therefore there is no remedy (namely, now when they have the master-bowl in their hand, and rule the roast) but patience. Better is it to suffer what cruelly they will upon us, than to incur God's high indignation. Therefore (my good lord) be of good cheer in the end, with due consideration what he requireth of you, what he doth promise you. Our common enemy I do no more than God will permit him. God is faithful, who will not suffer us to be tempted above our strength, &c. Be at a point what you will stand unto; stand unto that, and let them both say and do what they will. They can but kill the body, which otherwise is of itself mortal. Neither yet shall they do that when they list, but as God will suffer them, when the hour appointed is come. It will be but in vain to use many words with them, now they have a bloody and deadly law prepared for you. But it is very requisite that you give a reasonable account of your faith, if they will quietly hear you; else, you know, in a wicked place of judgment a man may keep silence, after the example of Christ. Let them not deceive you with their sophistical sophisms and fallacies: you know that false things may have more appearance of truth, than things that be most true: therefore St. Paul giveth us a watch-word, Let no man deceive you with likeliness of speech. Neither is it requisite that with the contentious you should follow strife of words, which tend to no edification, but to the subversion of the hearers, and the vain bragging and ostentation of the adversaries. Fear of death doth mostly persuade a great number. Be well aware of that argument; for that persuaded Shaxton (as many men thought) after that he had once made a good profession openly before the judgment seat. The flesh is weak, but the willingness of the spirit shall refresh the weakness of the flesh.

The number of the criers under the altar must needs be fulfilled; if we be separated thereunto, happy be we. That is the greatest promotion that God giveth in this world, to be such Philippians, to whom it is given not only to believe, but also to suffer, &c. But who is able to do these things? Surely all our ability, all our sufficiency is of God. He requireth and promiseth. Let us declare our obedience to his will when it shall be requisite in the time of trouble, yea, in the midst of the fire.

When that number is fulfilled, which I suppose will be shortly, then have at the papists, when they shall say, Peace, all things are safe, when Christ shall come to keep his great parliament to redress all things that are amiss. But he shall not come as the papists feign him, to hide himself, and to play bo-peep as it were under a piece of bread; but he shall come gloriously, to the terror and fear of all papists, and to the great consolation and comfort of all that will here suffer for him. Comfort yourselves and one another with these words.

Lo, sir, here have I blotted your paper vainly, and played the fool egregiously; but so I thought better than not to fulfil your request at this time. Pardon me, and pray for me, pray for me I say, pray for me. For I am sometimes so fearful, that I would creep into a mouse-hole; sometimes God doth visit me again with his comfort. So he cometh and goeth, to teach me to feel and to know mine infirmity, to the intent to give thanks to him that is worthy, lest I should rob him of his due, as many do, and almost all the world. Fare you well.

What belief is to be given to papists may appear by their racking, writing, wringing, and monstrously injuring of God's holy scripture, as appeareth in the pope's law. But I dwell here now in a school of forgetfulness. Fare you well once again, and be you steadfast and unmoveable in the Lord. Paul loved Timothy marvellously well, notwithstanding he saith unto him, "Be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel;" and again, "Harden thyself to suffer afflictions. Be faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life," saith the Lord.

LETTER I.

From BISHOP RIDLEY and his FELLOW-PRISONERS, to Mr. BRADFORD and his FELLOW-PRISONERS, in the King's-Bench, in Southwark, Anno 1554.

WELL beloved in Christ our Saviour, we all with one heart wish to you, with all those that love God in deed and truth, grace and health, and especially to our dearly beloved companions which are in Christ's cause, and the cause both of their brethren and of their own salvation, to put their neck willingly under the yoke of Christ's cross. How joyful it was to us to hear the report of Dr. Taylor, and of his godly confession, &c. I assure you it is hard for me to express.

Blessed be God, which was and is the giver of that, and of all godly strength and support in the time of adversity. As for the rumours that have or do go abroad, either of our relenting or massing, we trust, that they which know God and their duty towards their brethren in Christ, will not be too light of belief. For it is not the slanderer's evil tongue, but a man's evil deed that can with God defile a man; and therefore with God's grace, you shall never have cause to do otherwise than you say you do, that is, not to doubt but that we will, by God's grace, continue, &c. Like rumours as you have heard of our coming to London, have been here spread of the coming of certain learned men prisoners hither from London; but as yet we know no certainty which of these rumours is, or shall be more true. Know you that we have you in our daily remembrance, and wish you and all the rest of our fore-said companies well in Christ.

It would much comfort us, if we might have knowledge of the state of the rest of our most dearly beloved, which in this troublesome time do stand in Christ's cause, and in the defence of the truth thereof. We have heard somewhat of Mr. Hooper's matter, but nothing of the rest. We long to hear of father Crome, Dr. Sands, Mr. Saunders, Veron, Beacon, Rogers, &c. We are in good health, thanks be to God, and yet the manner of using us doth change as sourale in summer. It is reported to us by our keepers, that the university beareth us heavily. A coal happened to fall in the night out of the chimney, and burnt a hole in the floor, and no more harin was done, the bailiff's servant sitting by the fire. Another night there chanced (as the bailiffs told us) a drunken fellow to multiply words, and for the same he was set in Bocardo. Upon these things as is reported, there is a rumour risen in the town and country about, that we would have broke the prison with such violence; as that if the bailiffs had not played the pretty men, we should have made an escape. We had out of our prison a wall that we might have walked upon, and our servants had liberty to go abroad in the town or fields, but now both they and we are restrained of both.

My lord of Worcester passed through Oxford, but he did not visit us. The same day our restraint began to be more close, and the book of the communion was taken from us by the bailiffs at the mayor's command, as the bailiffs did report to us. No man is licensed to come unto us; before they might, that would see us upon the wall, but that is so grudged at, and so evil reported, that we are now restrained, &c. Sir, blessed be God, with all our evil reports, grudges and restraints, we are merry in God, all our care is and shall be (by God's grace) to please and serve him, of whom we look and hope, after these temporal and momentary miseries, to have eternal joy and perpetual felicity with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Peter and Paul, and all the heavenly company of the angels in heaven, through Jesus Christ our Lord. As yet there has no learned man, nor any scholar, been to visit us since we came into Bocardo, which now in Oxford may be called a college of Quondams. For as you know we are no fewer than three, and I dare say everyone well contented with his portion, which I do reckon to be our heavenly Father's fatherly, good, and gracious gift. Thus fare you well. We shall by God's grace one day meet together, and be merry. The day assuredly approacheth apace; the Lord grant that it may shortly come. For before that day come, I fear the world will wax worse and worse. But then all our enemies shall be overthrown and trodden under foot: righteousness and truth then shall have the victory, and bear the bell away, wherof the Lord grant us to be partakers, and all that love truly the truth.

We all pray you, as we can, to cause all our commendations to be made unto all such as you know did visit us and you when we were in the Tower, with their friendly remembrances and benefits. Mrs. Wilkfon and Mrs. Warcup have not forgotten us, but ever since we came to Bocardo, with their charitable and friendly benevolence have comforted us: not that else we did lack, (for God be blessed, he hath always sufficiently provided for us) but that is a great comfort, and occasion for us to bless God, when we see that he maketh them so friendly to tender us, whom some of us were never familiarly acquainted withal.

Your's in Christ,
NICHOLAS RIDLEY

LETTER II.

From BISHOP RIDLEY to his COUSIN.

GOD's Holy Spirit be with you now and ever Amen.

When I call to remembrance, beloved cousin, the state of those that for fear of trouble, or for loss of goods, will do in the sight of the world those things that they know and are assured are contrary to the will of God, I can do no less than lament their case, being assured the end thereof will be so pitiful (without speedy repentance) that I tremble and fear to have in remembrance. I would to God it lay upon some earthly burden, so that freedom of conscience might be given unto them. I wrote (as God knoweth) not a presumption, but only lamenting the state of those who I thought now in this dangerous time should have given both you and me comfortable instruction. But alas! instead thereof we have instructions to follow (I lament to rehearse it) superstitious idolatry. Yea, and what is worst of all, they will seek to prove it by the scriptures. The Lord, for his mercy, turn their hearts. Amen. Commend me, &c. Your's,

NICHOLAS RIDLEY

LETTER III.

From BISHOP RIDLEY to MR. BRADFORD.

BROTHER Bradford, I wish you and your company in Christ, yea, and all the holy brotherhood that now with you in divers prisons suffer and bear patiently the cross of Christ for the maintenance of his gospel, grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father and from our Lord Jesus Christ.

Sir, considering the state of this chivalry and warfare wherein I doubt not but we beset to fight under Christ's banner, and his cross, against our spiritual enemy the devil, and the old serpent Satan, methinks I perceive two things to be his most perilous and most dangerous engines, which he hath to impugn the verity of Christ's gospel, and his faith; and the same two also be the most massy posts, and most mighty pillars, whereby he maintaineth and upholdeth his satanical synagogue. These two, sir, are they, in my judgment: the one his false doctrine and idolatrous use of the Lord's supper; and the other, the wicked and abominable usurpation of the primacy of the see of Rome. By these two Satan seemeth to me principally to maintain and uphold his kingdom; by these two he driveth down mightily (alas! I fear me) the third part of the stars in heaven. These two poisonous rotten posts he had so painted over with such a pretence and colour of religion, of unity in Christ's church, of the catholic faith, and such like that the wily serpent is able to deceive (if it were possible) even the elect of God. Wherefore St. John said not without great cause, "If any man know not Satan's subtleties and the profundities thereof, I will visit him no other burden to be laden with."

Sir, because these be his principal and main posts whereupon standeth all his falsehood, craft, and treachery, therefore according to the poor power that God hath given me, I have bended mine artillery to shoot at the same. I know it to be but little (God knoweth) that I can do, and of my shot I know they care not. Yet will not, God willing, cease to do the best I can, to shake those cankered and rotten posts. The Lord grant me good success, to the glory of his name, and the furtherance of Christ's gospel. I have now already (I thank God) for this present time spent a good part of my power in these scribblings, whereof this bearer shall give you knowledge. Good brother Bradford, let the wicked and say what they list; know you for a certain, by God's grace, without all doubt, that in the of Christ's gospel, against and upon the aforesaid of God, I am fully determined to live and die. (dear brother), and I beseech you, and all the of our brethren to have good remembrance of the of our heretics (as they call them) of Oxford, in prayers. The bearer shall certify you of our state. wel in the Lord. From Bocardo.

Your's in Christ,

NICHOLAS RIDLEY.

LETTER IV.

BISHOP RIDLEY to Mr. BRADFORD, and his FELLOW PRISONERS.

EARLY beloved, I wish you grace, mercy, and peace.

According to your mind, I have run over all your papers, and what I have done (which is but small) therein appear. In two places I have put in two loose leaves: much to do to read what was written in your great letters, and I think somewhere I have altered some words, because I could not perfectly read that which was written. Sir, what shall be best done with these things, now must consider; for if they come in sight at this time, undoubtedly they must go to the fire with their author: as for any safe-guard that your custody can be unto me, I am sure you look for no other, but to have and give like wages, and to drink of the same cup. Blessed be God, that hath given you liberty in the mean season, that you may use your pen to his glory, and the comfort (as I hear say) of many. I bless God daily in you, and all your whole company, to whom I beseech commend me heartily. Now I love my countryman indeed and in truth, I mean Dr. Taylor, not for my country's sake, but for our heavenly Father's sake, and for Christ's sake, whom, I heard say, he did truly in time of danger confess, and yet also for our country's sake, and for all our mother's sake: but I am of the kingdom of heaven, and of heavenly Jerusalem, and because of the Spirit which bringeth forth him, in you, and in our company such blessed fruits of boldness in the Lord's cause, of patience and constancy. The Lord, who hath begun this work in you, perform and perfect this his own deed, until his own day come, Amen.

And yet I perceive you have not been baited, and the use thereof God knoweth, which will let them do no more than is his good will and pleasure to suffer them to do for his own glory, and to the profit of them which truly his. For the Father, who guideth them that Christ's to Christ, is more mighty than all they, and man is able to pull them out of the Father's hands; except, I say, it please our Father, it please our master Christ to suffer them, they shall not stir one hair of your head.

My brother P. the bearer hereof, and Mr. Hooper's letters, would that we should say what we think good concerning your mind: that is, not to answer, except you might have impartial judges; we are (as you know) separated, and cannot consult with one another, and we are so narrowly watched by the bailiffs about us, that we have no opportunity of private conference. And yet, we hear, the scholars bear us more heavily than the women. A wonderful thing, among so many, never at a scholar offered any of us (so far as I know) any manner of favour, either for or in Christ's cause.

Now as concerning your demand of your counsel, for my part I do not dislike that which I perceive you are minded to do. For I look for none other, but if you answer before the commissioners that we did, you shall be served and handled as we were, though you were as well learned as ever was either Peter or Paul. And yet further I think, that occasion afterwards may be given you, and the consideration of the profit of your auditory may perchance move you to do otherwise.

Finally, determinately to say what shall be best, I am not able; but I trust he, whose cause you have in hand, shall put you in mind to do that which shall be most for his glory, the profit of his flock, and your own salvation. This letter must be common to you and Mr. Hooper, in whom and in his fellow-prisoner good father C—, I bless God, even from the bottom of my heart; for I doubt not but they both do to our master Christ, true, acceptable, and honorable service, and profitable to his flock; the one with his pen, and the other with his fatherly example of patience and constancy, and all manner of true godliness. But what shall I need to say to you? Let this be common among your brethren, among whom (I dare say) it is with you as it is with us, to whom all things here are common, meat, money, and whatsoever any of us hath, that can or may do another good. Although I said the bailiffs and our hostesses do strictly watch us, that we have no conference or intelligence of any thing abroad, yet God hath provided for every one of us instead of our servants, faithful fellows, who are content to hear and see, and to do for us whatever they can. It is God's work surely; blessed be God for his unspeakable goodness. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all, Amen, Amen.

As far as London is from Oxford, yet thence we have received of late, both meat, money, and shirts, not only from such as are our acquaintance, but of some (whom this bearer can tell) with whom to my knowledge I never had any acquaintance. I know for whose sake they do it; to him therefore be all honor, glory, and due thanks.

And yet I pray you do so much as to shew them, that we have received their benevolence; and (God be blessed) have plenty of all such things. This I desire you to do; for I know they be of Mr. Hooper's and your familiar acquaintance. Mr. Latimer was out of order; but now (thanks be to God) he amendeth again.

NICHOLAS RIDLEY.

LETTER V.

From the SAME to the SAME.

O Dear brother, seeing the time is now come, wherein it pleaseth the heavenly Father, for Christ our Saviour's sake, to call upon you, and to bid you to come, happy are you that ever you were born, thus to be found awake at the Lord's calling. "Well done, good and faithful servant, because thou hast been faithful in small matters, he shall set thee over great things, and thou shalt enter into the joy of thy Lord."

O dear brother, what meaneth this, that you are sent into your own native country? The wisdom and policy of the world may mean what they will, but I trust God will so order the matter finally by his fatherly providence, that some great occasion of God's gracious goodness shall be plentifully poured abroad amongst our dear brethren in that country by this your martyrdom, where the martyrs for Christ's sake shed their blood, and lost their lives. O what wondrous things hath Christ afterwards wrought to his glory, and confirmation of their doctrine? If it be not the place that sanctifieth the man, but the holy man doth by Christ sanctify the place, brother Bradford, then happy and holy shall be that place wherein thou shalt suffer, and shall be with thy ashes in Christ's cause sprinkled over withal. All thy country may rejoice of thee, that it ever brought forth such a one, which would render his life again in his cause of whom he had received it. Brother Bradford, so long as I shall understand thou art in thy journey, by God's grace I shall call upon our heavenly Father for Christ's sake to set thee safely home: and then, good brother, speak you, and pray you for the remnant which are to suffer for Christ's sake, according to that thou then shalt know more clearly.

We do look now every day when we shall be called on, blessed be God. I think I am the weakest many ways of our company; and yet I thank our Lord God and heavenly Father by Christ, that since I heard of our dear brother Rogers's departing, and stout confession of Christ and his truth, even unto death, my heart (blessed be God) rejoiced for it, that since that time (I say) I never never felt any great heaviness in my heart, as I grant I have felt some time before. O good brother, blessed be God in thee, and blessed be the time that ever I knew thee. Farewel, farewel.

Your brother in Christ,
NICHOLAS RIDLEY.

LETTER VI.

To the BRETHREN remaining in CAPTIVITY, and dispersed abroad in sundry PRISONS, but knit together in Unity of Spirit and Holy Religion, in the Bowels of the LORD JESUS.

GRACE, peace, and mercy, be multiplied among you. What worthy thanks can we render unto the Lord for you my brethren, namely, for the great consolation which through you we have received in the Lord, who notwithstanding the rage of Satan, that goeth about by all manner of subtle means to beguile the world, and also busily labourereth to restore and set up his kingdom again, that of late began to decay and fall to ruin; you remain yet still immoveable, as men surely grounded upon a strong rock. And now, albeit that Satan by his soldiers and wicked ministers, daily (as we hear) draweth numbers unto him, so that it is said of him, that he plucketh the very stars out of heaven, while he driveth into some men the fear of death, and loss of all their goods, and sheweth to others the pleasant baits of the world; namely, riches, wealth, and all kinds of delights and pleasures, fair houses, great revenues, fat benefices, and what not; and all to the intent that they should fall down and worship, not the Lord, but the dragon, the old serpent, which is the devil, that great beast and his image, and should be enticed to commit fornication with the strumpet of Babylon, together with the kings of the earth, with the lesser beast, and with the false prophets, and so to rejoice and be pleasant with her, and to get drunk with the wine of her fornication; yet blessed be God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which hath given unto you a manly courage, and hath so strengthened you in the inward man, by the power of his Spirit, that you can condemn as well all the allurements of the world, esteeming them as vanities, mere trifles, and things of nought; who hath also wrought, planted, and surely established in your hearts, so stedfast a faith and love of the Lord Jesus Christ, joined with such constancy, that by no engines of Antichrist, be they ever so terrible or plausible, you will suffer any other Jesus, or any other Christ, to be forced upon you, besides him whom the prophets have spoken of before, the apostles have preached, the holy martyrs of God have confessed and testified with the effusion of their blood.

In this faith stand you fast, my brethren, and suffer not yourselves to be brought under the yoke of bondage and superstition any more. For you know, brethren, how our Saviour warned us beforehand, that such should come as would point unto the world another Christ, and would set him out with so many false miracles, and with such deceivable and subtle practices, that even the very elect (if it were possible) should thereby be deceived: such strong delusion to come did our Saviour give warning of before. But continue you faithful and constant, and be of good comfort, and remember that our great captain hath overcome the world; for he that is in us, is stronger than he that is in the world, and the Lord promiseth us, that for the elect's sake, the days of wickedness shall be shortened. In the mean season abide you and endure with patience as you have begun: endure I say, and reserve yourselves unto better times, as one of the heathen poets said; cease not to shew yourselves valiant soldiers of the Lord, and help to maintain the travelling faith of the gospel.

You have need of patience, that after you have done the will of God you may receive the promises. "For yet a very little, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry; and the just shall live by faith; but if any withdraw himself, my soul shall have no pleasure in him (saith the Lord). But we are not they which do withdraw ourselves unto damnation, but believe in the salvation of the soul." Let us not suffer these of Christ to fall out of our hearts by any manner of terror, or threatenings of the world. Fear not them that kill the body, the rest you know. For I write not unto you, as men which are ignorant of the truth, but unto you, as men which are ignorant of the truth, but know the truth, and to this end only, that we agree together in one faith, may comfort one another, and more confirmed and strengthened thereby. We have had a better, or more just cause either to condemn life, or shed our blood; we cannot take in hand the defence of a more certain, clear, and manifest truth. It is not any ceremony for which we contend; but toucheth the very substance of our whole religion, even Christ himself. Shall we, or can we receive another Christ instead of him, who is alone the everlasting Son of the everlasting Father, and is the brightness of the glory, and a lively image of the substance of the Father, in whom only dwelleth corporally the fulness of the Godhead, who is the only way, the truth, and the life? Let such wickedness (my brethren), let such horrible wickedness be far from us. For although there be called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, there be many gods, and many lords, yet unto us there is but one God, who is the Father, of whom are all things, and we by him; but every man hath not knowledge. "This is life eternal, (saith St. John) that they know thee to be the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." If any therefore would follow upon us any other God, besides him whom Paul and the apostles have taught, let us not hear him, but let us fly from, and hold him accursed.

Brethren, you are not ignorant of the deep and profound subtilties of Satan; for he will not cease to range about you, seeking by all means possible whom he may devour: but play you the men, and be of good comfort in the Lord. And although your enemies be the adversaries of the truth, armed with all worldly force and power that may be, do set upon you; yet be you not faint-hearted, and shrink not therefore, but trust unto your captain Christ, trust unto the Spirit of truth, and trust to the truth of your cause; which as it may by the malice of Satan be darkened, so can it never be clean put out. For we have (high praise be given to God therefore) most plainly, evidently, and clearly on our side, all the prophets, all the apostles, and undoubtedly all the ancient ecclesiastical writers which have written until of late years past.

Let us be hearty and of good courage therefore, and thoroughly comfort ourselves in the Lord. Be in no wise afraid of your adversaries; for that which is to them an occasion of perdition, is to you a sure token of salvation, and that of God. For unto you it is given that not only you should believe on him, but also suffer for his sake. And when you are railed upon for the name of Christ, remember that by the voice of Peter, yea, and of Christ our Saviour also, ye are counted with the prophets, with the apostles, and with the holy martyrs of Christ, happy and blessed for ever: for the glory and Spirit of God resteth upon you.

On their part our Saviour Christ is evil spoken of, but on your part he is glorified. For what can they else do unto you by persecuting you, and working all cruelty and villainy against you, but make your crown more glorious, yea beautify and multiply the same, and heap upon themselves the horrible plagues and heavy wrath of God: and therefore, good brethren, though they rage ever so fiercely against us, yet let us not retaliate evil unto them again, knowing that while for Christ's cause they vex and persecute us, they are like mad men most outrageous and cruel against themselves, heaping hot burning coals upon their own heads: but rather will we well unto them, knowing that we are thereunto called in Christ Jesus, that we should be heirs of the blessing. Let us pray therefore unto God, that he would drive out of their hearts this darkness of errors, and make the light of his truth to shine unto them, that they acknowledging their blindness, may with all humble repentance be converted unto the Lord, and with us confess him to be the only true God, which is the Father of light, and his only

Jesus Christ, worshipping him in spirit and truth, en. The Spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ comfort hearts in the love of God, and patience of Christ, en.

Your brother in the Lord, whose name this bearer shall signify unto you, ready always by the grace of God to live and die with you.

LETTER VII.

our BISHOP RIDLEY to the BRETHREN which constantly cleave unto CHRIST, in suffering Affliction with him and for his Sake.

RACE and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ, be multiplied unto you, en.

Although, brethren, we have of late heard nothing of you, neither have at this present any news to send you; yet we thought good to write something unto you, whereby you might understand that we have good remembrance of you continually, as we doubt not but have of us also. When this messenger, coming to us from you of late, had brought unto us good tidings of your great constancy, fortitude and patience in the Lord, we were filled with much joy and gladness, giving thanks to God the Father through our Lord Jesus Christ, which hath caused his face so to shine upon you, and with the light of spiritual understanding hath so quickened your hearts, that now being in captivity and bonds for Christ's cause, you have not ceased as much as in you lieth, by words, but much more by deeds and by your example, to establish and confirm that thing, which when you were at liberty in the world, you laboured to publish and set abroad by the word and doctrine: that is to say, holding fast the word of life, you shine as lights in the world, in the midst of a wicked and crooked nation, and that with much the greater glory of our Lord Jesus Christ, and profit of your brethren, by how much Satan more belily now rageth, and busily laboureth to darken the light of the gospel.

And as for the darkness that Satan now bringeth upon the church of England, who needeth to doubt thereof? Of late time our Saviour Christ, his apostles, prophets, and teachers, spake in the temple to the people of England in the English tongue, so that they might be plainly understood by the godly, and such as sought for heavenly knowledge in matters, which of necessity pertained to the obtaining of eternal life; but now those things which were written by them for the edifying of the congregation, are read in a strange tongue without interpretation, manifestly against St. Paul's commandment, that there is no man able to understand them, who hath not learned that strange and unknown tongue.

Of late days those heavenly mysteries, whereby Christ hath ingrafted us into his body, and hath united one to another, whereby also being regenerate, and renewed in a new to God, he hath nourished, increased, and strengthened us, whereby moreover either he hath taught and set forth an order amongst them which are whole, or else to the sick in soul or body, hath given, as it were, wholesome medicines and remedies; those (I say) were plainly set forth to the people in their own language; that what great and exceeding good things every one had to another by God's ordinance, what every one had professed in his vocation, and was bound to observe, that remedy was to be had for the wicked and feeble, to whom God hath given a desire and willing heart to understand these things, might soon perceive and understand. But now all these things are taught and set forth in such sort, that the people redeemed with Christ's blood, and for whose sakes they were by Christ himself ordained, can have no manner of understanding thereof at all.

Of late (so far as we know not how to pray as ought) our Lord Jesus Christ in his prayer, whereof No. 26, he would have no man ignorant, and also the Holy Ghost in the Psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs which are set forth in the Bible, did teach and instruct all the people of England in the English tongue, that they might ask such things as are according to the will of the Father, and might join their hearts and lips in prayer together; but now all these things are commanded to be hid and shut up from them in a strange tongue, whereby it must needs follow, that the people can neither tell how to pray, nor what to pray for; and how can they join their hearts and voice together, when they understand no more what the voice signifieth than a brute beast?

Finally, I hear say, that the catechism, which was lately set forth in the English tongue, is now in every pulpit condemned. O devilish malice, and most spitefully injurious to the salvation of mankind purchased by Jesus Christ! Indeed Satan could not long suffer that so great light should be spread abroad in the world; he saw well enough that nothing was able to overthrow his kingdom so much, as if children being instructed in religion should learn to know Christ whilst they are yet young; whereby not only children, but the elder sort also, and aged people that were not taught before how to know Christ in their childhood, should now even with children and babes, be forced to learn to know him. Now therefore he roareth, now he rageth. But what else do they (brethren) who serve Satan, and become his ministers and slaves in maintaining his impiety, but even the same which they did, to whom Christ our Saviour threateneth this curse in the gospel; "Woe unto you who shut up the kingdom of heaven before men, and take away the key of knowledge from them; you yourselves have not entered in, neither have ye suffered them that would enter, to come in."

And from whence shall we say (brethren) that this horrible and mischievous darkness proceedeth, which is now brought upon the world? From whence I pray you, but even from the smoke of the great furnace of the bottomless pit, so that the sun and the air are now darkened by the smoke of the pit? Now, even now, (out of doubt, brethren) the pit is opened against us, and the locusts begin to swarm, and Abaddon now reigneth.

Ye therefore (my brethren) which pertain unto Christ, and have the seal of God marked in your foreheads; that is, are sealed with an earnest of the Spirit to be a peculiar people of God, quit yourselves like men, and be strong; for he that is in us, is stronger than he that is in the world; and you know that all who are born of God overcome the world, even our faith. Let the world fret, let it rage ever so much, be it ever so cruel and bloody, yet be you sure that no man can take us out of the Father's hands: for he is greater than all, who hath not spared his own Son, but hath given him to death for us all; and therefore how shall he not with him give us all things also? Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth, who then shall condemn? It is Christ that is dead, yea rather which is risen again, who also is at the right hand of God, and maketh request also for us. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or anguish, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or the sword? The rest you know, brethren. We are certainly persuaded with St. Paul, by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that no kind of thing shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. Which thing, that it may come to pass by the grace and mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ, to the comfort both of you and of us all, as we for our parts will continually (God willing) pray for you; so (dear brethren in the Lord) with all earnest and hearty request we beseech you, even in the bowels of our Lord Jesus Christ, that you will not cease to pray for us. Fare you well, dear brethren. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all evermore, Amen.

NICHOLAS RIDLEY.
LET-

From BISHOP RIDLEY, in Answer to a certain LETTER of one Mr. WEST, sometime his CHAPLAIN.

I Wish you grace in God, and love of the truth, without which truly established in men's hearts by the mighty hand of Almighty God, it is no more possible to stand by the truth in Christ in time of trouble, than it is for the wax to abide the heat of the fire. Sir, you know this, that I am, blessed be God, persuaded that this world is but transitory, and (as St. John saith) "The world passeth away and the lust thereof." I am persuaded that Christ's words be true; "Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. And I believe that no earthly creature shall be saved, whom the Redeemer and Saviour of the world shall before his Father deny. This the Lord grant, that it may be so grafted, fixed, and established in my heart, that neither things present nor to come, high nor low, life nor death, be able to remove me thence. It is a goodly wish, that you wish me deeply to consider the things pertaining unto God's glory; but if you had wished also, that neither fear of death, nor hope of worldly prosperity should hinder me to maintain God's word and his truth, which is his glory and true honour, it would have pleased me well. You desire me, for God's sake, to remember myself. Indeed, sir, now it is time so to do; for, so far as I can perceive, it standeth me upon no less danger, than of the loss both of body and soul; and I think it is time for a man to awake, if any thing will awake him. He that will not fear him that threateneth to cast both body and soul into everlasting fire, whom will he fear? With this fear, O Lord, fasten thou together our frail flesh, that we never swerve from thy laws. You say you have made much suit for me. Sir, God grant that you have not, in suing for my worldly deliverance, impaired and hindered the furtherance of God's word and his truth. You have known me long indeed; in which time I happened, as you say, to mistake some things. I grant it is true: for sudden changes without substantial and necessary cause, and the hasty setting forth of extremities, I did never love. Confession unto the minister who is able to instruct, correct, comfort, and inform the weak, wounded, and ignorant conscience, indeed I ever thought might do much good in Christ's congregation, and so I assure you, I think even at this day. My doctrine and my preaching, you say, you have heard often, and after your judgment have thought it godly, saving only for the sacrament, which thing, although it was by me reverently handled, and a great deal better than of the rest (as you say), yet in the margin you write warily, and in this world wisely; and yet methought all sounding not well. Sir, but that I see so many changes in this world, and so much alteration, else at this your saying I would not a little marvel. I have taken you for my friend, and a man whom I fancied for plainness and faithfulness, as much, I assure you, as for your learning; and have you kept this so close in your heart from me unto this day? Sir, I consider more things than one, and will not say all that I think. But what need you to care what I think, for any thing I shall be able to do to you, either good or harm? You give me good lessons to stand in nothing against my learning, and to beware of vain-glory. Truly, I herein like your counsel very well, and by God's grace I intend to follow it unto my life's end.

To write unto those whom you name, I cannot see what it will avail me. For this I would have you know, that I esteem nothing available for me, which will not also further the glory of God. And now, because I perceive you have an entire zeal and desire of my deliverance out of this captivity and worldly misery, if I should not bear you a good heart in God again, methinks I were to blame. Sir, how nigh the day of my dissolution and departure out of this world is at hand, I cannot tell: the Lord's will be fulfilled how soon soever it shall come. I know the Lord's words must be verified on me, that I shall appear before the incorrupt Judge, and be accountable to him for all my former life. And though the hope of his mercies is my sheet-anchor to eternal salvation, yet am I persuaded, that whosoever wittingly neglecteth and regardeth not to clear his conscience, he cannot have peace with God, nor a lively faith in his mercy. Conscience therefore moveth me considering you were one of my family, and one of my household, of whom then I think I had a special care, and of all them which were within my house, which indeed ought to have been an example of godliness to the rest of my care, not only of good life, but also promoting of God's word to the uttermost of my power, (but alas! now when the trial doth separate the chaff from the corn, how small a quantity it is, God knoweth, which the wind doth not blow away) this conscience, I say, doth move me to fear, lest the light of my family shall be laid to my charge for lack of my earnest and diligent instruction, which should have been done. But blessed be God who hath given me grace to see this my fault, and to lament it from the bottom of my heart, before my departing hence.

This conscience doth also move me now to require both you and my friend Dr. Harvey, to remember your promises made to me in times past, of the pure setting forth and preaching of God's word and his truth. These promises although you need not fear being charged with them by me hereafter before the world, yet look for none other (I exhort you as my friends) but to be charged with them at God's hand. This conscience and the love that I bear unto you, biddeth me now say unto you both in God's name, fear God, and love the world: for God is able to cast both body and soul into hell-fire. When his wrath shall be suddenly kindled, blessed are all they that put their trust in him. And the saying of St. John is true, "All that is in the world, as the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but of the world; and the world passeth away, and the lusts thereof, but he that doth the will of God abideth for ever." If this gift of grace (which undoubtedly is necessarily required unto eternal salvation) were truly and unfeignedly grafted and firmly established in men's hearts, they would not be so light, so suddenly to shrink from the maintenance and confession of the truth as is now, alas! manifestly seen of so many in these days. But here, peradventure, you would know of me, what is the truth. Sir, God's word is the truth, as St. John saith, and that even the same that was heretofore. For although men do vary and change as the moon, yet God's word is stable, and abideth one for evermore: and of Christ it is truly said, "Christ yesterday and to-day, the same is also for ever."

When I was in office, all that were esteemed learned in God's word, agreed this to be a truth in God's word written, that the Common Prayer of the church should be had in the common tongue. You know I have conferred with many, and I assure you, I never found a man, (so far as I do remember) neither old nor young, gospel-her nor papist, of what judgment soever he was, in this thing to be of a contrary opinion. If then it were a truth of God's word, think you that the alteration of the world can make it an untruth? If it cannot, why then do so many shrink from the confession and maintenance of this truth received once of us all? For what is it, I pray you, else to confess or deny Christ in this world, but to maintain the truth taught in God's word, nor for any worldly respect to shrink from the same? This one thing have I brought for an ensample; other things be in like case, which now particularly I need not rehearse. For he that will forsake knowingly, either for fear or gain of the world, any open truth of God's word, if he be constrained, he will assuredly forsake God and all his truth, rather than he will endanger himself to lose or to leave what he loveth better indeed than he doth God and the truth of his word.

I like very well your plain speaking, wherein you say I must either agree or die, and I think that you mean the bodily death, which is common both to good and bad. Sir, I know I must die, whither I agree or no. But what folly were it then to make such agreement, by which I could never escape this death which is common to all, and also incur the guilt of death and eternal damnation? Lord grant that I may utterly detest this damnable agreement so long as I live. And because I dare not write this short earnest advertisement to me of love, and I think verily, wishing me to live and to die, therefore bearing you in my heart no less in God, than you do me in the world, I say unto you in the word of the Lord, (and what I say to you, I say to all my friends and lovers of us in God) that if you will not confess and maintain to your power and knowledge that which is grounded upon God's word, but will rather for fear or gain of the world shrink and play the hypocrite, indeed you shall die the death; you know what I mean. And I beseech you all true friends and lovers of God, remember what I say, for this may be the last peradventure that ever I shall write unto you.

From Bocardo, in Oxford, April 8, 1555.

NICHOLAS RIDLEY.

Mr. Grindal (afterwards archbishop of Canterbury) being in the time of exile in the city of Francfort, wrote Dr. Ridley, then prisoner, a certain epistle, wherein he lamenteth his captivity, exhorting him withal to be constant. Secondly, He certifieth him of the English exiles being dispersed in Germany, and of the singular providence of God in stirring up the magistrates and rulers there towards them. Thirdly, He writeth to know his mind and will concerning the printing of his book against transubstantiation, and of other treatises and his disputations. Whereunto bishop Ridley answered him as follows.

LETTER IX.

From Dr. RIDLEY, in Answer to Mr. GRINDAL.

BLESSED be God our heavenly Father, which inclined your heart to have such a desire to write to me, and blessed be he again which hath heard your request, and brought your letters safe unto my hands; and over all this I bless him through our Lord Jesus Christ, for the great comfort I have received by the use of the knowledge of your state, and of other our dearly beloved brethren and countrymen in those parts beyond the sea.

Dearly beloved brother Grindal, I say to you and all the rest of our brethren in Christ with you, rejoice in the Lord, and as you love me, and the others my reverend fathers and fellow-prisoners, (which undoubtedly the Gloria Christi) lament not our state, but I beseech you and them all to give to our heavenly Father, for his boundless mercies and unspeakable benefits, even in the midst of all our troubles given unto us, most hearty thanks. For know you, that as the weight of his cross hath increased upon us, so he hath not, nor doth he cease to multiply his mercies to strengthen us; and I trust, yea by his grace I doubt nothing, but he will do for Christ our master's sake even to the end. To assure that you and our other brethren do find favour and grace in your exile, with the magistrates, ministers, and citizens at Tigury, Francfort, and other places, it doth greatly comfort (I dare say) all here that do love Christ and his true word. I do assure you it warmed my heart, to hear you by chance name some, as Scory, Cox, &c. O that it had come in your mind to have said somewhat also of Cheek, Turner, Leaver, Sampson, and Chambers, but I trust in God they be all well. And seeing you say, that there be in those parts with you students and ministers so good a number, now therefore care you not for us, otherwise than to wish that God's glory may be set forth by us. For whensoever God shall call us home (as we look daily for no other, but when it shall please God to say, Come) you, blessed be God, are enough, through his aid, to light and set up again the lanthorn of his word in England. As concerning the copies you say you have with you, I wonder how they ever did or could find the way to come to you. My disputation, except you have that which I gathered myself after the disputation was done, I cannot think you have it truly. If you have that, then you have therewithal the whole manner after which I was used in the disputation.

As for the treatise in English against transubstantiation, I cannot think it worth translating into Latin, nor would I have you translate any other of my writing, till you are certain how the Lord will dispose of me. And thus much concerning your letters. Now although I suppose you know a good part of our condition here, (for we are forth coming, even as when you departed, &c.) you shall understand that I was in the Tower about the space of two months close prisoner, and after that had granted to me, without my labour, the liberty of the Tower, and so continued about half a year; and then, because I refused to allow the mass with my presence, I was shut up in prison again.

The last Lent save one, it chanced by reason of the tumult stirred up in Kent, there were so many prisoners in the Tower, that my lord of Canterbury, Mr. Latimer, Mr. Bradford, and I, were put all together in one prison, where we remained until almost Easter, and then we three, Canterbury, Latimer, and I, were suddenly sent a little before Easter, and were suffered to have nothing with us, but what we carried upon us. About the Whitsuntide following were our disputations at Oxford, after which all was taken from us, as pen, ink, &c. Our own servants were taken from us before, and every one had a strange man put to him, and each of us were appointed to be kept in separate places, as we are unto this day.

Blessed be God, we three at the writing hercof were in good health, and (in God) of good cheer. We expected long ago to have been dispatched, for we were all three on one day condemned as heretics by Dr. Weston, (he being the head commissioner) within a day or two of our disputations, and ever since we remain here as we were by him left. The Lord's will be fulfilled in us, as I doubt not but by his grace it shall be to his glory, and our eternal salvation, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Likewise the Lord hath hitherto preserved, above all our expectation, our dear brother, and in Christ's cause a strong champion, John Bradford. He is also condemned, and is already delivered to the secular power, and writs (as we have heard say) given out for his execution, and called in again.

Thus the Lord, so long as his blessed pleasure is, preserveth whom he listeth, notwithstanding the wonderful raging of the world. Many (as we hear say) have valiantly suffered, confessing Christ's truth, and nothing yielding to the adversary, no, not for the fear or pains of death.

The names of them which I knew, and have now suffered, are these; Farrar, bishop of St. David's; Hooper, bishop of Worcester; Rogers, your fellow-prebend; Dr. Taylor, of Hadley; Mr. Sanders, and one Tomkins, a weaver; and now this last day, Mr. Cardmaker, with another, were burnt at Smithfield, in London, and many others in Essex and Kent, whose names are written in the book of life, whom yet I do not know.

West, your old companion, and sometime my officer, (alas!) hath relented, (as I have heard) but the Lord hath shortened his days, for soon after he died, and is gone. Grimbold was caught by the heel, and cast into the Marshalsea, but now is at liberty again; but I fear he escaped not without bowing his knee to Baal.

My dear friend Thomas Ridley, of the Bull-head, in Cheap, which was to me the most faithful friend that I had in my trouble, is departed also unto God. My brother Shipside, that married my sister, hath been almost half a year in prison, for delivering (as he was accused) of certain things from me; but now, thanks be to God, he is at liberty again, but so that the bishop hath taken from him his park.

Of all us three prisoners in Oxford, I am kept most strict, and with least liberty; either because the man in whose house I am a prisoner is governed by his wife, who is a morose, superstitious old woman, and thinks she shall merit by having me very closely confined; for the man himself, whose name is Irish, is civil enough to all, but too much ruled by his wife. Though I never had a wife, yet from this daily usage I begin to understand how great and intolerable a burthen it is to have a bad one.

one. The wise man says rightly, A good wife is the gift of God: and again, Blessed is the man who hath a good wife. Or else I say the reason is, (for I know not from which) that he is so commanded from the higher powers, which is what he pleads, when I complain of my hard usage.

At Cambridge, (as I hear say) all the reformation of students and statutes which were lately made, are now undone; and all things are reduced to their ancient confusion and popish superstition. All the heads of colleges who preached the sincere word of God, or favoured it, are turned out, and others of the popish faction put in their places; insomuch that I hear no one can be admitted a fellow of a college, that will not bow the knee to Baal. Nor do I wonder, since it is so throughout the whole realm of England, among archbishops, bishops, priests, and deacons, and the whole body of the clergy. And to tell you much naughty matter in few words, Popery every where reigns among us in it's full and ancient force.

The Lord be merciful, and for Christ's sake pardon us our old unkindness and unthankfulness: for when he poured upon us the gifts of his manifold graces and favours, alas! we did not serve him, nor render thanks unto him according to the same. We pastors, many of us were too cold, and bore too much with the wicked world; our magistrates did abuse, to their own worldly gain, both God's gospel and the ministers of the same. The people in many places were unruly and unkind. Thus of every side and of every sort we have provoked God's anger and wrath to fall upon us: but blessed may he be that hath not suffered his to continue in those ways which so wholly have displeased his sacred majesty, but hath awaked them by the fatherly correction of his own Son's cross, unto his glory and our endless salvation, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

My daily prayer is (as God doth know) and by God's grace shall be so long as I live in this world, for you my dear brethren, that are fled out of your own country, because you will rather forsake all worldly things, than the truth of God's word. It is even the same that I use to make to God for all those churches abroad through the world, which have forsaken the kingdom of Antichrist, and professed openly the purity of the gospel of Jesus Christ; that is, that God our eternal Father, for our Saviour Christ's sake, will daily increase in you the gracious gift of his heavenly Spirit, to the true setting forth of his glory and of his gospel, and make you agree brotherly in the truth of the same, that there arise no root of bitterness among you, that may affect that good seed which God hath sown in your hearts already, and finally that your life may be so pure and so honest, according to the rule of God's word, and according to that vocation whereunto we are called by the gospel of Christ our Saviour, that the honesty and purity of the same may provoke all that shall see or know it, to the love of your doctrine, and to love you for honesty and virtue's sake, and so both in brotherly unity of your true doctrine, and also in the godly virtue of your honest life, to glorify our Father which is in heaven.

Several of our magistrates, viz. the chancellor of Winchester, earl of Arundel, and lord Paget, are ambassadors with cardinal Poole, beyond the seas, to make peace (as it is said) between the emperor, our realm, and the king of France. After whose return, and the delivery of the queen, which we daily expect, and have long expected, and which God, for the glory of his name, grant to be a safe and happy one, then shall we expect from the old enemy of our profession, soon to receive triumphant crowns in the Lord.

I humbly with my whole heart commend me to all your prayers, and first to your's, O most dear brother in Christ, and my most beloved Grindal, to your's most dear, and together with my beloved in the Lord, Cheek, Cox, Turner, Lever, Sampson, Chambers, and all our brethren and fellow-countrymen who live amongst you, and love our Lord Jesus Christ in truth. I commend also to you the reverend fathers in God, and my fellow captives in the Lord, Thomas Cranmer, now most worthy of the name of a true great pastor and archbishop; and that old foldier of Christ, and apostle of our English nation, Hugh Latimer. I have given myself the greater length in this letter, most dear brother, because after this I am persuaded they will be too short to trouble you.

Oxford.

NICHOLAS RIDLEY.

LETTER X.

From Dr. RIDLEY to AUGUSTINE BERNHARD.

BROTHER AUGUSTINE, I bless God with my heart in his manifold merciful gifts, given unto our dear brethren in Christ, especially to our brother Rogers, whom it pleased him to set forth first, without doubt out of his gracious goodness and fatherly favour towards him. And likewise blessed be God in the rest as Hooper, Sanders, and Taylor, whom it hath pleased the Lord to set in the fore-front of the battle against his adversaries, and hath endued them all (so far as I can hear) to stand in the confession of his truth, and to be content in his cause, and for his gospel's sake to lose their lives. And evermore and without end, blessed be even the same our heavenly Father, for our dear and entirely beloved brother Bradford, whom now the Lord (I perceive) calleth for; for I believe he will no longer vouchsafe him to abide among the adulterous and wicked generation of this world. I do not doubt but that he (for those gifts of grace which the Lord hath bestowed on him plentifully) hath helped those which have gone before in their journey, that is, hath animated them to keep the highway, and so to run, that at length they may receive the reward. The Lord be his comfort, whereof I do not doubt, and I thank God heartily that ever I was acquainted with him, and that ever I had such a one in my house. And yet again I bless God in our dear brother, and of this time proclaiming martyr Rogers, that he was also one of my calling to be a prebendary preacher of London. And now because Grindal is gone (the Lord I doubt not hath and knoweth wherein he will bestow him) I trust to God it shall please him of his goodness to strengthen me to make up the trinity out of Paul's church, to suffer for Christ whom God the Father hath anointed, the Holy Spirit doth bear witness unto, Paul and all the apostles preached. Therefore fare you well, I had no paper, I was constrained then to write.

N. RIDLEY.

The LIFE of Bishop LATIMER, a famous PREACHER and worthy MARTYR of CHRIST.

NOW consequently after the life of bishop Ridley followeth the life of that valiant champion, and old disciplined foldier of Christ, bishop Hugh Latimer, who was the son of one Hugh Latimer, of Thirkeffon, in the county of Leicestershire, a husbandman in good repute, with whom he was brought up till he was about four years old: at which time his parents, (having him as then left for their only son, with six daughters) seeing him to be of a ready, prompt, and sharp wit, purposed to train him up in erudition and knowledge of good literature; wherein he so profited in the common schools of his own country, that at fourteen years of age he was sent to the university of Cambridge: where, after some continuance in the exercise of other things, he gave himself up to the study of such school divinity, as the ignorance of that age would suffer. Zealous he was then in the popish religion, and therefore with so scrupulous, as himself confessed, that being a priest, and using to say mass, he was so servile an observer of the Romish decrees, that he thought he had never sufficiently mingled his massing wine with water; and moreover, that he should never be damned, if he were once a professed friar, with divers of such superstitious fantasies. And in this blind zeal he was a very enemy to the professors of Christ's gospel; as both his oration made when he commenced bachelor of divinity, against Melancthon, and also his other works did plainly declare. Especially especially in those days his popish zeal could in no case abide good Mr. Stafford, reader of the divinity lectures in Cambridge, most spitefully railing against him, and perswading the youth of Cambridge in no wise to believe him.

Notwithstanding, such was the goodness and merciful purpose of God, that when he saw his good time, by which he thought utterly to have defaced the professors of the gospel, and true church of Christ, he was at length himself by a member of the same prettily caught in the blessed net of God's word. For Mr. Thomas Bilney being at that time a trier out of Satan's subtilties, and a secret overthrower of Antichrist's kingdom, seeing Mr. Latimer to have a zeal in his way, (although not according to knowledge) was stricken with a brotherly pity towards him, and began to consider by what means he might win this zealous ignorant brother to the true knowledge of Christ. Wherefore, after a short time, he came to Mr. Latimer's study, and desired him to hear him make his confession, which he willingly did; and by hearing thereof, he was, by the good Spirit of God, so touched, that thereupon he forsook the study of the school-doctors, and other such fopperies, and became an earnest student in true divinity, as he himself, as well in his conference with bishop Ridley, as also in his first sermon made upon the Pater-Noster, doth confess. So that whereas before he was an enemy, and almost a persecutor of Christ, he was now a zealous seeker after him, changing his old manner of cavilling and railing, into a diligent kind of conferring, both with Mr. Bilney and others, and came also to Mr. Stafford before he died, and desired him to forgive him.

After his own conversion, he was not satisfied without endeavouring that of others, and like a true disciple of the blessed Samaritan, pitied the misery of others, and therefore became both a public preacher, and also a private instructor to the rest of his brethren within the university, by the space of three years, spending his time partly in the Latin tongue among the learned, and partly amongst the simple people in his natural and vulgar language. Howbeit, as Satan never sleepeth when he seeth his kingdom begin to decay, so likewise now, seeing that this worthy member of Christ would be a terrible shaker thereof, he raised up his impious imps to molest and trouble him.

Amongst these there was an Augustine friar, who took occasion upon certain sermons that Mr. Latimer made about Christmas, 1529, as well in the church of St. Edward, as also in St. Augustine's, within the university of Cambridge, to inveigh against him, for that Mr. Latimer in the said sermons (alluding to the common usage of the season) gave the people certain cards out of the 5th, 6th, and 7th chapters of St. Matthew, whereupon they might, not only then, but always else occupy their time. For the chief triumph in the cards he limited the heart, as the principal thing they should serve God withal, whereby he quite overthrew all hypocritical and external ceremonies, not tending to the necessary furtherance of God's holy word and sacraments. For the better attaining hereof, he wished the scriptures to be in English, whereby the common people might the better learn their duty, as well to God as to their neighbours.

The handling of this matter was so apt for the time, and so pleasantly applied by him, that it not only declared the wit and dexterity of the preacher, but also wrought in the hearers much fruit, to the overthrow of popish superstition, and setting up of perfect religion.

This was upon the Sunday before Christmas-day; on which day coming to the church, and causing the bell to be tolled to a sermon, he entered into the pulpit, taking for his text the words of the gospel aforesaid, read in the church that day, "Who art thou?" &c. In delivering which cards (as is aforesaid) he made the heart to be Triumph, exhorting and inviting all men thereby to serve the Lord with inward heart and true affection, and not with outward ceremonies: adding moreover, to the praise of that Triumph, that though it were ever so small, yet it would take up the best court card beside in the bunch, yea, though it were the king of clubs, &c. meaning thereby how the Lord

would be worshipped and served in simplicity of heart and verity, wherein consisteth true christian religion, and not in the outward deeds of the letter only, or in the glittering shew of man's traditions, or pardons, pilgrimages, ceremonies, vows, devotions, voluntary works, and works of supererogation, foundations, oblations, the pope's supremacy, &c. so that all these either were needless, where the other is present; or else were of small estimation, in comparison of the other. The tenor and effect of these his sermons, so far as they could come to our hands, here followeth.

The Tenor and Effect of certain SERMONS, made by Mr. LATIMER in CAMBRIDGE, about the Year of our Lord 1529.

TU quis es? Which words are as much as to say in English, "Who art thou?" These be the words of the Pharisees, which were sent by the Jews unto St. John Baptist in the wilderness, to have knowledge of him, who he was; which words they spake unto him of an evil intent, thinking that he would have taken on him to be Christ, and so they would have had him done by their good wills, because they knew that he was more carnal and given to their laws, than Christ indeed should be, as they perceived by their old prophecies: and also, because they marvelled much at his great doctrine, preaching, and baptizing, they were in doubt whether he was Christ or not: wherefore they said unto him, "Who art thou?" Then answered St. John, and confessed that he was not Christ. Now here is to be noted the great and prudent answer of St. John Baptist unto the Pharisees, that when they required of him, who he was, he would not directly answer of himself, what he was himself; but he said he was not Christ, by which saying he thought to put the Jews and Pharisees out of their false opinion, and belief towards him, in that they would have had him to exercise the office of Christ, and so declared further unto them of Christ, saying, "He is in the midst of you, and amongst you, whom ye know not, the latchet of whose shoe I am not worthy to unloose." By this you may perceive that St. John spake much in the praise of his master Christ, professing himself to be in no wise like unto him. So likewise it shall be necessary unto all men and women of this world, not to ascribe unto themselves any goodness of themselves, but all unto our Lord God, as shall appear hereafter, when this question aforesaid [Who art thou?] shall be moved unto them: not as the Pharisees did unto St. John, of an evil purpose, but of a good and simple mind, as may appear hereafter.

Now then, according to the preacher's mind, let every man and woman, of a good and simple mind, contrary to the Pharisees' intent, ask this question, Who art thou? This question must be moved to themselves, what they be of themselves, on this fashion, What art thou of thy only and natural generation between father and mother, when thou camest into the world? What substance, what virtue, what goodness art thou of thyself? Which question if thou rehearse oftentimes to thyself, thou shalt well perceive and understand, how thou shalt make answer to it: which must be made in this wise; I am of myself, and by myself, coming from my natural father and mother, the child of the anger and indignation of God, the true inheritor of hell, a lump of sin, and working nothing of myself, but all towards hell, except I have better help of another, than I have of myself. Now we may see in what state we enter into this world, that we be of ourselves the true and just inheritors of hell, the children of the ire and indignation of Christ, working all towards hell, whereby we deserve of ourselves perpetual damnation, by the right judgment of God, and the true claim of ourselves: which unthrifty state that we be born unto is come unto us for our own deserts, as proveth well this example following.

Let it be admitted for the probation of this, that it might please the king's grace now being, to accept into his favour a mean man, of simple degree and birth, not born to any possession; whom the king's grace favoureth, not because this person hath of himself deserved any such favour, but that the king casteth his favour unto him of his own mere motion and fancy: and because the king's grace will more declare his favour unto him, he giveth unto this said man a thousand pounds in lands, to him and his heirs, on this condition, that he shall take upon him to be the chief captain and defender of his town of Calais, and to be true and faithful to him in the custody of the same, against the Frenchmen especially above all other enemies.

This man taketh on him this charge, promising this fidelity thereunto; it chanceth in process of time, that by the singular acquaintance and frequent familiarity of this captain with the Frenchmen, these Frenchmen give unto the said captain of Calais a great sum of money, so that he will be but content and agreeable, that they may enter into the said town of Calais by force of arms, and so thereby possess the same unto the crown of France. Upon this agreement the Frenchmen do invade the said town of Calais, only by the negligence of this captain.

Now the king's grace hearing of this invasion, cometh with a great puissance to defend this his said town, and so by good policy of war overcometh the said Frenchmen, and entereth again into his said town of Calais. Then he being desirous to know how these enemies of his came thither, he maketh strict search and inquiry by whom this treason was conspired; by this search it was known and found his own captain to be the very author and the beginner of the betraying of it. The king, seeing the great infidelity of this person, dischargeth this man of his office, and taketh from him and his heirs this thousand pounds possessions. Think you not that the king doth use justice unto him, and all his posterity and heirs? Yes truly; the said captain cannot deny himself but that he had true justice, considering how unfaithfully he behaved himself to his prince, contrary to his own fidelity and promise: so likewise it was of our first father Adam. He had given unto him the spirit and science of knowledge, to work all goodness therewith; this said spirit was not given only to him, but unto all his heirs and posterity. He had also delivered him the town of Calais, that is to say, paradise in earth, the most strong and fairest town in the world, to be in his custody: he nevertheless, by the instigation of these Frenchmen, that is, the temptation of the fiend, did obey unto their desire, and so he broke his promise and fidelity, the commandment of the everlasting King his master, in eating of the apple by him prohibited.

Now then, the king seeing this great treason in his captain, dispossessed him of the thousand pounds of lands, that is to say, from everlasting life and glory, and all his heirs and posterity: for likewise as he had the spirit of science and knowledge for him and his heirs; so in like manner when he lost the same, his heirs also lost it by him, and in him. So now this example proveth, that by our father Adam we had once in him the very inheritance of everlasting joy; and by him, and in him again we lost the same.

The heirs of the captain of Calais could not by any manner of claim ask of the king the right and title of their father in the thousand pounds possessions, by reason the king might answer and say unto them, that although their father deserved not of himself to enjoy so great possessions, yet he deserved by himself to lose them, and greater, committing so high treason as he did, against his prince's commandments; whereby he had no wrong to lose his title, but was unworthy to have the same, and had therein true justice; let not you think which be his heirs, that if he had justice to lose his possessions, you have wrong to lose the same. In the same manner it may be answered unto all men and women now in being, that if our father Adam had true justice to be excluded from his possessions of everlasting glory in paradise, let us not think the contrary that be his heirs, but that we have no wrong in losing also the same; yea, we have true justice and right. Then in what miserable estate we be, that of the right and just title of our own deserts have lost the everlasting joy and claim of ourselves, to be true inheritors of hell? For he that committeth deadly sin willingly, bindeth himself to be an inheritor of everlasting pain: and so did our first father Adam willingly eat of the apple forbidden. Wherefore he was cast out of the everlasting joy in paradise, into this corrupt world amongst all vileness, whereby himself he was not worthy to do any thing laudable or pleasant to God, evermore bound to corrupt affections and beastly appetites, transformed into the uncleanness and most variable nature that was made under heaven, of whose seed and disposition all the world is lineally descended; inasmuch that this evil nature is so much diffused and shed from one into another, that at this day there is no man nor woman living, that can of themselves wash away this abominable vileness: and so we must needs grant of ourselves to be in like displeasure unto God, as our father Adam was; by reason hereof, as I said, we be of ourselves the very children of the indignation and vengeance of God, the true inheritors of hell, and working all towards hell, which is the answer to this question, made to every man and woman by themselves, Who art thou?

And now the world standing in this damnable state, cometh in the occasion of the incarnation of Christ; the Father in heaven perceiving the frail nature of man, that he by himself and of himself could do nothing for himself, by his prudent wisdom sent down the second Person in the Trinity, his Son Jesus Christ, to declare unto man his pleasure and commandment: and so at the Father's will Christ took on him human nature, being willing to deliver man out of this miserable way, and was content to suffer cruel passion in shedding his blood for all mankind, and so left behind for our safeguard, laws and ordinances, to keep us always in the right path unto everlasting life, as the gospels, the sacraments, the commandments, &c. which if we do keep and observe according to our profession, we shall answer better unto this question, [Who art thou?] than we did before: for before thou didst enter into the sacrament of baptism, thou wert but a natural man or a natural woman; as I might say, a man, a woman; but after thou takest on thee Christ's religion, thou hast a longer name; for then thou art a christian man, a christian woman. Now then, seeing thou art a christian man, what shall be the answer of this question, Who art thou?

The answer of this question is, when I ask it unto myself, I must say that I am a christian man, a christian woman, the child of everlasting joy, through the merits of the bitter passion of Christ. This is a joyful answer. Here we may see how much we be bound, and indebted unto God, that hath revived us from death to life, and saved us that were damned: which great benefit we cannot well consider, unless we do remember what we were of ourselves before we meddled with him or his laws: and the more we know our feeble nature, and set less by it, the more we shall conceive and know in our hearts what God hath done for us: and the more we know what God hath done for us, the less we shall set by ourselves, and the more we shall love and please God; so that in no condition we shall either know ourselves or God, except we do utterly confess ourselves to be mere vileness and corruption. Well, now it is come unto this point, that we be christian men, christian women, I pray you, what doth Christ require of a christian man, or of a christian woman? Christ requireth nothing else of a christian man or woman, but that they will observe his rule. For likewise as he is a good Augustine friar that keepeth well St. Augustine's rule, so is he a good christian man that keepeth well Christ's rule.

Now then what is Christ's rule? Christ's rule consisteth in many things, as in the commandments, and the works of mercy, and so forth. And because I cannot declare Christ's rule unto you at one time, as it ought to be done, I will apply myself according to your custom at this time of Christmas; I will, as I said, declare unto you Christ's rule, but that shall be in Christ's cards. And where you are wont to celebrate Christmas in playing at cards, I intend by God's grace to deal unto you Christ's cards, wherein you shall perceive Christ's rule.

the game that we will play at, shall be called triumph, which if it be well played at, he that shall win; the players shall likewise win, and lookers on shall do the same; insofar as there is no man that is willing to play at this with these cards, but they shall be all winners.

Therefore every christian man and woman play cards, that they may have and obtain the Triumph; you must mark also that the Triumph must approach home unto him all the other cards, whatbeit they be of. Now then take you this first which must appear and be shewed unto you as law. You have heard what was spoken to men of law, Thou shalt not kill; whosoever shall kill, is in danger of judgment. But I say unto you of law, faith Christ, that whosoever is angry with his neighbour, shall be in danger of judgment, and whosoever shall say unto his neighbour Racha, that is Brainless, or any other like word of rebuking, is in danger of a council; and whosoever shall call his neighbour, Fool, shall be in danger of hell. This card was made and spoken by Christ, as is written in the fifth chapter of St. Matthew.

It must be noted, that whosoever shall play with this card, must first, before they play with it, know the nature and virtue of the same; wherefore you must note and mark terms how they be spoken, and to what purpose: let us therefore read it once or twice, that we may be the better acquainted with it.

Behold and see, this card is divided into four parts. The first part is one of the commandments that was given unto Moses in the old law, before the coming of Christ, which commandment we of the new law are to observe and keep, and is one of our commandments.

The other three parts spoken by Christ, be nothing else but expositions to the first part of this commandment: for in very effect of all these four parts be the same commandment, that is to say, "Thou shalt not kill." Yet nevertheless, the three last parts do shew thee how many ways thou mayest kill thy neighbour, contrary to this commandment: yet for all Christ's declaration, in the three last parts of this card, the terms be so open enough to thee that dost read and hear them spoken. No doubt the Jews understood Christ well enough when he spake to them these three last sentences, for he spake unto them in their own natural terms and language: wherefore seeing that these terms were not terms of the Jews, it shall be necessary to explain them, and compare them unto some like terms of our natural speech, that we in like manner may understand Christ as well as the Jews did. We will begin with the first part of this card, and then after with the other three parts: you must therefore understand that the Jews and the Pharisees of the old law, to whom this first part, this commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," was spoken, thought it sufficient and enough for their charge not to kill with any material weapon, as sword, dagger, or with any such weapon, and they thought it was a great fault whatsoever they said or did by their neighbours, so that they did not harm or meddle with their corporal bodies, which was a false opinion in them, as is well the three last other sentences following the first part of this card.

Now as concerning the three other sentences, you must note and take heed what difference is between these three manner of offences: 1. To be angry with your neighbour. 2. To call your neighbour brainless, or any such word of disdain. 3. Or to call your neighbour fool: whether these three manner of offences be of themselves more grievous one than the other, it is to be considered unto you. Truly, as they be of themselves divers offences, so they kill diversly one more than the other, as you shall perceive by the first of these three, and so forth: A man which conceiveth against his neighbour or brother, anger or wrath in his mind, by the manner of occasion given unto him, and although he be angry in his mind against his said neighbour, he peradventure express his anger by no manner of word, either in word or deed; yet nevertheless he of-fendeth against God, and breaketh this commandment in killing his own soul; and is therefore in danger of judgment.

Now to the second part of these three: That man that is moved with anger against his neighbour, and in his anger calleth his neighbour brainless, or some other like word of displeasure; as a man might say in a fury, I shall handle thee well enough, which words and countenances do more represent and declare anger to be in this man, than in him that was but angry, and spake no manner of word, nor shewed any countenance to declare his anger: wherefore as he that so declareth his anger either by word or countenance, offendeth more against God, so he both killeth his own soul, and doth what in him is to kill his neighbour's soul in moving him to anger, wherein he is faulty himself, and so this man is in danger of a council.

Now to the third offence, and last of the three: That man that calleth his neighbour fool, doth more declare his angry mind towards him, than he that calleth his neighbour brainless, or any such word moving anger: but to call a man a fool, that word representeth more envy in a man, than brainless doth. Wherefore he doth most offend, because he doth most earnestly with such words express his anger, and so he is in danger of hell-fire: wherefore you must understand now these three parts of this card be three offences, and that one is more grievous to God than the other, and that one killeth more the soul of the man than the other.

Now peradventure there will be some that will marvel that Christ did not declare this commandment by some greater faults of anger, than by these which seem but small faults, as to be angry and speak nothing of it, to declare it and to call a man brainless, and to call his neighbour fool: truly these be the smallest, and the least faults that belong to anger, or to killing in anger. Therefore beware how you offend in any kind of anger: seeing that the smallest be damnable to offend in, see that you offend not in the greatest. For Christ thought, if he might bring you from the smallest manner of faults, and give you warning to avoid the least, he reckoned you would not offend in the greatest and worst, as to call your neighbour thief, whoreson, whore, drab, &c. into more blasphemous names, which offences must needs have punishment in hell, considering how that Christ hath appointed these three small faults, to have three degrees of punishment in hell, as appeareth by these three terms, judgment, council, and hell-fire; these three terms do signify nothing else but three divers punishments in hell, according to the offences. Judgment is less in degree than council, therefore it signifieth a lesser pain in hell, and it is ordained for him that is angry in his mind with his neighbour, and doth express his malice neither by word nor countenance. Council is a less degree in hell than hell-fire, and is a greater degree in hell than judgment, and it is ordained for him that calleth his neighbour brainless, or any such word that declareth his anger and malice: wherefore it is more pain than judgment. Hell-fire is more pain in hell than council or judgment, and it is ordained for him that calleth his neighbour fool, by reason that in calling his neighbour fool, he declareth more his malice, in that it is an earnest word of anger. Wherefore hell-fire is appointed for it, that is, the most pain of the three punishments.

Now you have heard, that to these divers offences of ire and killing, punishments are appointed according to their degrees: for observe, as the offence is, so shall the pain be: if the offence be great, the pain shall be accordingly: if it be less, there shall be less pain for it. I would not now that you should think because that here are but three degrees of punishment spoke of, that there be no more in hell: no doubt Christ spake of no more here but of these three degrees of punishment, thinking they were sufficient enough for example, whereby we might understand, that there are as many pains as there are offences: and so by these three offences, and these three punishments, all other offences and punishments may be compared with each other: yet I would satisfy your minds farther in these three terms, terms, judgment, council, and hell-fire. Where you might say, what was the cause that Christ declared more the pains of hell by these terms than by any other terms? I told you before that he knew well to whom he spake them; these terms were natural, and well known among the Jews and the Pharisees. Wherefore Christ taught them with their own terms, to the intent they might understand the better his doctrine: and these terms may be likened unto three terms which we have common and usual amongst us, that is to say, the sessions of inquirance, the sessions of deliverance, and the execution day: sessions of inquirance is like unto judgment; for when sessions of inquiry is, then the judges cause twelve men to give verdict of the felon's crime, whereby he shall be judged to be indicted: sessions of deliverance is much like council; for at sessions of deliverance the judges go among themselves to council, to determine sentence against the felon. Execution day is to be compared to hell-fire: for the Jews had a place of execution amongst themselves named Hell-fire: and surely when a man goeth to his death, it is the greatest pain in this world: wherefore you may see that there are degrees in these our terms, as there be in those terms. The evil disposed affections and sensualities in us are always contrary to the rule of our salvation. What shall we do now or imagine to thrust down these Turks, and to subdue them? It is a great ignominy and shame for a christian man to be bound and subject to a Turk: nay, it shall not be so, we will first cast a trump in their way, and play with them at cards who shall have the better; let us play therefore on this card. Whensoever it shall happen these foul passions and Turks to rise in our stomachs against our brother or neighbour, either for unkind words, injuries, or wrongs, which they have done unto us, contrary to our mind, straightways let us call unto our remembrance, and speak this question unto ourselves, Who art thou? The answer is, I am a christian man. Then further we must say to ourselves, What requireth Christ of a christian man? Now turn up your trump, your heart, (heart is trump, as I said before) and cast your trump, your heart, on this card, and upon this card you shall learn what Christ requireth of a christian man, not to be angry, nor moved to ire against his neighbour, in mind, countenance, nor otherwise by word or deed. Then take up this card with your heart, and lay them together; that done, you have won the game of the Turk, whereby you have defaced and overcome by true and lawful play: but, alas, for pity, the Rhodes are won and overcome by the false Turks, and strong castle faith is decayed, so that I fear it is almost impossible to win it again.

The great occasion of the loss of this Rhodes is, by reason that christian men do so daily kill their own nation, that the very true number of Christians is decayed: which murder and killing one of another is increased, especially two ways, to the utter undoing of Christendom, that is to say, by example and silence. By example thus: When the father, the mother, the lord, the lady, the master, the dame, be themselves overcome with these Turks, they be continual swearers, adulterers, disposers to malice, never in patience, and so forth in all other vices: think you not when the father, the mother, the master, the dame, be disposed unto vice or impatience, but that their children and servants shall incline and be disposed to the same? No doubt as the child shall take disposition natural of his father and mother, so shall the servants apply unto the vices of their masters and dames; if the heads be false in their faculties and crafts, it is no marvel if the children, servants, and apprentices do join therein. This is a great and shameful manner of killing christian men, that the fathers, the mothers, the masters, and the dames, shall not only kill themselves, but all their's, and all that belongeth unto them, and so this way is a great number of christian lineage murdered and spoiled. The second manner of killing is silence. By silence also is a great number of christian men slain; which is on this fashion: although the father and mother, master and dame, of themselves be well disposed to live after the law of God, yet they may kill their children and servants in suffering them to do evil before their faces, and do not use correction according to the fences; the master seeth his servant or apprentice more of his neighbour, than the king's laws, or the order of his faculty doth admit him, or he suffereth to take more of his neighbour than he himself be content to pay if he were in like condition doing, I say, such men kill willingly their children, servants, and shall go to hell for so doing: but fathers and mothers, masters and dames, shall be in company for so suffering. Wherefore I exhort christian men and women to give good example to your children and servants, and suffer not the silence to offend: every man must be in his own according to St. Augustine's mind, a bishop, not giving good example, but teaching according to the buke and punish vice, not suffering your children or servants to forget the laws of God: you ought to have their belief, to know the commandments of God, to keep their holy days, not to lose their idleness; if they do so, you shall all suffer pain if God be true of his saying, as there is no doubt of: and so you may perceive that there be many break this card, "Thou shalt not kill," and therewith oftentimes, at the blind trump, whereby be no winners, but great losers; but who be those a-days that can clear themselves of these manifest deeds used to their children and servants? I think the contrary, but that many have these two ways their own children unto their own damnation, where the great mercy of God ready to help them when they repent therefore.

Wherefore considering that we be so prone and to continue in sin, let us cast ourselves down with Mary Magdalen, and the more we bow down with us towards Christ's feet, the more we shall be afraid to again in sin; and the more we know and submit ourselves, the more we shall be forgiven, and the less we know and submit ourselves, the less we shall be given, as appeareth by the following example. When Christ was in the world amongst the Jews and Pharisees, there was a great Pharisee whose name was Simon; this Pharisee desired Christ on a time to dine with him, thinking with himself that he was rich and worthy to give Christ a dinner: Christ refused his dinner, but came unto him. In time of their dinner, there happened to come into the house a great sinner named Mary Magdalen. As soon as she perceived Christ, she cast herself down, and called unto her remembrance what she was of herself, and how great she had offended God, whereby she conceived in Christ great love, and so came near unto him, and washed his feet with bitter tears, and shed upon his head precious ointment, thinking that by him she should be delivered from her sins. This great and proud Pharisee saw that Christ did accept her oblation in the best part, and great indignation against this woman, and said to himself, If this man Christ were a holy prophet, as he is taken for, he would not suffer this sinner to come nigh him. Christ understanding the naughty mind of this Pharisee, said to him, Simon, I have somewhat to say unto thee: say what you please (quoth the Pharisee). Then, said Christ, I pray thee tell me this: if there be a man to whom there is owing twenty pounds by one, and forty by another, this man to whom this money is owing, perceiving these two men be not able to pay him, he giveth them both. Which of these two debtors ought to love this man most? The Pharisee said, That man ought to love him best that had most forgiven him. Likewise said Christ, it is by this woman. She hath loved me most, therefore most is forgiven her; she hath known her sins most, whereby she hath most loved me; thou hast least loved me, because thou hast least known thy sins; therefore because thou hast least known thy offences, thou art least forgiven. So this proud Pharisee had an answer to allay his pride: and think you not but there be amongst us a great number of these proud Pharisees, which think themselves worthy to bid Christ to dinner, who will perk and presume to sit by Christ in the church, and have disdain of this poor woman Mary Magdalen.

Magdalen, their poor neighbour, with an high disdainand solemn countenance; and being always desirous to be the highest in the church, reckoning themselves more worthy to sit here than another, I fear me poor Magdalen under the boord and in the belfry, hath more forgiven of Christ than they have: for it is like these Pharisees do less know themselves and their sins, whereby they less love God, and so they be less forgiven.

As for us, we would follow this example, and be like unto Magdalen. I doubt not but we be all Magdalens in falling into sin, and offending: but we are not again Magdalens in knowing ourselves, and in rising from sin. If we be the true Magdalens, we should be willing to forsake our sin, and rise from sin, as we are willing to commit sin, and to continue in it; and then should know ourselves best, and make more effect answer than ever we did, unto this question, What art thou? To which we might answer, that we be true christian men and women: and then, I say, we should understand and know how you ought to play this card, "Thou shalt not kill," without any interruption of your deadly enemies the Turks, and so triumph at the last by winning everlasting life in glory, when.

It would require a long discourse to declare what a stir there was in Cambridge upon this preaching of Mr.
Latimer. Belike Satan began to feel himself and his kingdom to be touched too near, and therefore thought it time to look about him, and to make out his men of war.

First came out the prior of Black Friars, called Buckneham, who thinking to make a great hand against Mr. Latimer, about the same time of Christmas, when Mr. Latimer brought forth his cards to deface belike the doings of the other, brought out his Christmas dice, dividing there to his audience Cinque and Quarter, meaning by the Cinque five places in the New Testament, and the four doctors by the Quarter; by which Cinque and Quarter he would prove that it was not expedient for the scriptures to be in English, lest the ignorant and vulgar sort, through the occasion thereof, might aptly be brought in danger to leave their vocation, and else to run into some inconvenience: as for example:
The ploughman, when he heareth this in the gospel,
No man that layeth his hand on the plough and looketh back, is meet for the kingdom of God; might adventure hearing this, cease from his plough. Likewise the baker, when he hears that a little leaven corrupteth a whole lump of dough, may perchance leave his bread unleavened, and so our bodies shall be unseasoned. Also the simple man, when he heareth in the gospel, "If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee," may make himself blind, and so fill the world with beggars. These, with some others, his clerkly friar brought out, to the number of five,
to prove his purpose.

Mr. Latimer hearing this sermon of Dr. Buckneham, came again in the afternoon, or shortly after, to the church to answer the friar, where resorted to him a great multitude, as well of the university as of the town, both bachelors and other graduates, with great expectation to hear what he could say: among whom also, directly in the face of Latimer, underneath the pulpit, sat Buckneham the aforesaid friar, prior of the Black-Friars, with his black friar's cowl about his shoulders.

Then Mr. Latimer first repeating the friarly reasons of Dr. Buckneham, whereby he would prove it a dangerous thing for the vulgar people to have the scriptures in the vulgar tongue, so refuted the friar, so answered his objections, so dallied with his bald reason of the ploughman looking back, and of the baker leaving his bread unleavened, that the vanity of the friar might to men appear, well proving and declaring to the people, that there was no such fear nor danger for the scriptures to be in English, as the friar pretended; at last requiring this, that the scriptures might be so long in the English tongue, till Englishmen were so mad, that either the ploughman durst not look back, or the baker could leave his bread unleavened. And proceeding
No. 27.

moreover in his sermon, he began to discourse of the mystical speeches and figurative phrases of the scriptures; which phrases he said were not so diffuse and difficult, as they were common in the scriptures, and in the Hebrew tongue are commonly used and known: and not only in the Hebrew tongue, but also every speech (saith he) hath it's like metaphors and figurative significations, so common and vulgar to all men, that the very painters do paint them on walls and on houses.

As for example (saith he, looking towards the friar that sat over against him) when they paint a fox preaching out of a friar's cowl, none is so mad to take this to be a fox that preacheth, but know well enough the meaning of the matter; which is to point out unto us, what hypocrisy, crafts, and subtle dissimulation lieth hid many times in these friar's cowls, willing us thereby to beware of them. In fine, friar Buckneham was so dashed with this sermon, that he durst never after peep out of the pulpit against Mr. Latimer.

Besides this Buckneham, there was also another railing friar, not of the same coat, but of the same note and faction, a gray friar and a doctor, an outlandish man, named Dr. Venetus, who likewise in his brawling sermons railed and raged against Mr. Latimer, calling him a mad and brainless man, and willing the people not to believe him, &c. To whom Mr. Latimer answering again, taketh for his ground the words of our Saviour Christ, Matt. v. Thou shalt not kill, &c. But I say unto you, Whosoever is angry with his neighbour shall be in danger of judgment; and whosoever shall say unto his neighbour Racha, (or any other like words of rebuking, as brainless) shall be in danger of council: and whosoever shall say to his neighbour, Fool, shall be in danger of hell-fire.

In discussing of which place, first he divideth the offence of killing into three branches. One to be with hand, the other with heart, the third with word. With hand, when we use any weapon-drawn, to spill the life of our neighbour. With heart, when we be angry with him. With word, when in word or countenance we disdainfully rebuke our neighbour, or despitefully revile him. Words of rebuking are, when we speak any opprobrious or unseemly thing, whereby the patience of our neighbour is moved, as when we call him mad (saith he) or brainless, or such like, which are guilty of council: words of spite, or reviling are, when we call him fool; which Christ saith is guilty of hell-fire.

Thus Mr. Latimer in handling and trimming this matter, after that with the weight of Christ's words, and the explaining of the same, he had sufficiently borne the friar clean down, then he turned to the fifth chapter of the book of Wisdom. Out of which chapter he declared to the audience, how the true servants and preachers of God in this world, commonly are scorned and reviled by the proud enemies of God's word, which account them here as mad-men, fools, brainless, and drunken: so did they (saith he) in the scripture call them which most purely preached, and set forth the glory of God's word. But (saith he) what will be the end of these jolly fellows, or what will they say in the end? We mad men, we mad fools, we, we ourselves, &c. And that will be their end except they repent. And thus ending his sermon, he so confounded the poor friar, that he drove him not only out of countenance, but also clean out of the university.

But what should I here stand deciphering the names of his adversaries, when whole swarms of friars and doctors flocked against him on every side, almost through the whole university, preaching and likewise barking against him? Amongst whom was Dr. Watson, master of Christ's college, whose scholar Latimer had been before, Dr. Notaries, master of Clare-hall, Dr.
Philo, master of Michael-house, Dr. Metcalfe, master of St. John's, Dr. Blithe, of the King's-hall, Dr.
Bullock, master of the Queen's college, Dr. Cliffe, of Clement-house, Dr. Donnes, of Jesus college, Dr.
Psalms, master of St. Nicholas Hostel, Bain, Rud, and Greenwood, bachelors of divinity, all three of St.
John's college; also Brickenden, bachelor of divinity, of the same house, and scholar sometime to the said Latimer.

Latimer. In short, almost as many as were heads of houses, so many enemies did this worthy standard-bearer of Christ's gospel sustain.

Then came at last Dr. West, bishop of Ely, who preaching against Mr. Latimer at Barwell-abbey, forbade him within the churches of that university to preach any more. Notwithstanding, so the Lord provided, that Dr. Barnes, prior of the Augustine friars, did license Mr. Latimer to preach in his church of the Augustines, and he himself preached at the next church, called St. Edward's church, which was the first sermon of the gospel that Dr. Barnes preached, being Sunday, and Christmas Eve. Whereupon certain articles were gathered out of his sermon, and were commenced against him by Mr. Tirell, fellow of the King's-hall, and so by the vice-chancellor presented to the cardinal.

Thus Mr. Latimer (as you have heard) being baited by the friars, doctors, and masters of that university, about the year aforesaid, 1529, notwithstanding the malice of these malignant adversaries, continued yet in Cambridge preaching for the space of three years together, with favour and applause of the godly, also with such admiration of his enemies that heard him, that the bishop himself coming in, and hearing his gift, wished himself to have the like, and was compelled to commend him upon the same.

So Mr. Latimer and Mr. Bilney, after this, continued in Cambridge for some time, where they so frequently conferred together, that the field wherein they usually walked, was for a long time after called, 'The heretics' hill.

The society of these two, as it was much noted by many in that university, so it was full of many good examples, to all such as would follow them, both in visiting the prisoners, relieving the needy, and in feeding the hungry. Mr. Latimer maketh mention of a certain history which happened about this time in Cambridge, between them both and a certain woman then prisoner in the castle or tower of Cambridge, which I thought here worthy to be mentioned. The story is this: It so happened, that after Mr. Latimer had been so acquainted with the aforesaid Mr. Bilney, he went with him to visit the prisoners in the tower of Cambridge, and being there, among other prisoners, there was a woman who was accused that she had killed her own child, which act she plainly and stedfastly denied. Whereby it gave them occasion to search for the matter, and at length they found that her husband loved her not, and therefore sought all means he could to make her way. The matter was thus:

A child of her's had been sick a whole year, and at length died in harvest time, as it were in a consumption: which when it was gone, she went to have her neighbours to help her at the burial, but all were abroad in the harvest, whereby she was enforced with heaviness of heart, alone to prepare the child for the burial. Her husband coming home, and not loving her, accused her of murdering the child. This was the cause of her trouble; and Mr. Latimer, by earnest inquisition, of conscience thought the woman not guilty. Then immediately after he was called to preach before king Henry the eighth at Windsor, where after his sermon the king's majesty sent for him, and talked familiarly with him. At which time Mr. Latimer, finding an opportunity, kneeled down, opened the whole matter to the king, and desired her pardon, which the king most graciously granted, and gave it to him at his return homeward. In the mean time the woman was delivered of a child in the prison, whose godfather was Mr. Latimer, and Mrs. Cheek godmother. But all the while he would not tell her of the pardon, but laboured to have her confess the truth of the matter. At length the time came when she expected to suffer, and Mr. Latimer came as he was wont, to instruct her; unto whom she made great lamentation and moan, to be purified before her suffering, for she thought she must be damned if she died without purification.

Then Mr. Bilney being with Mr. Latimer, both told her, that that law was made for the Jews, and not for us, and that women be as well in the favour of God before they be purified as after; and rather it was appointed for a civil and politic law, for natural honesty's sake, than they should any thing the more be purified by sin thereby, &c. So thus they argued with this woman till they had better instructed her, and at length shewed her the king's pardon, and let her go.

This good act, among many others about that time happened in Cambridge by Mr. Latimer and Mr. Bilney. But this was not all, for many more like were wrought by them. But as it is commonly seen in the natural course of things, that as the fire beginneth to kindle, so the more smoke ariseth withal, in much like sort it happened with Mr. Latimer, whose zeal the more it began to work, his virtues to be known, and his doings to be known, the more his adversaries began to kick and spurn against him. Concerning the adversaries, and such as did molest him, partly their names are above expressed. Among the rest of this number was Dr. Redman, a man favouring more of superstition than of true religion, after the zeal of the Pharisees, yet not so malignant or hurtful, but of a civil and quiet disposition, and also liberal in well-doing, that few poor scholars were in that university who fared not better by his purse. This Dr. Redman was a man of great authority in the university of Cambridge, and perceiving the bold enterprize of Mr. Latimer, in setting abroad the word and doctrine of the gospel, at this time, or much about the same, writeth to him, seeking him by persuasion to revoke the said Latimer from that kind and manner of teaching: to whom Mr. Latimer maketh answer again in a few words: the sum and effect of both their letters, translated out of the Latin, here followeth.

From Dr. REDMAN to Mr. LATIMER.

GRACE be with you, and true peace in Christ Jesus. I beseech you heartily, and require most earnestly even for charity's sake, that you will not stand in your own conceit with a mind so indurate, nor prefer your own singular judgment in matters of religion and controversy before so many learned men, and which is more, before the whole catholic church, especially considering that you neither have any thing in the word of God to make for you, nor yet the testimony of any authentic writer. Nay, nay, I beseech you rather consider that you are a man, and that lying and vanity may quickly bear your eyes, which doth sometimes transform itself into an angel of light.

Judge not so rashly of us, as that wicked spirit hath tickled you in the ear. I assure you we are careful for you, and that we wish you to be saved, and that we are careful also for our own salvation. Lay down your stomach I pray you, and humble your spirit, and suffer not the church to take offence with the hardness of your heart, nor that her unity and Christ's coat without seam (as much as lieth in you) shall be torn asunder. Consider what the saying of the wise man is, and be obedient thereunto. Trust not your own wisdom. The Lord Jesus Christ, &c.

REDMAN.

From Mr. LATIMER, in Answer to Dr. REDMAN.

Reverend Mr. Redman, it is even enough for me, that Christ's sheep hear no man's voice but Christ's: and as for you, you have no voice of Christ against me, whereas for my part I have a heart that is ready to hearken to any voice of Christ that you can bring me. Thus fare you well, and trouble me no more from the talking with the Lord my God.

LATIMER.

After Mr. Latimer had thus laboured in preaching and teaching in the university of Cambridge about the space of three years, at length he was called up to the cardinal for heresy, by the procurement of some of the said university, where he was content to suffer and grant to such articles as they they propounded to him, &c.

After that he returned to the university again, where after, by the means of Dr. Buts, the king's physician, a singular good man, and a special favourer of proceedings, he was in the number of them which were in the cause of the king's supremacy. Then he came to the court, where he remained a certain time in Dr. Buts's chamber, preaching then in London very often. At last being weary of the court, having a benefice offered by the king, at the suit of the lord of Powel and Dr. Buts, was glad thereof, seeking by means to be rid of the court, wherewith in no case he could agree; and so having a grant of the benefice, contrary to the mind of Dr. Buts, he would needs depart, and be resident at the same.

This benefice was in Wiltshire, under the diocese of Sarum, the name of which town was called West Kingston, where this good preacher did exercise himself with much diligence of teaching to instruct his flock, and not only to them his diligence extended, but also to all the country about. In fine, his diligence was so great, preaching so powerful, the manner of his teaching so zealous, that there in like sort he could not escape without enemies. So true it is what St. Paul foretelleth. Whosoever will live godly in Christ, shall suffer persecution. It so happened, that whereas he preaching on the blessed virgin Christ's mother, (whom we call the lady) had thereupon declared his mind, referring and placing all honour only to Christ our only Saviour, certain popish priests being therewith offended, sought and sought much trouble against him, drawing out articles and impositions which they untruly, unjustly, falsely, and uncharitably imputed unto him: First, that he would preach against our lady, for that he reproveth in sermon the superstitious rudeness of certain blind priests, which so held together upon the blessed virgin, though she never had any sin, nor were saved by Christ the only Saviour of the whole world.

Item, That he should say, that saints were not to be worshipped.

Item, That Ave Maria was a salutation only, and no prayer.

Item, That there was no material fire in hell.

Item, That there was no purgatory, in saying, that he had rather be in purgatory than in Lollard's Tower.

Touching the whole discourse of which articles, with reply and answer to the same, hereafter shall follow by the Lord's assistance when we come to his letters.

The chief enemies and molesters of him, besides these country priests, were Dr. Powel, of Salisbury, Dr. Wilfon, sometime of Cambridge, Mr. Hubberdin, and Dr. Sherwood. Of whom some preached and some wrote against him; insomuch that by their procurement he was cited up, and called to appear before Dr. Warham, archbishop of Canterbury, and John Stokesley, bishop of London, Jan. 29, 1531. The copy of which citation (as now translated from the Latin) here followeth.

A COPY of a CITATION sent to Mr. LATIMER by the CHANCELLOR of SARUM, at the Intercession of the Bishop of LONDON.

Richard Hilley, doctor of the decrees of the most reverend father in God, Laurence, by divine providence, bishop of Sarum, and vicar general in spiritual affairs throughout England, to all and singular doctors, vicars, chaplains, curates, and the rest of the clergy and learned persons throughout the whole diocese of Sarum, health in our Lord Jesus Christ. Together and apart we commit and firmly command, that immediately cite or cause to be cited, Mr. Hugh Latimer, vicar of West Kingston, in the county of Wilts, and diocese of Sarum, that he may appear before the reverend father in God, John, by divine providence, bishop of London, or his vicar general in spirituals, or before the chapter held in the church of St. Paul, London, on Monday the 29th of this instant January, between the hours of nine and eleven in the forenoon of the same day, there personally to answer to certain articles or questions concerning grievous crimes and misdemeanors by him committed, and under the cognizance of the bishop of London, and furthermore to receive condign punishment for the same: and that ye certify us at Sarum of what is done on the premises before the 22d of this same month of January; that we may be able to certify the same to the abovesaid reverend father, the lord bishop of London, on or before the said 22d of January, according as the same reverend father having prayed and required it of us, in aid of the law, and out of mutual kindness.

Given at Sarum, under the seal of the abovesaid father in God, the 10th day of January, 1531.

Against this citation, although Mr. Latimer did appeal to his own ordinary, requiring him to be ordered, yet notwithstanding all that, he was had up to London before Warham the archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishop of London, where he was greatly molested, and detained a long time from his cure at home. There he being called thrice every week before the said bishops, to make answer for his preaching, had certain articles or propositions drawn out and laid to him, whereunto they required him to subscribe. At length he not only perceiving their practical proceedings, but also much grieved with their troublesome unquietness, who neither would preach themselves, nor yet suffer him to preach and do his duty, writeth to the abovesaid archbishop, partly excusing his infirmity, whereby he could not appear at their commandment, partly expostulating with them for so troubling and detaining him from doing his duty, and that for no just cause, but only for preaching the truth against certain vain abuses crept into religion, much needful to be spoken against. Which all may appear by his epistle sent to a certain bishop or archbishop, whose name is not expressed; the copy of which epistle is now translated from Latin, and is as followeth.

A COPY of the EPISTLE by Mr. LATIMER to the ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY.

MOST REVEREND GOVERNOR;

HAD not sickness prevented me, I had myself waited on you at your palace; but these fresh troubles have brought on me a sharp return of an old disemper, so that I can't be able to wait on you to-day; I can't (I say) without great pain, but that your lordship might no longer in vain expect my coming, I have sent these lines scribbled with mine own hand to your grace, as to a most upright judge, of my excuse, in which I wish I had more time or more judgment to frame a just expostulation with your grace for detaining me so long against my will from my cure, and that so unseasonably, at a time when it most behoves every pastor to be with his flock. But what shall I say, if it is lawful for so mean a prisoner to plead with so great a father? If we esteem a priest good for doing his duty, who, while he remains in this earthly tabernacle, never ceaseth to teach and admonish his congregation, and so much the more as he draws nearer his last home, what must we think of those who neither preach themselves now, (at which I should not wonder had they not been used to it before) nor permit those who are desirous to do it, unless they are bound to do and say nothing but what they please. At first I thought it safe to submit myself intirely to your clemency, but now it seems as safe to justify myself a little, since one thing was pretended in the beginning, but now another, and what will be the end I have great room to doubt; but I hope truth only will be used. St. Jerome on these words, (which I hope I shall never forget) "The Lord who preserveth truth, for ever shall deliver thee," writes thus, Whatsoever I suffer for truth's sake shall never trouble me, for the Lord liveth and careth for me. First I was sent to London, where I was before the court of Canterbury, then all was stopped that had been done, and the matter had bounds and limits set to it by him who sent me; but so the business was handled and brought into doubt, that at length there seemed no end of it, but that it must be infinitely prolonged. For while, without either method or design, I was questioned tioned of one thing after another, whether pertinent or impertinent, now by one, and then by another, if I gave them no answer, or if I answered them to the purpose (which I thought was not imprudent sometimes to put an end to the dispute) I was equally uncivil; while one answers to many and of many things, he may inadvertently say something that may prejudice the most righteous cause. None ought to judge me wicked for what at most they can call but an error of conscience; and to remember all things, it behoves a man to remember the foundation of the other world. When a man acts against conscience, he doth it to gain, to maintain, or defend his own, but what they charge me with is far different, and I believe without example, wickedly requesting to know the cause of my confinement. If any person is disposed to attack my sermons, that they are obscure, or not cautiously enough worded, I am prepared either to explain or vindicate them, for (to the best of my knowledge) I never preached any thing against the truth, against the councils of the fathers, or against the catholic faith. All that my adversaries or detractors truly charge me with, is what I have long desired, and do desire, namely, the improving the common people's judgment. I heartily desire that all men might know and comprehend the disagreement of things, the worth, place, time, degrees, and order proper for each, and how much they are concerned in those things which God has prepared for them to walk in: every man ought to be very diligent in doing the works of his calling; after which, many things indifferent may be done with equal diligence, amongst which are all things which no law has forbid, unless we forbid them to ourselves: it is lawful to use images, to go on pilgrimages, to invoke saints, to remember the souls in purgatory, but these which are voluntary acts are to be so restrained, that they diminish not the just esteem of the precepts of God (which bestow eternal life on those who follow them) should necessarily have; they who use them otherwise, are so far from gaining the love of God, that they rather incur his hatred. The true love of God is to keep his commandments, as our Saviour says, He who heareth my words and doth them, he it is who loveth me. Let no man then have so mean an opinion of the laws of God, as to make them equal to the fancies of men, since by those at the last day before the tribunal of Christ we shall all be judged, and not by these; as Christ says, The word that I speak, that shall judge you at the last day; and what man is able to make amends for the breach of one of those commands, by any or all of these specious additions? O that we would be but as ready, as diligent, as devoted to do his will, as we are to follow our own empty notions! Many things done with an upright heart God accepts of, making allowance for our infirmities, though he has not commanded or required them; but these things ought to be taken away when they begin to have the force of commands, lest while we do these we omit those that are absolutely necessary; and what can be more absurd than to revere as ordinances of God, the idle fancies of men, whilst his true ordinances are neglected; whence I in behalf of the commandments of God stand hitherto immovable, not seeking my own but Christ's gain, not my own but God's glory, and whilst I live I will stand steadfast: so all the German divines have hitherto complained of the intolerable abuse of these things, that no man desirous of the glory of Christ can accept of the ministry without doing things against his conscience, and if some have (for I will not say none) submitted to this hardship purely to do good, yet what doth the christian religion suffer by it? unless we are so miserably blinded as to think that these things are to be dispensed with for our own filthy gain, though they are not for the honour of God. Now who can justify the constant practice of such things which in themselves are highly criminal? Some things are constantly performed which ought never, while others are omitted which ought always to be done: now who cannot see this manifest abuse? And who sees, and does not grieve? And who grieves, that would not labour to remove it? And when shall it be removed,

while it is constantly preached and commended. Why, it is hardly possible for it not to be universal. It is one thing barely to permit, and another to command as law. Go (says Christ) and teach all things; but what are those all things? Why, all that you have heard of me, not all that seems fit to yourselves. Let us therefore, by the help of God, go and do likewise: let us employ our whole strength to preach the sincere word of God, not to flatter or cook up our sermons to a depraved taste, then shall we be true preachers of the word. As careless as men are in what relates to God, they are diligent enough in what relates to themselves: to this they want no spurs; but they are miserably deceived by an unjust esteem of things, and an superstition received in their tender years from their fore-fathers, which we are hardly able to remember any preaching, how frequent, how earnest, how fine and pure soever, which God doth now permit; for these evil days they who ought to preach themselves to us, says Peter, has he given to preach the gospel forbid them to preach who are willing and able, and the contrary, compel time-servers, who damnably deceive the miserable people in superstition and false confidence, but Lord have mercy upon us, and grant we may know thy way upon earth, not to be found amongst those whom the Lord says, My ways are not your ways, neither are my thoughts your thoughts? Hence I dare not subscribe to these propositions, most honoured father, because I would no ways be accessory to the longer continuance of these popular superstitions, lest I should be the author of my own damnation. Was I worthy, I would give you some advice, but that little impertinent thought in the heart, can do little else than guess, none know the things of a man but the spirit of a man which is in him. It is not any pride that hinders me from subscribing to these propositions; on the contrary, I am very sorry I cannot wholly perform your request, I know how great a crime it is to disobey the fathers and governors of the church, but then regard is to be had to what they command, in which case we ought always to obey God rather than man.

My head aches so much, and my body is so weak, that I can neither come, nor write over again and correct these lines; but your lordship, I hope, will approve, not the judgment, yet the endeavours of

Your lordship's devoted servant,

HUGH LATIMER

In this aforesaid epistle (as you hear) he makes mention of certain articles or propositions, whereunto he was required by the bishops to subscribe. The content and effect of those articles or rude propositions (as he calleth them) are these:

ARTICLES devised by the BISHOPS for Mr. LATIMER to subscribe unto.

I Believe that there is a purgatory to purge the souls of the dead after this life.

That the souls in purgatory are holpen with the masses, prayers, and alms of the living.

That the saints do pray as mediators now for us in heaven.

That they are to be honoured of us in heaven.

That it is profitable for christians to call upon the saints, that they may pray as mediators for us unto God.

That pilgrimages and oblations done to the sepulchres and relics of saints are meritorious.

That they which have vowed perpetual chastity may not marry, nor break their vow, without the dispensation of the pope.

That the keys of binding and loosing, delivered to Peter, do still remain with the bishops of Rome and their successors, although they live wickedly, and are by no means, nor at any time, committed to laymen.

That men may merit and deserve at God's hand by fasting, prayer, and other good works of piety.

That they which are forbidden by the bishop to preach, as suspected persons, ought to cease until they have purged themselves before the said bishop, or their superiors, and be restored again.

That the fast which is used in Lent, and other fasts cribed by the canons, and by custome received of christians, (except necessity otherwise require) are observed and kept.

That God in every one of the seven sacraments sheweth grace to a man, rightly receiving the same. That consecrations, sanctifyings and blessings, by use and custome received in the church, are laudable and profitable.

That it is laudable and profitable, that the venerable images of the crucifix and other saints should be had in the churches as a remembrance, and to the honour and worship of Jesus Christ and his saints.

That it is laudable and profitable to deck and to burne those images, and set up burning lights before them to the honour of the said saints.

As to these articles whether he did subscribe or no, it is uncertain. It appeareth by this epistle above-written to the bishop, that he durst not consent unto them, where he writeth in these words; I dare not subscribe to these propositions, because I would no ways be accessory to the longer continuance of these popular superstitions, I be the author, &c. But yet, whether he was compelled afterwards to agree, through the cruel dealings of the bishops, it is in doubt. By the words and the title of the register prefixed before the articles, it may be seen that he did subscribe. The words of the register are these: Hugh Latimer, bachelor of divinity, of the university of Cambridge, in a convocation held at Westminter before the lord archbishop of Canterbury, John, bishop of London, and the rest of the clergy, has acknowledged and made the following confession of his faith, as in these articles, March 21, 1531. If these words be true, it may be thought that he subscribed. And whether he so did, no great matter nor marvel, the iniquity of the time being such, that either he must needs so do, or abide the bishop's blessing, that is, cruel sentence of death, which he at that time (as he himself confessed, teaching at Stamford) was loth to sustain for such matters as these were, unless it were for articles necessary to his belief; for by his words I conjecture rather that he did subscribe at length, although it was long before he could be brought so to do. Yet this by the way is to be noted, concerning the crafty and deceitful dealings of these bishops in his examinations, what subtle devices they used the same time to entrap him in their snares. The truth of the story he shewed forth himself in a certain sermon preached at Stamford, October 9, 1550; his words be these:

I was once (saith he) in examination before five or six bishops, where I had much trouble; thrice every week I came to examinations, and many snares and traps were laid to get something. Now God knoweth I was ignorant of the law, but that God gave me wisdom what I should speak; it was God indeed, for else I had never escaped them. At last I was brought forth to be examined into a chamber hung with arras, where I was wont to be examined: but now at this time the chamber was somewhat altered. For whereas before there was wont always to be a fire in the chimney, now the fire was taken away, and an arras hanged over the chimney, and the table stood near the chimney's end. There was amongst the bishops who examined me, one with whom I have been very familiar, and took much for my great friend, an aged man, and he sat next to the table's end.

Then amongst all other questions he put forth one, a very subtle and crafty one, and such an one indeed, as I could not think so great danger in. And when I should make answer, I pray you, Mr. Latimer, said one, speak out. I am very thick of hearing, and here may be many that sit far off. I marvelled at this that I was bid to speak out, and begun to suspect, and give an ear to the chimney; and sir, there I heard a pen writing in the chimney behind the cloth. They had appointed one there to write all mine answers, for they made sure that I should not start from them: there was no starting from them. God was my good Lord, and gave me answer, I could never else have escaped it. The question then and there objected to him was, Whether he thought in his conscience that he hath been suspected of heresy. This was a captious question. There was no holding of peace would serve; for that was to grant himself faulty. To answer it, was every way full of danger. But God, which always giveth in need what to answer, helped him, or else (as he confessed himself) he had never escaped their bloody hands. Albeit what was his answer, he doth not there express. And thus hitherto you have heard declared the manifold troubles of this godly preacher, in the time not only of his being in the university, but especially at his benefice, as partly in his own words above-mentioned, and partly by his own letters hereafter following, may better appear.

In these so hard and dangerous straits, and such snares of the bishops, hard it had been for him, and impossible to have escaped and continued so long, had not the almighty helping hand of the Highest, as he stirred him up, so he preserved him through the favour and power of his prince; who with much favour embraced him, and with his mere power sometime rescued and delivered him out of the crooked claws of his enemies. Moreover, at length, also through the procurement partly of Dr. Butts, partly of the good lord Cromwel, he advanced him to the degree and dignity of a bishop, making him the bishop of Worcester, which so continued a few years, instructing his diocese, according to the duty of a diligent and vigilant pastor, with wholesome doctrine and example of perfect conversation duly agreeing to the same. It were a long matter to stand particularly upon such things as might here be brought to the commendation of his pains; as study, readiness, and continual preaching, exhorting, visiting, correcting, and reforming, either as his ability could serve, or else the time would bear. But the days then were so dangerous and variable, that he could not in all things do what he would. Yet what he might do, that he performed to the utmost of his strength; so that although he could not utterly extinguish all the sparkling relics of old superstition, yet he so wrought, that though they could not be taken away, yet they should be used with as little hurt, and with as much profit as might be. As for example, in this thing, and divers others it did appear, that when it could not be avoided, but holy water and holy bread must needs be received, yet so he prepared and instructed them of his diocese, with such informations and lessons, that in receiving thereof superstition should be excluded, and some remembrance taken thereby, teaching and charging the ministers of his diocese, in delivering the holy water and the holy bread, to say these words following:

Words spoken to the People in giving them Holy Water.

“Remember your promise in baptism,
Christ, his mercy and blood-shedding,
By whose most holy sprinkling,
Of all your sins you have free pardoning.”

What to say in giving Holy Bread:

“Of Christ's body this is a token,
Which on the cross for our sins was broken:
Wherefore of your sins you must be forsakers,
If of Christ's death you will be partakers.”

By this it may be considered what the diligent care of this bishop was in doing the duty of a faithful pastor among his flock. And moreover it is to be thought that he would have brought more things else to pass, if the time then had answered to his desire; for he was not ignorant how the institution of holy water and holy bread not only had no ground in scripture, but also how full of profane exorcisms and conjurations they were, contrary to the rule and learning of the gospel. Thus this good man behaved himself in his diocese. But (as before) both in the university and at his benefice, he was tost and troubled by wicked and evil disposed persons; so in his bishopric also, he was not free from some that sought his trouble. As among many other evil willers, one especially there was, and that was no small person, who accused him then to the king for his sermons. The story, because he himself sheweth in a sermon of his before king Edward, I thought therefore to use his own words, which are these:

In the king's days that is dead, a great many of us were called together before him, to speak our minds in certain matters. In the end one kneeled down and accuseth me of sedition; and that I had preached seditious doctrine. A heavy salutation, and a hard point of such a man's doing, as if I should name you would not think.

The king turned to me, and said, What say you to that, sir? Then I kneeled down, and turned first to my accuser, and required him; Sir, what form of preaching would you appoint me in preaching before a king? Would you have me preach nothing as concerning a king in a king's sermon? Have you any commission to appoint me what I shall preach? Besides this, I asked him divers other questions, and he would make no answer to any of them all; he had nothing to say.

Then I turned to the king, and submitted myself to his grace, and said, I never thought myself worthy, nor did I ever sue to be a preacher before your grace, but I was called to it, and would be willing (if you mislike me) to give place to my betters; for I grant that there be a great many more worthy of the room than I am. And if it be your grace's pleasure so to allow them for preachers, I could be content to carry their books after them. But if your grace allow me for a preacher, I would desire your grace to give me leave to discharge my conscience, and thus to frame my doctrine according to my audience. I had been a very blockhead to have preached so at the borders of your realm, as I preach before your grace.

And I thank Almighty God (who hath always been my remedy) that my sayings were well accepted of the king; for like a gracious lord he turned into another communication. It is even as the scripture saith, The Lord directeth the king's heart. Some of my friends came to me with tears in their eyes, and told me, they expected I should have been in the Tower the same night.

Besides this, divers other conflicts and combats this godly bishop sustained in his own country and diocese, in taking the cause of right and equity against oppression and wrong. As for another example, There was at that time, not far from the diocese of Worcester, a certain justice of the peace, whom here I will not name, being a good man afterwards, and now deceased. This justice in purchasing of certain lands, for his brother, or for himself, went about to wrong or damnify a poor man, who made a complaint to Mr. Latimer. He first hearing, then tendering his rightful cause, wrote his letter to the gentleman, exhorting him to remember himself, to consider the cause, and to abstain from injury. The justice of peace not content withal (as the fashion of men is when they are told of their faults) sendeth word again in great displeasure, that he would not so take it at his hands, with such threatening words. Mr. Latimer hearing this, answered again, by writing to a certain gentleman; the copy whereof among his letters hereafter followeth in the sequel of this story to be seen.

It were a large and long process to declare all the doings, travels, and writings of this christian bishop, neither yet have we expressed all that came to our hands; but this I thought sufficient for the present. Thus he continued, in his laborious function of a bishop some years, till the coming in of the six articles. Then being distressed through the straightness of time, so that either he must lose the quietness of a good conscience, or else forsake his bishopric, the latter of which he freely did, and Dr. Shaxton, the bishop of Salisbury, resigned likewise with him. At which time he threw off his rochet in his chamber among his friends, and suddenly gave a skip on the floor for joy, feeling his shoulder so light, and being discharged (as he said) of such a heavy burden. However, he was not so lightened, but that troubles and labours followed him wheresoever he went. For a little after he had renounced his bishopric, he was much bruised by the fall of a tree: then coming up to London for remedy, he was molested and troubled by bishops, whereby he was again in no little danger, at length was sent to the Tower, where he continued prisoner, till the time that the blessed king Edward entered his crown, by which means the good mouth of this preacher, long shut up before, was now opened again. And so he beginning afresh to set to his plough again, continued all the time of the said king labouring in the Lord's harvest most fruitfully, charging his talent at Stamford, and before the duke of Suffolk, and many other places in this realm (his sermons are now extant) as also at London in the Convent-house, and especially before the king at the court in the same place of the inward garden, which was before applied to lascivious and courtly pastimes, there dispensed the fruitful word of the glorious gospel of Jesus Christ, preaching there before the king and whole court, to the edification of many.

And thus he spent his time in king Edward's day preaching, for the most part, twice every Sunday, to the shame of all other loitering and unpreaching prelates, who occupy great rooms, and do little good; so much the more to their shame, because he being a man so bruised by the fall of a tree, and above 67 years of age, took so little ease and care of sparing himself, to do the people good. Now to speak here of his indefatigable diligence in his private studies: notwithstanding his years, and the fatigue of so often preaching, it was his custom every morning, winter and summer, to be diligently at his book by two o'clock. How careful his heart was of the preservation of the church, and the good success of the gospel, his letters can testify, wherein he admonisheth those of their duty that were then in authority, and assisted them with his godly counsel.

As the diligence of this man of God never ceased all the time of king Edward, to profit the church both publicly and privately, so it is likewise to be observed that the same good Spirit of God that assisted and comforted him in preaching the gospel, did also enable him to fortel all those kinds of plagues, which afterwards ensued; if England ever had a prophet, he seemed to have been one. And as touching himself, he was affirmed, that the preaching of the gospel would cost him his life, to which he no less cheerfully prepared himself, than certainly was persuaded that Winchester was kept in the Tower for the same purpose, as the event did too truly prove the same. For after the death of the said pious king Edward, not long after queen Mary was proclaimed, a pursuivant was sent down (by the means, no doubt, of Winchester) into the country, to call him up, of whose coming, although Mr. Latimer lacked no forewarning, being admonished about six hours before by one John Carleton (whose story hereafter followeth) yet he was so far from endeavouring to escape, that he prepared himself for his journey before the said officer came to his house.

At which when the pursuivant marvelled, seeing him so prepared for his journey, Mr. Latimer said unto him, My friend, you are a welcome messenger unto me. And be it known unto you and to all the world, that I go willingly to London at this present, being called by my prince to render a reckoning of my doctrine, as ever I went to any place in the world. I doubt not but that God, as he hath made me worthy to preach his word before two excellent princes, so will he enable me to witness the same unto the third, either to her comfort, or discomfort eternally, &c. When the pursuivant had delivered his letters, he departed, affirming, that he had commandment not to tarry for him. By whose sudden departure it was manifest that they would not have him appear, but rather to have fled out of the realm. They knew that his constancy should defeat them in their popery, and confirm the godly in the truth.

Thus Mr. Latimer being sent for, and coming up to London, (entering Smithfield, he merrily said, That Smithfield had long groaned for him) was brought before the council, where he patiently bearing all the mocks and taunts given him by the scornful papists, was again sent to the Tower, where being assisted with the heavenly grace of Christ, patiently sustained imprisonment not a long time; notwithstanding the cruel and unmerciful usage of the lordly papists, who then thought their kingdom would never fall, yet he shewed himself only patient, but also merry and chearful, in and above all that which they could work against him: yea, with a valiant spirit the Lord gave him, that he was not only to despise the terrible of prisons and punishments, but also to deride and laugh to scorn even the cruel proceedings of his enemies. It is well known to many what answer he made to the lieutenant when he was in the Tower. For when the lieutenant's man upon some came to him, the aged father, kept without fire in the frosty winter, and well nigh starved with cold, bade the man tell his master, That if he did not look after him, perchance he might deceive him.

The lieutenant hearing this, and not knowing what to make of so odd a speech, and fearing that he would earnestly make his escape, began to look more strictly at his prisoner, and so coming to him, beginneth to charge him with his words, reciting the same unto him which his man had told him before; That if he were not afterwards looked unto, perchance he might deceive him. Yea, the Lieutenant, so I said, (says he) for I suppose you expect that I should burn; but except you let me have me fire, I am like to deceive your expectation, for I am like to starve here with cold.

Many such like answers and reasons, merry but satisfactory, coming not from a vain mind, but from a content and quiet reason, proceeded from that man, denoting a firm and stable heart, little minding all this uttering of their terrible threats, but rather deriding the same.

Thus Mr. Latimer passing a long time in the Tower, with as much patience as a man in his case could do, from thence was transported to Oxford, with Dr. Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, and Dr. Ridley, bishop of London, there to dispute upon articles sent down from Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, as is before mentioned: the manner and order of which disputations between them and the university doctors, is also before sufficiently expressed. Where also is declared, how, and to whom the said Latimer, with his other fellow-prisoners, were condemned after disputations, and so committed again to the prison, and there they continued from the month of April till the month of October, where they were most godly occupied, either with soberly conference, or with fervent prayer, or with fruitful writing.

Albeit, Mr. Latimer, by reason of the feebleness of age, wrote least of them all, in this latter time of imprisonment; yet in prayer he was fervently occupied, wherein oftentimes so long he continued kneeling, that he was not able to rise without help; and sought other things, these were three principal matters that he prayed for.

First, That as God had appointed him to be a teacher of his word, so also he would give him grace to stand to his doctrine until his death, that he might shed his heart's blood for the same.

Secondly, That God of his mercy would restore his gospel to England once again; and these words Once again, he did so inculcate and beat into the ears of the Lord God, as though he had seen God before him, and spoken to him face to face.

The third matter was, to pray for the preservation of the lady Elizabeth, whom in his prayer he used to mention, and even with tears desired God to make her a comfort to this comfortless realm of England.

These were the matters he prayed for so earnestly. After were these things of him desired in vain, as the good success thereof after following did declare; for the Lord most graciously did grant all those his requests.

First, Concerning his constancy, even in the most extreme, the Lord graciously assisted him. For when he stood at the stake without Bocardo-gate at Oxford, and the tormentors about to set the fire to him, and to the cruel and pious Dr. Ridley, he lifted up his eyes towards heaven, with an audible and comfortable countenance, saying these words, "God is faithful, which will not suffer us to be tempted above our strength;"

and so afterwards shed his blood in the cause of Christ, which blood ran out of his heart in such abundance, that all those that were present, being godly, did marvel to see the most part of the blood in his body to be gathered to his heart, and with such violence to gush out, his body being opened by the force of the fire; by which things God most graciously granted his request, which was, That he might shed his heart's blood in the defence of the gospel.

How mercifully the Lord heard his second request, in restoring his gospel once again unto this realm, these present days can bear record. And what then shall England say now for her defence, which being so mercifully visited and refreshed with the word of God, so slenderly and unthankfully considereth either her own misery past, or the great benefit of God now present? The Lord be merciful unto us, Amen.

Again, concerning his third request, it seemeth likewise most effectually granted, to the great praise of God, the furtherance of his gospel, and to the unspeakable comfort of this realm. For whether at the request of his prayer, or of other God's holy saints, or whether God was moved with the cry of his whole church, the truth is, that when all was deplorable and in a desperate case, and so desperate that the enemies mightily flourished and triumphed, God's word was banished, Spaniards received, no place left for Christ's servants to cover their heads, suddenly the Lord called to remembrance his mercy, and forgetting our former iniquity, made an end of all these miseries, and wrought a marvellous change of things; at the change whereof the said queen Elizabeth was appointed and anointed, for whom this gray-headed father so earnestly prayed in his imprisonment; through whose true, natural, and imperial crown, the brightness of God's word was set up again to confound the dark and false vizored kingdom of Antichrist, the true temple of Christ re-edified, the captivity of sorrowful christians released, which so long was wished for in the prayers of so many good men, especially of this faithful and true servant of the Lord, Mr. Latimer.

The same God, who at the requests of his holy, faithful saints hath poured upon us such benefits of his mercy, peace, and tranquillity, assist our most virtuous and christian prince, and his subjects, that we may every one in his state and calling serve to his glory, and walk in our vocation, that we lose not that which we have obtained, but may proceed in all faithfulness, to build and keep up the house and temple of the Lord, to the advancing of his glory, and our everlasting comfort in him. And thus much concerning the laborious travels of Mr. Latimer. Now after these things thus finished and discoursed, pertaining to the story of his life, let us come to his letters, which he wrote at divers and sundry times from the first beginning of his preaching, all which here to comprehend, which he wrote both in English and Latin, want of room at present will not permit: nevertheless some we shall insert, and first concerning the articles above mentioned, for which he was troubled by the priests of the country about his benefice at West-Kington; which he writeth thereof to Mr. Morrice, the copies whereof follow.

First, That our LADY was a SINNER.

Occasioned of some, not only lay-men, but also priests and beneficed men, who gave so much to our lady of devotion without judgment, as though she had not needed Christ to save her. To prove Christ her Saviour, to make Christ a whole Saviour of all that be, or shall be saved, I reasoned after this manner: That either she was a sinner, or no sinner; there is no mean. If she was a sinner, then she was redeemed or delivered from sin by Christ, as other sinners be: if she was no sinner, then she was preserved from sin by Christ; so that Christ saved her, and was her necessary Saviour, whether she sinned or no. Now certain authors, said I, as Chrysostom, Theophilact, and others, write, as though she had been something faulty in her time, time. Also I said, that certain scriptures stand to the same, unless they be the more warily understood and taken, (as in Rom. iii. 10, 20.) All have declined, that every mouth be stopped, and all the world be bounden or in danger to God. And after in the same chapter, All have sinned, and need the glory of God. And in the fifth, And so death passed through into all men and women, forasmuch as all have sinned. But to these scriptures I said it might be answered, that the privilege of one, or of a few, doth not derogate or diminish the verity of an universal exposition in scriptures.

And as to the doctors, I said, that others say otherwise; and forasmuch as now it is universally and constantly received and applied that she was no sinner, it becometh every man to stand and agree to the same; and so will I, said I, nor any man that is wise, will the contrary: but to my purpose it is neither to nor from, to prove neither this nor that; for I will have her saved, and Christ her Saviour, whether ever she was, &c.

And to that, what need you to speak of this? I answered, great need, when man cannot be content that she was a creature saved, but as it were a Saviouress, not needing salvation, it is necessary to set her in degree to the glory of Christ, Creator and Saviour of all that be or shall be saved. Good authors have written that she was not a sinner: but good authors never wrote that she was not saved: for though she never sinned, yet she was not so impeccable, but she might have sinned, if she had not been preserved: it was of the goodness of God that she never sinned: it had come of her own illness if she had sinned: there was difference between her and Christ. And I will give as little to her as I can (doing her no wrong) rather than Christ her Son and Saviour shall lack any thing of his glory; and I am sure that our lady will not be displeased with me for so doing, for our lady sought his glory here upon earth, she would not defraud him now in heaven: but some are so superstitiously religious, or so irreligiously superstitious, so preposterously devout toward our lady, as though there could not too much be given to her: such are zeals without knowledge and judgment to our lady's displeasure.

No doubt our lady was, through the goodness of God, a good and a gracious creature, a devout hand-maid of the Lord, endued with singular gifts and graces from above, which through the help of God she used to God's pleasure, according to her duty, so giving example to do likewise, so that all the goodness that she had, she had it not of herself, but of God the author of all goodness: the Lord was with her favourably, and poured graces unto her plentifully, as it is in the Ave Maria. The Son of God, when he would become man to save both man and woman, did chuse her to be his mother, which love he shewed to her alone, and to no other, of his benign goodness, by which she was the natural mother of Christ: and through faith in Christ she was the spiritual sister of Christ, saved by Christ, blessed by hearing Christ's word, and keeping the same. It would not have availed to her salvation, to have been his natural mother, if she had not done the will of his heavenly Father: by him she was his mother, by him she did the will of his Father: she the hand-maiden, he the Lord. The hand-maiden did magnify the Lord, the hand-maiden would that all should magnify the Lord, to whom be honour and glory for ever, Amen.

To honour him worthily, is not to dishonour our lady; he is as able to preserve from sin, as to deliver from sin; he was then subject to Joseph his father-in-law, his mother's husband; Joseph is now subject to him. He never dishonoured Joachim and Anna, his grandfather and grandmother, and yet I have not read that he preserved them from all sin.

To say that Peter, and Paul, David, and Mary Magdalen, were sinners, is not to dishonour them: for then scripture doth dishonour them. It had not been for our profit to have preserved them all that he could have preserved.

For remembrance of that fall and up-rising kept us in our fall from despairing: both is of God, to have not sinned, and to have forsaken and left sin. And sure is this of heaven as that, and this more comfortable than that, and to us that have been sinners more comfortable.

It hath been said in times past, without sin, that our lady was a sinner: but it was never said without sin, that our lady was not saved, but a Saviour: I do not mean about to make my lady a sinner, but to have Christ her Saviour. When mine adversaries cannot reprove the thing that I say, then they will belie me, to say the thing that they can reprove. They will sin to make our lady no sinner, to prove that, that no man dieth. So the provers, and so cold probations saw you never. It was better unproved, than so weakly proved. But they are devout towards honouring of our lady, but a sin to have our lady no sinner, or to say she was no sinner.

I would be as loth to dishonour our lady as they, pray God we may honour her as she would be honoured for verily she is worthy to be honoured.

To make a pernicious and damnable lie, to have our lady no sinner, is neither honour, nor yet pleasure to our lady, but great sin, to the dishonour and displeasure both of God and her.

They should both please and honour our lady more better, to believe their sinful living, and to keep themselves from sinfulness, as our lady did, than so foolishly to lie to make our lady no sinner; which if they do, they shall certainly go to the devil, though they believe ever so surely that our lady was no sinner.

And for the Ave Maria they lie falsely, I never denied it: I know it was a heavenly salutation or greeting to our lady, spoken by the angel Gabriel, and written in the holy scripture of St. Luke. But yet it is not properly a prayer, as the Pater Noster is. Saluting or greeting, lauding or praising, is not properly praying. The angel was sent to greet our lady, and to communicate and to shew the good will of God towards her, and therefore it is called the Annunciation of our lady, and not to pray to her, or to pray to her properly: shall the Father of heaven pray to our lady? When the angel spake, it was not properly a prayer. And is it not the same thing now as it was then? Nor yet he that denieth the Ave Maria to be properly a prayer, denieth the Ave Maria so that we may salute our lady with Hail Mary! as the angel did, though we be not sent of God so to do, as the angel was. Yet though we may so do, we have no plain command for so doing, as the angel had; so that the angel had been more to blame peradventure to have left it unsaid, than we be, forasmuch as he was appointed of God to say it, and not we: but as I deny not, but that we may say the Pater Noster, and the Ave Maria together, that to God, this to our lady, so we may say them separately, the Pater Noster by itself, and the Ave by itself; and the Pater Noster is a whole and a perfect prayer, without the Ave Maria; so that it is but a superstition to think that a Pater Noster cannot be well said without an Ave Maria at his heel. For Christ was no fool, and when he taught the people to say a Pater Noster to God, he taught them not to say, neither Pater Noster, neither Ave Maria to our lady, nor yet Pater Noster to St. Peter, as Mr. Hubberdin doth: therefore to teach to say twenty Ave-Marias for one Pater Noster, is not to speak the word of God as the word of God. And one Ave Maria well said, and devoutly with affection, sense and understanding, is better than twenty well said superstitiously. And it is not like, but our lady said many times the Pater Noster, forasmuch as her son Christ, whom she loved and honoured over all, did make it, and taught it to be said; whether she made an Ave Maria with all, or ten or twenty Ave Marias for one Pater Noster, I will leave that to learned men, as Hubberdin and Powel, to discuss and determine: she was not saved by often saying of the Ave Maria, but by consenting to the will of him that sent the angel to salute her with Hail Mary: wherefore if the praying of them would decline their ear from hearing the law of God is evident.

the sight of God, yea, though they say the Pater Noster, I doubt not but the salvation of them hath been asant to our lady in her sight, for whatsoever she hath not her Son, pleaseth not her; for she hath delighteth and pleaseth him. Now we will be to her Son by customable sinful living, and yet all think great perfection and holiness in number-very day many Ave Marias to our lady, and so we to make her our friend and patroness, and then are not for God: for having our lady on our side, may be bold to take our pleasure: for we fancy as the very work and labour of repeating the Ave Maria is very acceptable to our lady, and the more, more acceptable, not minding how they be said, so they be said; if the Pater Noster which Christ both e, and commanded us to use, may be used to Christ's pleasure, much more the Ave Maria, which neither st nor our lady bid us say, may be said to her dis- ture: and better never once said, than often so said. ould have a difference between well saying and of- saying, and between that which Christ bid us say, that which he bid us not say: and whether Ave ria be said in heaven or no, who can tell but Dr. el? and if it be said always there without a Pater Noster, why may not Pater Noster be said here without e Maria; and whether doth our lady say it in ven or no? Which thing I speak not to withdraw from saying of it, but to withdraw you from su- stitious and unfruitful saying of it. So that by oc- on of false faith and trust that you have in the daily ng of it, you set not aside imitation and following oly living, which will serve at length, when super- ous greeting will neither serve nor stand in strength: s meet that every thing be taken, esteemed, and ued as it is.

We salute also and greet well the holy cross, or the age of the holy cross, saying, All hail, holy cross, ich hath deserved to bear the precious talent of the rld: and yet who will say that we pray properly to e holy cross? whereby it may appear that greeting is e thing, praying another thing. The cross can nei- er hear nor speak again, no more than this pulpit: erefore we do salute it, not properly pray to it.

The angel spake also to Zachary, before he spake to r lady. Be not afraid, Zachary, for thy prayer is ard, and thy wife Elizabeth shall bring thee forth a lld which shall be called John, and great joy and idness shall be at his birth, and he shall be great d full of the Holy Ghost from the womb of his other, &c.

What if a man should say these words every day, ween the Pater Noster, and the Ave Maria, in the orship of St. Zachary, who I think is a saint in hea- n, and was ere ever our lady came there to be ho- ured, I think he might please and honour St. Za- ary, as well some other way, and better too, though ey were words sent from God, spoken by an angel, d written by St. Luke in holy scripture.

And yet if it were once begun and accustomed, I war- ant some men would make it more than sacrilege to ave it off, though the devil should sow ever so much perstition by process of time unto it.

Christ made the Pater Noster for a prayer, and bid is people say it to his heavenly Father, One God in rinity of Persons, one Father and Comforter, one orker and Doer of all things here in this world, say- ng unto us, After this manner shall ye pray, Our ather, &c. God sent his Son, amongst other things, o teach his people to pray: God sent his angel to greet ar lady, not to teach his people to pray. For neither Christ nor the angel said to the people, This shall you pray, Ave Maria. When the apostles said to Christ, Teach us to pray; Christ said, When you pray, say, Our Father: he said not when you pray, say, Ave Maria. I suppose Christ could teach to pray, as well as Dr. Powel and Mr. Hubberdin. I say that the Ave Maria was before the Pater Noster; Dr. Powel saith, t shall endure after the Pater Noster: I can prove my saying by scripture, which he cannot: yet as it is no good argument, The Ave Maria was before the Pater Noster: therefore, it is properly a prayer: so it is no good ar- gument, The Ave Maria shall last after the Pater Nos- ter: therefore it is properly a prayer; without the an- tecedent be impossible, which is not credible to come out of such a fantastical brain.

Who was ever so mad as to think that words of holy scripture could not be well said: and yet we may not be so peevish as to allow the superstitious saying of holy scripture. The devil is crafty, and we frail and prone to superstition and idolatry; God give me grace to wor- ship him and his, not after our own curiosity, but ac- cording to his ordinance with all humility.

St. Zachary is to be honoured, and in no wise to be dishonoured: so that we may leave unsaid that which the angel said without dishonouring him.

It is not necessary to our salvation to make an ordi- nance of honouring him, with saying as the angel did.

It is better for a mortal man to do the office of a man, which God biddeth him to do, than to leave that un- done, and do the office of an angel which God bid- deth us not to do: if the other be presumption, I had rather presume to pray to God, which is God's bidding and man's office, than to presume into the office of an angel without God's bidding.

It is a godly presumption, to presume to do the bid- ding of God.

Here I neither say, that our lady was a sinner, nor yet deny the Ave Maria.

SAINTS are not to be HONOURED.

I Said this word [Saints] is diversly taken by the vulgar people; images of saints are called saints, and inha- biters of heaven are called saints. Now by honouring of saints, is meant praying to saints. Take honouring so, and images for saints; so saints are not to be honour- ed: that is to say, dead images are not to be prayed unto; for they have neither ears to hear withal, nor tongue to speak withal, nor heart to think withal, &c.

They can neither help me nor mine ox, neither my head nor my tooth, nor work any miracle for me, one no more than another: and yet I shewed the good use of them to be laymen's books as they are called, reve- rently to look upon them, to remember the things that are signified by them, &c.

And yet I would not have them so costly and curi- ously gilt and decked, that tke quick image of God, (for whom Christ shed his blood, and to whom what- soever is done Christ reputeth it done to himself) lack necessities and be unprovided for by that occasion, for then the layman doth abuse his book.

A man may read upon his book, though it be not very curiously gilded; and in the day-time a man may behold it without many candles, if he be not blind.

Now I say there be two kinds of mediators, one by way of redemption, another by way of intercession; and I said that these saints, that is to say, images called saints, be mediators neither way.

As touching pilgrimages, I said, that all idolatry, superstition, error, false faith, and hope in the images, must be pared away, before they can be well done, household looked upon, poor christian people provided for, restitutions made, all ordinances of God discharged, or ever they can be well done. And when they be at best, before they be vowed, they need not to be done: they shall never be required of us, though they be never done, and yet we shall be blamed when they be all done; wives must advise with their husbands, and hus- bands with their wives, both with curates, ere ever they may be vowed to be done.

And yet idolatry may be committed in doing of them, as it appeareth by St. Paul, in the first epistle to the Corinthians, chap. x. where he biddeth the Corin- thians this; to beware of idolatry, and that after they had received the true faith in Christ; which had been vain, if they could not have done idolatry: and exposi- tors add, to beware not only of the act of idolatry, but also of all occasion of that act: which is plain against Mr. Hubberdin, and parson of Christ's church, who went about to prove, that now there could be no idolatry.

As touching the saints in heaven, I said, They be not our mediators by way of redemption: for so Christ alone is our Mediator and their's both: so that the blood of martyrs hath nothing to do by way of redemption: the blood of Christ is enough for a thousand worlds, &c.

But by way of intercession, so saints in heaven may be mediators, and pray for us, as I think they do, when we call not upon them; for they be charitable, and need no spurs, and we are not openly required of God in scripture to call upon them, as we are to call upon God, nor yet may we call upon them without any diffidence or mistrust in God; for God is more charitable, more merciful, more able, more ready to help than them all, so that though we may desire the saints in heaven to pray to God for us, yet it is not so necessary to be done, but that we may pray to God ourselves, without first making suit to them, and obtain of him whatsoever we need, if we continue in prayer; so that whatsoever we ask the Father in the name of Christ, his Son, the Father will give it us: for saints can give nothing without him, but he can without them, as he did give to them; scripture doth set saints that be departed before our eyes for our examples, so that the chiefest and most principal worship and honouring of them is to know their holy living, and to follow them, as they followed Christ, &c.

God biddeth us come to him with prayer, and to follow his advice is no presumption, it is rather presuming to leave it undone to do that which he biddeth us not do, &c. We must have saints in reverent memory, and learn, at God's goodness towards them, to trust in God, and mark well their faith towards God and his word, their charity towards their neighbour, their patience in all adversity, and pray to God who gave them grace so to do, that we may do likewise, for such like doings we shall have like speedings, they be well honoured when God is well pleased; the saints were not saints by praying to saints, but by believing in him that made them saints: and as they were saints, so we may be saints; yea, there be many saints that never prayed to saints, and yet I deny not, but we may pray to saints, but rather to him who can make us saints, who calleth us to him, biddeth us call upon him, promiseth help, cannot deceive us and break his promise; when we pray faithfully to him, we honour him, nor after our own fantastical imagination, but even after his own wise ordinances, whom to honour is not to dishonour saints; therefore they lie that say, that I would not have saints to be honoured, &c.

There is no FIRE in HELL.

I Never knew a man that said so. I spake of divers opinions that have been written of the nature of that fire; some that it is a spiritual fire, or at least way a spiritual pain in the corporal fire; for as it is called a fire, so it is called a worm, but a spiritual and metaphorical worm, so they think of the fire. Some that it is a corporal and natural fire; some have thought diversly before the resurrection without the body, and after with the body; some that the soul without the body suffereth in the fire, but not of the fire; some both in and of the fire. The scholastic authors think, that the souls before the resurrection, because they be of spiritual substance, do not receive the heat of the fire into them, which is a sensible and a corporal quality, so that Athanasius, a Greek author, calleth their pain Tristitiam, a heaviness or anguish; and this opinion is probable enough: some think, though they be always in pain, yet they be not always in fire; but go from waters of snow to exceeding heat; but it is when their bodies be there; but whether in cold or heat, in water or in fire, in air or in earth, they lack no pain, their torment goeth with them, for they think that the devils that tempt us, though they have pain with them, yet they have not fire with them, for then they should be known by the heat of the fire.

I am certain, saith St. Augustine, that there is a fire in hell, but what manner of fire, or in what part of the world, no man can tell but he that is of God's privy council: I would advise every man to be more ready to keep out of hell, than trust he shall find no fire in hell. Chrysostom saith, That to be deprived of the Godhead, is greater pain than being in hell: there is fire burning, there is heat, there is pain without pleasure, torment without ease, anguish, heaviness, sorrow, and pensiveness, which crieth and abideth for all liars and hinderers of truth.

There is no PURGATORY after this LIFE.

NOT for such liars as will bear me in hand that I said not; I shewed the state and condition of them that be in purgatory: then I denied it, that they have charity in such surety that they cannot lose it, so that they cannot murmur against God, cannot dishonour God, can neither displease God, be displeased with God, cannot be dislevered from God, cannot die, nor be in peril of death, cannot be damned, nor be in danger of damnation; cannot be but in fear of salvation; they be members of the mystical body of Christ as we be, and in more surety than we be: they love us charitably; charity is not idle, that is, it worketh and sheweth itself, and therefore I say, they will pray well, and pray for us; they need not cry loud to God, they be in Christ, and Christ in them, they be with Christ, and Christ with them, they joy with the Lord Christ always, taking thankfully whatsoever God doth with them, ever giving thanks to their Lord God, ever lauding and praising him in all things that he doth, and content with nothing that he doth, &c.

And forasmuch as they be always in charity, and when they pray for us, they pray always in charity, and be always God's friends, God's children, brethren and sisters to our Saviour Christ, even in God's favour, even with Christ with them, to offer their prayer to the Father in heaven, to whom they pray in the name of the Son. And we many times for lack of charity, having malice, envy, rancour, and hatred one towards another, be the children of the devil, inheritors of hell, adversaries to Christ, hated of God, his angels, and all his saints: they in their state may do us more good with their prayers, than we in this state. And they do us always good, unless the lack and impediment be in us; for prayer in charity is more fruitful to him that it is said for, and more acceptable to God, than said out of charity; for God looketh not to the work of praying, but to the heart of the prayer. We may well pray for them, and they much better for us, which they will do of their charity, though we desire them not.

I had rather be in purgatory than in the bishop of London's prison; for in this I might die bodily for lack of meat; in that I could not. In this I might die spiritually for fear of pain, or lack of good counsel; in that I could not. In this I might be in extreme necessity, in that I could not, if extreme necessity be peril of perishing. And then you know what followeth, if we be not bounden by precept to help, but them that be in extreme necessity, we see not who needeth in purgatory, but we see who needeth in this world. And John saith, If thou see thy brother, and help him not, how is the charity of God in thee? Here, either we be, or we may be in extreme necessity, both in body and soul; in purgatory neither one nor other. Here we be bound to help one another, as we would be helped ourselves under pain of damnation. Here for lack of help, we may murmur and grudge against God, dishonour God, undo ourselves, which inconveniences shall not follow, if we do our duty to one another. I am sure the souls in purgatory be so charitable, and of charity so loth to have God dishonoured, that they would have nothing withdrawn from the poor here in this world, to be bestowed upon them which might occasion the dishonour of God, &c.

Therefore, howsoever we do for purgatory, let us provide to keep out of hell. And had I a thousand pounds to bestow, as long as I saw necessary occasion offered to me of God to dispense it upon my needy brother here in this world, according to God's commandment, I would not withdraw my duty from him for any provision of purgatory, gatory, as long as I saw dangerous ways unrepaired, or men's daughters unmarried, men beg for lack of work, sick and sore for lack of succour. I would have difference between that which may be done, and that which ought to be done, and this to go before that, and that to come after this. If God command one way, mine own devotion moveth me another way, which should I go? I may by no tentials, no masses, no alms of heaven, make a foundation for myself with other men's goods; goods wrongfully gotten must needs be again, must needs be restored to the owners, if they can be known, if not, they be poor men's goods: debts must needs be paid, creditors satisfied and content, God's ordinance towards my neighbour here in this world discharged, all affections and lusts moving to the contrary purged. Or else, though our soul-priests sing they be bleared-eyed, or say mass till they have worn their tongues to the stumps, neither their singings nor their sayings shall bring us out of hell, whither we shall go for contemning God's prohibitions. He that purgeth all errors of false opinions, all unwillingness to do God's ordinance, provideth not for hell purgatory. Purgatory's iniquity hath set aside restitutions, and brought poor christians to extreme beggary, plentiful hell, and left heaven almost empty.

In Purgatory there is no pain

- That can break their charity.
- That can break their patience.
- That can disserve them from Christ.
- That can disserve Christ from them.
- That can cause them to dishonour God.
- That can cause them to displease God.
- That can cause them to be displeased with God.
- That can cause them to be discontent with God.
- That can bring them to peril of death.
- That can bring them to peril of damnation.
- That can bring them to extreme necessity.
- That can bring them from surety of salvation.

And yet it followeth not that there is no pain. Howbeit, if the bishop's two fingers can shake away good part, if a friar's cowl, or the pope's pardon, or the key of St. Peter, can dispatch for all together, it is so greatly to be cared for, I have not leisure to write large, and I wrote before such things which in this time come now to mind.

They that can reclaim at this, that the souls in purgatory do pray for us, if they could get as much money for prayer, that the souls in purgatory say for us, as they have done for that that they have said for them, they could not reclaim: you know the wasp that doth sting man, and make them so swell, they that reclaim at that, do not reclaim at this, nor at this following.

Christ's blood is not sufficient without the blood of martyrs.
 Magdalen did not know Christ to be God before his resurrection.
 There can be no idolatry.
 Rome cannot be destroyed.
 The pope is lord of all the world.
 Whatsoever he doeth is well done.
 Pater Noster is to be said to St. Peter.
 Pater Noster is but a beggarly prayer.

Ave Maria is infinitely better.
 Twenty Ave Marias for one Pater Noster.
 It was not necessary for scripture to be written.
 He that leaveth father and mother maketh for our pilgrimage.
 With many more.

LATIMER's LETTER to Mr. MORRICE, concerning the ARTICLES written, which were falsely laid against him.

RIGHT worshipful, and mine own good master Mr. Morrice, health in Christ Jesus. And I thank you for all hearty kindness, not only heretofore shewed unto me, but also that now of late you would vouchsafe to write unto me so poor a wretch, to my great comfort among all these my troubles. I trust and doubt nothing in it, but God will reward you for me, and abundantly supply mine inability, &c. Mr. Morrice, you would wonder to know how I have been treated at Bristol, I mean by some of the priests, who first desired me, welcomed me, made me cheer, heard what I said, and allowed my saying in all things while I was with them; when I was gone home to my benefice, perceiving that the people favoured me so greatly, and that the mayor had appointed me to preach at Easter, privily they procured an inhibition for all them that had not the bishop's license, which they knew well enough I had not, and so craftily defeated master mayor's appointment, pretending they were sorry for it, procuring also certain preachers to rail against me, as Hubberdin and Powel, with others, whom when I had brought before the mayor, and the wise council of the town, to know what they could lay to my charge, wherefore they so declaimed against me, they said they spake as they were informed: however no man could be brought forth that could stand to any thing: so that they had place and time to belie me shamefully, but they had no place or time to lay to my charge when I was present and ready to make them answer. God amend them, and assuage their malice, that they have against the truth and me, &c.

Our LADY was a SINNER.

SO they did belie me to have said, when I had said nothing so, but to reprove certain, both priests and beneficed men, which do give so much to our lady, as though she had not been saved by Christ, a whole Saviour, both of her, and of all that be, or shall be saved: I did reason after this manner, that either she was a sinner, or no sinner; if a sinner, then she was delivered from sin by Christ; so that he saved her, either by delivering or preserving her from sin, so that without him, neither she, nor none other, either be, or could be saved. And to avoid all offence, I shewed how it might be answered, both to certain scriptures, which maketh all generally sinners, and how it might be answered unto Chrysostom and Theophylact, which makes her namely and specially a sinner. But all would not serve, their malice was so great; notwithstanding that five hundred honest men can and will bear record. When they cannot reprove that thing that I do say, then will they belie me, to say that thing which they can reprove; for they will needs appear to be against me.

SAINTS are not to be WORSHIPPED.

SO they lied when I had shewn certain divers significations of this word (Saints) among the vulgar people: First, images of saints are called saints, and so they are not to be worshipped: take worshipping of them for praying to them; for they are neither mediators by way of redemption, nor yet by way of intercession. And yet they may be well used when they be applied to the uses for which they were ordained, to be laymen's books for remembrance of heavenly things, &c.

Take saints for inhabitants of heaven, and worshipping of them, for praying to them, I never denied, but that they might be worshipped, and be our mediators, though not by the way of redemption, (for so Christ alone is a whole Mediator, both for them and for us) yet by the way of intercession.

PILGRIMAGE.

AND I never denied pilgrimage. And yet I have said that much scurf must be pared away, ere ever it can be well done; superstition, idolatry, false faith, and trust in the image, unjust estimation of the thing, setting aside God's ordinances for doing of the thing; debts must be paid, restitution made, wife and children must be provided for, duty to our neighbours discharged. And when it is at the best, before it be vowed, it need not be done, for it is neither under the command of God nor man to be done. And wives must advise with husbands, husbands, and husbands and wives with curates, before it be done.

AVE MARIA.

AS for Ave Maria, who can think that I would deny it? I said it was an heavenly greeting, or saluting of our blessed lady, wherein the angel Gabriel, sent from the Father of heaven, did annunciate and shew unto her the good-will of God towards her, what he would with her, and to what he had chosen her. But I said it was not properly a prayer, as the Pater Noster, which our Saviour Christ himself made for a proper prayer, and bid us to say it for a prayer, not adding that we should say ten or twenty Aves or Marias withal: and I denied not but that we may well say Ave Marias also, but not so that we shall think that the Pater Noster is not good, a whole and perfect prayer, nor cannot be well said without Ave Maria; so that I did not speak against the well saying of it, but against superstitious saying of it, and of the Pater Noster too; and yet I put a difference betwixt that, and that which Christ made to be said for a prayer.

No FIRE in HELL.

WHO ever could say or think so? However, good authors do make a difference betwixt suffering in the fire with bodies, and without bodies. The soul without the body is a spiritual substance, which they say cannot receive a corporal quality, and some make it a spiritual fire, and some a corporal fire. And as it is called a fire, so it is called a worm, and it is thought of some not to be a material worm, that is, a living beast, but it is a metaphor, but that is nothing to the purpose; for a fire it is, a worm it is, pain it is, torment it is, anguish it is, a grief, a misery, a sorrow, a heaviness inexplicable, and intolerable, whose nature and condition in every point, who can tell, but he that is of God's privy council? saith St. Austin. God give us grace rather to be diligent to keep us out of it, than to be curious to discuss the property of it; for certain we be, that there is little ease, yea, none at all, but weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth, which be two effects of extreme pain, rather certain tokens what pain there is, than what manner of pain there is.

No PURGATORY.

HE that sheweth the state and condition of it, doth not deny it. But I had rather be in it than in Lollard's Tower, the bishop's prison, for divers reasons.

First, In this I might die bodily for lack of meat and drink; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might die spiritually for fear of pain, or lack of good counsel; there I could not.

Item, In this I might be in extreme necessity; in that I could not, if it be peril of perishing.

Item, In this I might lack charity; there I could not.

Item, In this I might lose my patience; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be in danger of death; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be without surety of salvation; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might dishonour God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might murmur and grudge against God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might displease God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be displeased with God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be judged to perpetual prison, as they call it; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be craftily handled; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be brought to bear a faggot; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be discontented with God; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be separated and dislevered from Christ; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be a member of the devil; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might be an inheritor of hell; in that I could not.

Item, In this I might pray out of charity, and in vain; in that I could not.

Item, In this my lord and his chaplains might manacle me by night; in that they could not.

Item, In this they might strangle me, and say that I hanged myself; in that they could not.

Item, In this they might have me to the consistory, and judge me after their fashion; from thence they could not.

Therefore, I had rather to be there than here. For though the fire be called ever so hot, yet if the bishop's two fingers can shake away a piece, a friar's cowl another part, and Scali Cœli all together, I will never found an abbey, college, nor chauntry, for that purpose.

For seeing there is no pain that can break my charity, break my patience, cause me to dishonour God, to displease God, to be displeased with God, cause me not to joy in God, nor that can bring me to danger of death, or to danger of desperation, or from surety of salvation, that can separate me from Christ, or Christ from me, I care the less for it. John Chrysostom saith, the greatest pain that damned souls have, is to be separate and cut off from Christ for ever; which pains the souls in purgatory neither have nor can have.

Consider, Mr. Morrice, whether provision for purgatory hath not brought thousands to hell. Debts have not been paid; restitution of evil-gotten lands and goods hath not been made; christian people (whose necessities we see, to whom whatsoever we do Christ reputeth done do himself, to whom we are bound under pain of damnation to do for, as we would be done for ourselves) are neglected and suffered to perish; last wills unfulfilled and broken; God's ordinance set aside: and also for purgatory, foundations have been taken for sufficient satisfaction; so we have trifled away the ordinances of God and restitutions. Thus we have gone to hell with masses, dirges, and ringing of many a bell. And who can pull pilgrimages from idolatry, and purgatory from robbery, but he shall be in peril to come in suspicion of heresy with them? So that they may fleece one with pilgrimage, and spoil with purgatory. And verily the abuse of them cannot be taken away, but great lucre and advantage shall fall away from them, who had rather have profit with abuse, than lack the same with use; and that is the wasp that doth sting them and maketh them to swell. And if purgatory were purged of all that it hath gotten, by setting aside restitution, and robbing of Christ, it would be but a poor purgatory; so poor, that it should not be able to feed a fat, and trick up so many idle and slothful lubbers.

I take God to witness, I would hurt no man, but grieveth me to see such abuse continue without remedy. I cannot understand what they mean by the pope's pardoning of purgatory, but by way of suffrage; and as for suffrage, unless he do his duty, and seek not his own, but Christ's glory, I had rather have the suffrage of Jack in the skultery, who in his calling doth exercise both faith and charity; but as for his mass, that is as good of another simple priest as of him. As for authority of keys, it is to loose from guiltiness of sin and eternal pain due to the same, according to Christ's word, and not to his own private will: and as for pilgrimage, you would wonder what juggling there is to get money withal. I dwell within half a mile of the Foss-way, and you would wonder to see how they come by flocks out of the West-country to many images, but chiefly to the blood of the Hailes. And they believe verily that in the very blood that was in Christ's body, shed upon the mount of Calvary for our salvation, and that the sight of it with their bodily eye doth certify them, and putteth them out of doubt, but they be clean in life, and in a state of salvation without spot of sin, which doth embolden them to do many things. For you would wonder if you should commune with them both coming and going, what faith they have. For as for forgiving their enemies, and reconciling their christian brethren, cannot away withal; for the sight of that blood quit them for a time.

I read in scripture of two certifications; one to the mans: "We being justified by faith have peace with God."

If I see the blood of Christ with the eye of my soul, it is true faith, that his blood was shed for me,

Another in the epistle of St. John: We know that we are translated from death to life, because we love the brethren." But I read not that I have peace with God, that I am translated from death to life, because I see with my bodily eye the blood of Hailes. It is very probable, that all the blood that was in the body of Christ, was united and knit to his Divinity, and then no part thereof shall return to his corruption. And I marvel that Christ shall have two resurrections. And if it were that they did violently and injuriously pluck it out of his body when they scourged him and nailed him to the cross, did see it with their bodily eye, yet they were in clean life. And we see the self-same blood in the cup of wine, when we have consecrated, and may both see it, feel it, and receive it to our damnation, as touching bodily receiving. And many do see it at Hailes without confession, as they say. God knoweth all, and the devil in our time is not dead.

Christ hath left a doctrine behind him, wherein we are taught how to believe, and what to believe; he doth leave the devil to use his craftiness, for our trial and provocation. It were little thank-worthy to believe well and rightly, if nothing should move us to false faith, and to believe superstitiously. It was not in vain that Christ, when he had taught truly, by and by said, Beware of the prophets, who would bring in error slyly. But we secure and careless as though false prophets could not trifle with us, and as if the warning of Christ were more earnest and effectual, than is the warning of others when they trifle with their children, and bid them beware of the bugg, &c.

Lo, sir, how I run at riot beyond measure. When I began, I was minded to have written but half a dozen lines; but thus I forget myself, whenever I write to a familiar friend, who will take in worth my folly, and keep from mine enemy, &c.

As for Dr. Wilson, I know not what I should say; but I pray God endue him with charity. Neither he nor any of his country-men did ever love me, since he did inveigh against their factions, and partiality in Cambridge. Before that, who was more favoured of God than I? That is the bile that may not be touched, &c.

A certain friend shewed me, that Dr. Wilson is gone now into his country, about Beverley, in Holderness, and from thence he will go a journey through Yorkshire, Lancashire, Cheshire, and so from thence to Bristol. What he intendeth by this progress, God knoweth, and not I. If he come to Bristol, I shall hear, &c.

As for Hubberdin (no doubt) he is a man of no great learning, nor yet of stable wit. He is here Servus ominum; for he will preach whatsoever the bishops shall bid him preach. Verily in my mind they are more to be blamed than he. He doth magnify the pope more than enough. As for our Saviour Christ and christian preachers, they are little beholden to him. No doubt he misuses the cushion in many things. However, they that did send him, men think, will defend him; I pray God amend him and them both. They would fain make matter against me, intending so either to deliver me by me, or else to rid us both together, and so they could think him well bestowed, &c.

As touching Dr. Powel, how highly he took upon himself in Bristol, and how little he regarded the sword, which representeth the king's person, many can tell you.
I think there is never an earl in this realm that knoweth his obedience by Christ's commandment to his prince, nor knoweth what the sword doth signify, that would be taken upon him so stoutly. However Mr. Mayor, he is a profound wise man, did flout him prettily;
therefore too long to write all. Our pilgrimages are not a little beholden to him, in favour of which he alledged this text: Whoever leaveth father, house, wife, &c. By that you may perceive his hot zeal and crooked judgment, &c. Because I am so belied, I could wish that it would please the king's grace to command me to preach before his highness a whole year together every Sunday, that he himself might perceive how they believe me, saying, that I have neither learning nor utterance worthy thereunto, &c. I pray you pardon me;
No. 28.

I cannot make an end.

A brief DIGRESSION concerning the RAILING of Mr. HUBBERDIN against Mr. LATIMER.

FORASMUCH as mention hath been made in this letter of Mr. Hubberdin, an old divine of Oxford, a right painted pharisee, and a great strayer abroad in all quarters of the realm, to deface and impeach the purity of God's holy gospel, something will be added more concerning that man, whose doings and pageants, if they might be described at large, it were as good as any interlude for the reader to behold. Who in all his life, and in all his actions (in one word to describe him) seemeth nothing else but a right image or a counterfeit, setting out unto us in lively colours the pattern of perfect hypocrisy. But because the man is now gone, to spare therefore the dead, (although he little deserved to be spared, who never spared to work what villainy he could against the true servants of the Lord) this shall be enough for example's sake, for all christian men necessarily to observe, how the said Hubberdin, after his long railing in all places again Luther, Melancthon, Zuinglius, John Frith, Tindal, Latimer, and all other like professors, after his hypocritical open alms given out of other men's purses, his long prayers, devout fastings, his mean habit, and other his prodigious demeanor, riding in his long gown down to the horse heels like a pharisee, or rather like a sloven dirted up to the horse's belly, after his forged tales and fables, dialogues, dreams, dancings, hoppings and leaping, with other player-like toys and gestures used in the pulpit, and all against heretics; at last riding by a church side, where the youth of the parish were dancing in the churchyard, he suddenly alighting from his horse, by the occasion of their dancing, came into the church, and there causing the bell to toll in the people, thought instead of a fit of mirth, to give them a sermon of dancing. In which sermon, after he had patched up certain common texts out of the scriptures, and then coming to the doctors, first to Augustine, then to Ambrose, so to Jerome and Gregory, Chrysostom, and other doctors, had made them every one (after his dialogue manner) by name to answer to his call, and to sing after his tune for the probation of the sacrament of the altar against John Frith, Zuinglius, Oecolampadius, Luther, Tindal, Latimer, and other heretics (as he called them): at last to shew a perfect harmony of all these doctors together, as he had made them before to sing after his tune, so now to make them dance also after his pipe, first he calleth out Christ and his apostles, then the doctors and ancient seniors of the church, as in a round ring all to dance together; with pipe up Hubberdin. Now dance Christ, now dance Peter, Paul, now dance Augustine, Ambrose, Jerome; and thus old Hubberdin, as he was dancing with his doctors lustily in the pulpit against the heretics, how he stamped and took on I cannot tell, but crash came the pulpit, down cometh the dancer, and there lay Hubberdin, not dancing, but sprawling in the midst of his audience; where although he brake not his neck, yet he brake so his leg at the same time, and bruised his old bones, that he never came in the pulpit more, and died not long after the same. Whereupon when the church-wardens were called, and charged for the pulpit not being stronger, they made answer again, excusing themselves that they had made their pulpit for preaching and not for dancing, &c. But to spend no more paper about this idle matter, now to our purpose again.

Amongst many other accusers and adversaries, whereof there was no small sort which did infect this good man in sermons, some also there were which attempted the pen against him. In the number of whom was one Dr. Sherwood, who upon the same occasion of preaching of the virgin Mary (or as they thought against the virgin) did invade him with his pen, writing against him in Latin, whose long epistle, with Mr. Latimer's answer also in Latin to the same, here under followeth now translated into English.

From Dr. WILLIAM SHERWOOD to Mr. LATIMER.

WILLIAM SHERWOOD; Priest, to Mr. LATIMER, Rector of WEST-KINGSTON, Grace and Peace from GOD the FATHER, and from our LORD JESUS CHRIST.

WORTHY SIR,

PResuming you will not take it amiss to be christianly admonished by a christian, I have sent these lines, to reason with you about some things delivered by you in a sermon, or rather a satyre, lately preached at Great-field, not much like a christian: and first, concerning the parable of the thief and the shepherd, where you truly said, that our Saviour reproved the scribes and pharisees for the hardness of their hearts, but not openly, but secretly, and in general he did not say to every one of the scribes and pharisees, Ye are thieves and robbers; but what did he say? Why, verily I say unto you, he who enters not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth in some other way, the same is a thief and a robber: on the contrary, you openly declare all popes, bishops, and priests, to be thieves and robbers (yourself, and a few of the refuse of the people excepted); thus you have preached or deceived the people: but perhaps you meant it for an hyperbole; if so, it was a very cruel and unjust one. My brother, we are not so rashly to judge before the time (if we may believe St. Paul) when the Lord shall come, who will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and manifest the counsels of the heart: also Christ himself, whom the Father has appointed Judge both of the living and the dead, in Matthew, seems to forbid the rash judging of our neighbour, where he says, Judge not that ye be not judged, for with what judgment ye judge ye shall be judged, and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again, and such like.

I would have vice exposed, but I would not have light put for darkness, nor darkness for light; nor that good should be called evil, and evil good, sweet bitter, and bitter sweet. If this should be, then each in his turn would devour one another. But I need urge this no farther, the thing itself appears so plain, we know your designs, and what notice has been taken of them. Alas! alas! Latimer, what madness urged you to preach, or lie, saying, There are more thieves than shepherds, more goats than sheep? St. Cyprian said otherwise, Let God be true, and every man a liar, the greater number of christians is still best, more are those who keep the faith intire than those the devil has seduced. You also cry out against those things which the church hath in the highest reverence, and which have been brought in by those who have suffered for the name of Christ. For you say, any man who like Peter did confess Christ to be the Son of the living God, has as much power as Peter, and that the church there mentioned signifies any congregation; so that Peter was no more Christ's supreme vicar upon earth than any other christian. St. Origen says, we are like Peter, if we make the same confession as he did, namely, Thou art the Son of the living God, not by flesh and blood revealed unto us, but by the Father who is in heaven illuminating our minds; shall we say that these words are of as great force as those spoke to Peter himself? No, no. For after the name of Christ all his faithful servants are called, as says the prophet, that he might save his Christ's, and again, Touch not my Christ's. The words here used differ from those which only signify anointed. Erasmus (whom you follow and imitate in many things) in his annotations on the 16th chapter of St. Matthew, upon these words Thou art Peter, &c. says very justly, that he was the first Roman pontiff and head of the christian faith. But if, like you, we should say this of all christians equally with Peter, we should fall into that error of Luther, that all christians are priests, and that after ordination they have no more power than before, that only licensing them to exercise it. But this has been condemned by the church a great while ago.

On those words of Christ, where he says, the least of these precepts, you say he alludes to the wickedness of the scribes and pharisees, who to raise their own traditions, called the divine commandments, the least commandments: but here you differ widely from Origen, diligent interpreter of scripture, who in his homily on the fifth of St. Matthew, says, Some precepts may be called least, since from the observation of them it is said some shall be least and some shall be great in the kingdom of heaven.

You find fault because we say that Christ went up into the mount only with a few disciples, the multitude, the scribes and pharisees not being worthy to hear that divine sermon; you have subjoined (not much like a christian, I think) that a christian man who hath any carnal desires, is no more a christian than a Jew or a Turk: this seems to me not like a christian, but Occolampadius.

Some things are here wanting, which perhaps may be supplied from Mr. Latimer's answer.

This was needful to bring back the Germans to the beneficial confession of Peter; what it is you here drive I do not know: if it be his supremacy, truly every catholic is obliged to defend it with all his strength: had not Peter the supremacy, the words of Christ are of no effect (I give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, &c.) if there is no need to defend the supremacy of Peter there is no need to defend the truth, for which every one ought to contend even to death. I cannot think the Germans can be brought to a beneficial confession of Peter without acknowledging his supremacy. Is Christ the Son of the living God? The Son of God is truth, but Christ is not truth if Peter has no supremacy. What a soul fall is here, for no advantage can come from the confession of Christ to that man who will not prefer and defend the apostolic chair with all his might: you say this is one of the most bare-faced lies, that Christ was in the mountain only with a few disciples. Origen, the most accurate interpreter of scripture, in his sermon on the fifth of St. Matthew, says plainly as I say, Jesus went down from the mountain, and there followed many multitudes; the disciples were with him in the mountain for to them it was given to know the secrets of his heavenly doctrine, the knowledge of salvation, which makes the heart of the most brutish to rejoice: they were to spread abroad the light of truth, to enlighten the eyes of those blinded with the thick darkness of worldly delight, whence it was our Lord said to them, Ye are the salt of the earth, ye are the light of the world; but now descending from the mount, the multitudes followed him; into the mountain none were able to ascend to hear those sublime mysteries, but those who had cast away the burden of all worldly delights. Thus you hear how Origen approves of mine and not of your interpretation.

You have found out certain false preachers, whom you know not, howsoever they are well known to you, who persuade the people it is enough for a christian to believe as the church believes, though at the same time they know neither what nor how the church believes: so the miserable vulgar are deterred from seeking after larger knowledge of God; that there are such preachers we are beholden to the Lutheran and heretic churches: they cannot possibly be in our's, since the bridegroom hath promised never to desert his spouse the church. What you have said else I pass over as mere jests. It is plain, that, lastly, you say I argue philosophically of the justification of faith, and yet you cannot overthrow my argument; but whether it is arguing philosophically, I say we are not justified by faith only, but rather by works done in faith and charity? If this is to argue like philosopher, then I am one, and not I only, but St. Augustine also. Faith is, I confess, as St. Augustine rightly says, the root and foundation of a holy life, which is the performance of all good by which we are justified; no man think that faith alone is able to justify exclusive of all good and pious works: the rest seeing I have said, I pass over; I shall only add, if thou dost well, thou shalt not be rewarded? but if thou dost ill, sin at thy door. When I have more leisure I shall write more fully of those things, till when farewell.

ANSWER to the foregoing, by Mr. LATIMER.

HEALTH to you in abundance. I do not know, worthy sir, that I am so fierce as not to bear patiently any christian admonition, or so insensible, that I am slandered, admonished, confuted, condemned by many and lies, I shall not justify myself; what if I should answer your letter with the same liberty you take? I forbear, lest instead of convincing I provoke your anger; rather God give us both wisely to know him, and to me patience worthy of a christian amidst so many afflictions, and to you a right judgment, that you be not transported too far by an over-hot zeal. I thought this my better than any apology for answering you, being so busy in writing a sermon which I must preach day after to-morrow, that I have no more leisure than there is obligation, to answer all your heap of lies; that I may satisfy you a little, I will say a few words to a great many. And first, the thing is what I have said, and what you say I have said. And here you are so hard put to it, that, as the saying is, you are forced to skin a flint; but so it is, that through all you there runs a continued strain of rage and malice. I have said, that all popes, bishops, and priests, enter not by the door into the sheep-fold, but climbing some other way, were thieves and robbers; the stress is on their entering and climbing up, not on their persons or titles; and I say no more than what Christ himself says: hence, you of your own head charge me with saying, that all popes, bishops, and priests, were thieves and robbers. Now (my brother) is this fairly collected from what I said? May not I justly apply to you that of St. Paul to the Romans, so they have said, but they speak evil of us, and their damnation is just; and yet St. Paul's adversaries could not justly draw their conclusions from what he said, but you can from what I said. If the word of God be the same as it was at first, and the ministers of that word are as acceptable to him now as they were then, why should not the same damnation remain for their calumnies? But there is a great difference, you say, between saying all that enter not by the door are thieves and robbers, and saying simply, that all were thieves and robbers. But whence comes it, I beseech you, that whilst I say all that enter not by the door, should I apply to you simply to say all in general; unless more than to you to ascend some other way, than to enter by the door, though you are too wise to own it? And if it is so, there is no wonder there should be more wolves than shepherds. For whether you will own it or not, it is true that whoever enters not by the door, are thieves and robbers, whether they be popes, bishops, or priests. You say our Saviour reproveth the scribes and pharisees privately, but the scripture says that to their faces: and before a great multitude he said unto them, ye unto you, scribes and pharisees, hypocrites, &c. You advise me not to judge lest I be judged, and this is to teach you how necessary it is for liars to have good memories, lest your throat be cut with your own sword, and you fall into the pit you had dug for others, I think you pass your judgment upon me when you account all thieves and robbers but myself and a few of the refuse of the people; you cry out that I have usurped the power of St. Peter, and of the keys, when I said not one word of the power of the keys, or made mention of St. Peter's supremacy: I told them not to build on a sandy foundation, but on the rock of Christ, not to be content with a dead faith, lest they endangered their own salvation, but to shew their faith

by their works, that at the last they may attain everlasting life. You know very well what Luther's sentiments were of the church; and I can readily subscribe to what Lyra, after many others, says on the 16th of St. Matthew, That the church doth not consist of men great either by ecclesiastical or civil power, for we have found that many princes and popes have apostatized from the faith, but of such who have a true knowledge both of the faith and truth of the christian religion. With him agree St. Jerome; and St. Chrysostom, who say, there are some more ready to defend the supremacy of St. Peter, a thing of no necessity, than to make that blessed confession which would be of real use: you dare to say, that Christ, when he called some of the commandments least, did not allude to the impiety of the pharisees, and that because you had read Origen had otherwise interpreted it; but may not one and the same place of scripture be differently expounded by different persons? Because Origen took no notice of this allusion, doth it therefore follow that nobody else should: when Christ himself tells them that they made the commandments of God of no effect by their traditions? Again, except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the scribes and pharisees, ye shall in no case enter the kingdom of heaven; you say, Christ preached his sermon on the mount only to a few of his disciples: this is plainly to contradict the scripture. In the 7th of St. Matthew it is said, that having ended these sayings, they were astonished at his doctrine, for he taught them as one that had authority. Who was it that were astonished? Why St. Luke will tell you it was the multitude that heard him, chapter the 7th, when he had ended all his sayings in the audience of the people. As to that of blaming any person for believing as the church believes, it is either your ill will which made you deaf, or else you were willing to hear what was never spoke. What I said was, that many false preachers tell the people to believe as the church believes; when they are ignorant in what manner the church believes. As to what, lastly, you call so inhuman, see St. Jerome on the 26th of St. Matthew, I say a christian, that is, one admitted into the church by baptism, if he answers not his profession, but gives himself up to fleshly desires, is in respect of eternal life which is promised to christians, no more a christian than a Jew or a Turk; yea, I say his condition shall be worse at the last day, if he says true, who says, It was better never to have known the way of truth, than after they have known, to fall away; it is the duty of a preacher to exhort all so to live with Christ here, that they may reign with him hereafter, otherwise (whatever they may think) they are no christians, so the interpreter of the scriptures speaks, but this seems to you heretical, for a covetous man, a fornicator, or a murderer, with you is a good catholic, and a servant of Christ, but these are also servants of sin and of the devil, therefore they can serve two masters, which was what Christ did not know. If so, a dead faith may be catholic, and devils may be members of the catholic church, as being those, who according to St. James believe and tremble. You say a fornicator believes in Christ, he who believes in Christ, shall not perish, but have everlasting life: also St. Paul writing to the Galatians, which had erred from the faith, calls them a church, and to the Corinthians, in one chapter, calls them both carnal persons and the temple of God, because some were good and some were bad; the evangelical net gathering of all sorts. Now, pray, is it a crime to exhort all to do good and not evil? If your discourse is no gentler than your letter, I desire I may hear none of it; but all bitterness, anger, and evil-speaking, with all malice, being taken from you, neither your discourse nor writing would be burdensome to me. I believe you desire no such auditors as yourself, and unless God gives you a better disposition, I shall never desire you to be one of mine.

From Mr. LATIMER to Dr. SHERWOOD.

MAY the Spirit of truth be with you. I have read your letter through carefully, but it is more worthy of the the flames than of my perusal, it abounds so much with slanders. What you have truly said you shall soon see. It is now a great while ago since several persons, who heard the sermon preached at Marchfield, told me, you being present, suffered the person openly, and with authority, to say, that those were unworthy and miserable wretches who saluted the virgin mother of God with the angelic salutation, unless they could raise her up again that she might bear Christ. I said, this was neither christianly nor religiously done, had you not been there; for we ought not to offend pious christians, who may not believe just as we do. Now whether this was slandering or not, rather giving pious and religious advice, &c.

The remaining part of this letter is vindicating himself from the same things as the former, and almost in the same words, which for brevity's sake we omit.

LETTER

From Mr. LATIMER to Sir EDWARD BAYNTON, Knight.

RIGHT worshipful sir, I recommend myself unto you, with hearty thanks for your friendly, charitable, and mindful remembrance of so poor a wretch. Whereas of late I received your letters by Mr. Bonnam, and perceiving therein who are grieved with me, and what behoveth me to do in case I must needs come up, for which your goodness towards me, whereas I myself am not able to recompense, I shall not cease to pray to my Lord God, who is both able, and also doth indeed reward all them that favour the favourers of his truth for his sake; for the truth is a common thing, pertaining to every man, for which every man shall answer another day. And I desire favour neither of your mastership, nor of any man else, but in the truth and for the truth, I take God to witness, which knoweth all.

In very deed Mr. Chancellor did shew me, that my lord bishop of London had sent letters to him for me; and I made answer that he was mine ordinary, and that he might and should reform me as far as I needed reformation, as well and as soon as my lord of London. And I would be very loth (now this deep winter) being so weak and so feeble, (not only exercised with my old disease in my head and side, but also with new, both the cholic and stone) to take such a journey; and though he might so do, yet he needed not, for he was not bound so to do. Notwithstanding I said, if he, to do my lord of London pleasure, to my great displeasure, would needs command me to go, I would obey his command, yea, though it should be ever so great a grievance and painful to me. With which answer he was content, saying, he would certify my lord of London thereof, trusting his lordship would be content with the same.

Mr. Chancellor also said, that my lord of London seemed greatly displeased with me, because I contemned his authority at my last being in London. Forsooth, I preached in Abbey-church, not certain then (as I remember) whether in his diocese or no, intending nothing less than to contemn his authority; and this I did at the request of honest merchantmen, as they seemed to me, whose names I do not know, for they were not of my acquaintance before; and I am glad thereof for their sakes, lest if I knew them, I should be compelled to utter them so, and their good desire to hear godly preaching should turn to their trouble; for they required me very earnestly, and to say the truth, very importunately. Whether they were of that parish or no, I was not certain: but they shewed not only themselves, but also many others, to be very desirous to hear me, pretending great hunger and thirst of the word of God, and spiritual doctrine. And upon consideration, and to avoid all inconveniences, I put them off, and refused them twice or thrice, till at last they brought me word, that the parson and curate were not only content, but also desired me: notwithstanding that they certified him both of my name plainly, and also that I had not the bishop's seal to shew for me, but only a licence of the university: which curate did receive me, welcomed me, and when I should go into the pulpit, gave me the common benediction; so that I had been not only uncharitable, but also churlishly uncharitable, if I should have said nay. Now all this supposed to be truth, (as it is) I marvel greatly how my lord of London can alledge any contempt of him in me.

First, He did never inhibit me in my life; and if he did inhibit his curate to receive me, what pertained that to me, who did neither know thereof, nor yet make any suit to the curate deceitfully; nor did it appear me very likely, that the curate would so little have regarded my lord's inhibition, which he maintaineth so vigilantly, not knowing my lord's mind before. Therefore I conjectured with myself, that either the curate was such acquaintance with my lord, that he might advise whom he would; or else (and rather) that it was a trap and a trap laid before me, to the intent that my lord himself, or some pertaining to him, appointed to have been there, and to have taken me if they could in my sermon; which conjecture both occasioned me some what to suspect those men which desired me, though they spake ever so fair and friendly, and also rather to go. For I preach nothing, but if it might be so, I would my lord himself might hear me every sermon I preach. So certain I am, that it is truth which I take in heart to preach. If I had with power of my friends (the curate gainfaying and withstanding me) presumed to have gone into the pulpit, there had been something wherefore to pretend a contempt. I preached in Kent at the earnest request of a curate; yet I do not think that his ordinary layeth any contempt to my charge, yet doth trouble the curate.

I marvel not a little how my lord bishop of London having so large and populous a diocese committed his charge, can have leisure for preaching and teaching the word of God, opportunely and pressingly, in field and out of season, publicly and privately, to his flock, in persuading, confuting, exhorting, and admonishing with all mildness and doctrine, have leisure (say) either to trouble me, or to trouble himself with me, so poor a wretch, a stranger to him, and nothing pertaining to his cure, but as every man pertained to every man's cure, so intermixing and intermeddling himself with another man's cure, as though he had nothing to do in his own. If I would do as some men do, my lord doth, gather up riches warily and covetously, and yet neither preach for it in mine own cure, nor elsewhere, peradventure he would deny me nothing. In very deed I did admonish both judges, and ordinaries to use charitable equity in their judgments towards us, as he accused, namely, of such accusers, who be able to hear and betray, as others be to say amiss, and to men's words in the meaning thereof, and not to take them in another sense than they were spoken. For all such accusers and witnesses do evil before God, as St. Jerome saith, upon the 26th chapter of St. Matthew. Nor yet do I account those judges well advised who wittingly will give sentence after such witnesses, much less those who procure such witnesses against any man; nor do I think judges now-a-days so well confirmed in grace, or so impeccable, but that they become preachers to admonish them to do well, as well as other men both great and small. And this I occasioned of the epistle which I declared, Rom. wherein is this sentence: Ye are not under the law, but under grace: ye christian men that believe in Christ are not under the law. What a saying is this, (says I) can he not rightly understood, that is, as St. Paul did understand it? for the words sound as though he would say about to occasion christian men to break the law, saying they be not under the law: and what if pseudo-apostles, adversaries to St. Paul, would have so taken it, and accused St. Paul to my lord of London? If my lord would have heard St. Paul declare his own mind of his own words, then he should have rebuked and the false apostles put to rebuke; if he would have rigorously followed whatsoever was alledged and proved, and have given sentence after relation of the accusers, then good St. Paul must have borne a false Paul's Cross, my lord of London being his judge.

had been a godly fight to have seen St. Paul with a got on his back, even at Paul's Cross, my lord of London, bishop of the same, sitting under the cross.
 ay, verily I dare say, my lord would sooner have rned him, for St. Paul did not mean that christian en might break the law, and do whatsoever they ould, because they were not under the law: but he d mean, that christian men might keep the law, and lfil the law, if they would, because they were not der the law, but under Christ, by whom they were vided from the tyranny of the law, and above the law, at is to say, able to fulfil the law, to the pleasure of m that made the law, which they could never do of eir own strength, and without Christ: so that to be nder the law, after St. Paul's meaning, is to be weak satisfy the law; and what could St. Paul do with all, ough his adversaries would so take it? But peradvenre my lord would say, that men will not take the preach-
 's words otherwise than they mean therein. Well id; as though St. Paul's words were not otherwise ken, as it appeareth in the third chapter of the Roans, where he saith, Our unrighteousness commend-h and maketh more excellent the righteousness of od, which soundeth to many as though they should e evil, that good should come of it, and by unrightesness to make the righteousness of God more excel-nt. So St. Paul was reported to mean; yet he did can nothing so, but shewed the inestimable wisdom God, who can use our naughtiness to the manifestaon of his unspeakable goodness; not that we should do ightly to that end and purpose. Now my lord will ot think (I dare say) that St. Paul was to blame that e spake no more circumspectly, more warily, or more ainly, to avoid evil offence of the people; but rather e will blame the people, for not taking better heed, d not giving more attendance to St. Paul's speaking, r the better understanding thereof: yea, he will rather ty the people, who have been so long misled by the octrine of the Pharisees, and wallowed so long in the arkness of man's traditions, superstitions, and trade of ing, that they were unapt to receive the bright light the truth and wholesome doctrine of God, uttered y St. Paul. Nor do I think my lord will require more circumspection, or more convenience to avoid offence of rors in me, than was St. Paul, when he did not escape alevolous corrections, and slanderous reports of them at were of perverse judgments, who reported him to y whatsoever he appeared to them to say, or whatsoer appeared to them to follow of his saying; but hat followeth? So they report us to say, saith St. Paul, they speak evil of us; but such whose damnation is st, saith he; and I think the damnation of all such as port evil of preachers now-a-days, likewise just, for it is truth now, as it was then. Yea, Christ himself was misrported, and falsely accused, both as touching his words, d also concerning the meaning of his words. First, he id, Destruite, that is to say, Destroy you: they made it ossum destruere; that is to say, I can destroy: he said templum hoc, This Temple; they added, Manu factum, at is to say, Made with hand, to bring it to a contrary
 nse. So they both inverted his words, and also added to his words, to alter his sentence: for he did mean e temple of his body, and they wrested it to Solomon's mple. Now I report me, whether it be a just fame ifed up and dispersed after this manner. Nay verily, r there be three manner of persons which can make o credible information: first, adversaries and ene-ies; secondly, ignorant, and without judgment; third, susurronees, that is to say, whisperers, and blowers men's ears, who will spue out in secret discourse, ore than they dare avow openly. The first will not, e second cannot, the third dare not: therefore the re-ion of such is not credible, and therefore they can ke no fame lawful, nor occasion any impartial judge make process against any man; and it maketh no le matter what they be themselves that report of any an, whether well or evil; for it is a great commenda-on to be evil spoken of, by them that be naught them-ves, and to be commended by them, is many times small reproach. God send us once grace to wish well to another, and to speak well one of another.

Methinks it were more comely for my lord (if it were comely for me to say so) to be a preacher himself, having so great a cure as he hath, than to be a disturber and troubler of preachers, and to preach nothing at all himself. If it would please his lordship to take so great a labour and pain at any time, as to come and preach in my little bishopric, at West Kingston, whether I was present or absent myself, I would thank his lordship heartily, and think myself greatly bounden to him, that he of his charitable goodness would go so far to help me in my cure, or else I were more unnatural than a beast unreasonable; nor yet would I dispute, contend, or demand by what authority, or where he had authority so to do, as long as his preaching were fruitful, and to the edification of my parishioners. As for my lord, he may do as it pleaseth his lordship. I pray God he do always as well as I would wish him ever to do. But I am sure St. Paul saith in the first chapter to the Philippians, that in his time some preached Christ for envy of him, thinking thereby so to grieve him withal, and as it were to obscure him, and to bring his authority into contempt:
 some of good will and love, thereby to comfort him: notwithstanding, (saith he) by all manner of ways, and after all fashions, whether it be of occasion or of truth, as you would say for truth's sake, so that Christ be preached and shewed, I joyed and will joy. So much he regarded more the glory of Christ, and the promotion of Christ's doctrine, to the edification of christian souls, than the maintenance of his own authority, reputation, and dignity, considering right well, (as he said) that what authority soever he had, it was to edification, and not to destruction. Now I think it were no reproach to my lord, but very commendable, rather to joy with St.
 Paul, and be glad that Christ be preached, in whatever manner, yea, though it were for envy, that is to say, in disdain, despight, and contempt of his lordship, (which thing no man well advised will attempt) than when the preaching cannot be reprov'd justly, to demand of the preacher austerely, as the pharisees did of Christ, By what authority do you these things, and who gave you this authority? As my authority is good enough, and as good as any my lord can give me, yet I would be glad to have his also, if it would please his lordship to be so good unto me. For the university of Cambridge hath authority apostolic to admit twelve yearly, of which I am one: and the king's highness, God save his grace, hath decreed, that all admitted of universities, should preach throughout all his realm, as long as they preached well, without interruption; my lord of Canterbury, my lord of Durham, with many such others stood by, and heard the decree, and also gave their consent to the same.
 Now to condemn my lord of London's authority, were no little fault in me; so no less fault might appear in my lord of London, to condemn the king's authority and decree, yea, so godly, so fruitful, so commendable a decree, pertaining both to the edification of christian souls, and also to the regard and defence of the popish grace and authority apostolic. To have a book of the king not inhibited, is to obey the king, and to inhibit a preacher of the king's admitted, is it not to disobey the king? Is it not one king that doth inhibit and admit, and hath he not as great authority to admit as to inhibit?
 He that resisteth the power, whether admitting or inhibiting, doth he not resist the ordinance of God? We low subjects are bound to obey powers, and their ordinances: and are not the highest subjects also, who ought to give us example of such obedience? As for my preaching itself, I trust in God, my lord of London cannot justly blame, nor reprove it; if it be taken with the circumstance thereof, and as I spake it, or else it is not my preaching, but his that falsely reporteth it, as the poet Martial said, to one that depraved his book,

To me ('tis true) you say those lines belong,
 But they're your own, whilst you repeat them wrong.

But now I hear say that my lord of London is informed, and upon the said information hath informed the king that I go about to defend Bilney, and his cause, against his ordinaries and his judges, which I assure

assure you is not so: for I had nothing to do with Bilney, nor yet with his judges, except his judges did him wrong; for I did nothing else but admonish all judges indifferently to do right; nor am I altogether so foolish as to defend the thing which I knew not. It might have become a preacher to say as I said, though Bilney had never been born. I have known Bilney a great while, I think much better than ever I did my lord of London: for I have been his spiritual father many times; and to tell you the truth, what I have thought always of him, I have known hitherto few such so prompt and ready to do every man good according to his power, both friend and foe, and willingly offending no man; in short, he was a very good and pious soul, in nothing fit for this wretched world, for the blindness of which he would lament and bewail as much as any man that I ever knew: as for his singular learning, as well in holy scripture, as in all good letters, I will not speak of it. Notwithstanding, if either now, of late, or at any time, he attempted any thing contrary to the obedience which a christian man doth owe either to his prince or to his bishop, I neither do nor will allow and approve that, neither in him, or any other man: we are all men, and liable to fall; wherefore he that standeth, let him beware he fall not. How he ordered or misordered himself in judgment, I cannot tell, nor will I meddle with it; God knoweth, whose judgments I will not judge. But I cannot but wonder, if a man living so mercifully, so charitably, so patiently, so continently, so studiously, and virtuously, and killing his old Adam, that is to say, mortifying his evil affections, and blind motions of his heart so diligently, should die an evil death, there is no more, but let him that standeth beware that he fall not: for if such as he shall die evil, what shall become of me, such a wretch as I am? But let this go, as little to the purpose, and come to the point we must rest upon. Either my lord of London will judge my outward man only, as it is said, Man seeth those things that are without; or else he will be my God, and judge mine inward man, as it is said, But God seeth the heart. If he will have to do only with mine outward man, and meddle with mine outward conversation, how that I have ordered myself towards my christian brethren, the king's liege people, I trust I shall please and content both my Lord God, and also my lord of London; for I have preached and reached but according to holy scripture, holy fathers, and ancient interpreters of the same, with which I think my lord of London will be pacified: for I have done nothing else in my preaching, but with all diligence moved my auditors to faith and charity, to do their duty, and that which is necessary to be done. As for things of private devotion, mean things, and voluntary things, I have reprov'd the abuse, the superstition of them, without condemnation of the things themselves, as it becometh preachers to do: which thing, if my lord of London will do himself (as I wish to God he would), he should be reported (no doubt) to condemn the use of such things, of covetous men that have damage, and find less in their boxes by condemnation of the abuse, which abuse they said rather should continue still, than their profit should not continue (so thorny are their hearts). If my lord will needs coast and invade my inward man, and break violently into my heart, I fear I shall displease my lord of London (which I would not willingly do) or else my Lord God, which I shall be more loth to do: not for any infidelity, but for ignorance, for I believe as a christian man ought to believe: but peradventure my lord knoweth, and will know many things certainly, which (perchance) I am ignorant in, with which ignorance, though my lord of London may if he will be discontent, yet I trust my Lord God will pardon it, as long as I hurt no man withal, and say to him with diligent study, and daily prayer, My heart is ready, O God, my heart is ready, so studying and preaching, and tarrying the pleasure and leisure of God: and in the mean season, Acts viii. as Apollos did, when he knew nothing of Christ, but the baptism of John, teach and preach mine, even christian like, and no farther than I know to be true. There are three creeds, one in my mass, another in my mattins, the third common to them that neither say mass nor mattins, nor yet know what they say when they say the creed: and I believe all that, with all that God hath left in holy writ, for me and all others to believe; yet I am ignorant in things which I trust hereafter to know, as I do know things in which I have been ignorant heretofore: ever learn, and ever to be learned, to profit with learning, with ignorance not to offend. I have thought in times past, that the pope, Christ's vicar, hath been lord of all the world as Christ is, so that if he should have deprived the king of his crown, or you of the lordship of Bromeham, it had been enough; for he could do no wrong. Now I might be hired to do otherwise: notwithstanding I have both seen and heard scripture drawn to that purpose. I have thought in times past, that the pope's dispensations of the pluralities of benefices, and absence from the same, had discharged consciences before God: forasmuch as I have heard, Lo! I am with you, and he who hears you, bended to corroborate the same. Now I might be intreated to think otherwise, &c.

I have thought in times past, that the pope could have spoiled purgatory at his pleasure with a word of his mouth; now learning might persuade me otherwise, or else I would marvel why he should suffer so much money to be bestowed that way, which is so needful to be bestowed otherwise, and to deprive us of so many patrons in heaven as he might deliver out of purgatory, &c. I have thought in times past, that if I had been a friar, and in a cowl, I could not have been damned, nor afraid of death, and by occasion of the same I have been minded many times to have been a friar, namely, when I was sore sick, and diseased: now I abhor my superstitious foolishness, &c. I have thought in times past, that divers images of saints could have helped me, and done me much good, and delivered me of my diseases: now I know that one can help as well as another. And it grieves my heart that my lord, and such as my lord is, can suffer the people to be so craftily deceived. It were too long to tell you what blindness I have been in, and how long it was ere I could forsake such folly, it was so incorporated in me: but by continual prayer, continual study of scripture, and oft communing with men of more right judgment, God hath delivered me, &c. Yea, men think my lord himself hath thought in times past, that by God's law a man might marry his brother's wife, which now both dare think and say the contrary: and yet this his boldness might have chanced, in pope Julius's days, to stand him either in a fire, or else in a faggot. Which thing deeply considered and pondered by my lord, might something stir him to charitable equity, and to be something remiss towards men, which labour to do good as their power serveth with knowledge, and do hurt to no man with their ignorance: for there is no greater distance than between God's law, and not God's law.

And finally as you say, the matter is weighty, and ought substantially to be looked upon, even as weighty as my life is worth; but how to look substantially upon it otherwise I know not, than to pray my lord God day and night, that as he hath emboldened me to preach his truth, so he will strengthen me to suffer for it, to the edification of them which have taken by the working of him fruit thereby; and even so I desire you, and all others that favour me for his sake, likewise to pray for it is not I (without his mighty helping hand) that can abide that brunt; but I have trust that God will help me in time of need, which if I had not, the ocean, I think, would have divided my lord of London and me by this day. For it is a rare thing for a preacher to have favour at his hand who is no preacher himself, and yet ought to be. I pray God that he and I may both discharge ourselves, he in his great cure, and I in my little one, to God's pleasure, and safety of our souls. Amen. I pray you pardon me, that I write no more distinctly, nor more truly, for my head is out of frame, that it would be too painful for me to write it again; and if I be not prevented, I intend to make merry with my parishioners this Christmas, for all the sorrow, perchance I never return to them again: and I have heard say, that a doe is as good in winter as a buck in summer.

Sir EDWARD BAYNTON, Knight, in Answer to BISHOP LATIMER.

MASTER LATIEER, after hearty recommendations, I have communicated the effect of your letters to divers of my friends, such as for christian charity (as they say) rather desire in you a reformation, rather in your opinion (if it swerve from the truth), or least in your manner and behaviour, inasmuch as it is occasion of slander and trouble, to the hindrance of your good purposes, than any other inconvenience to your person or good name. And forasmuch as your letter misliketh them in some part, and that I have confidence in your christian breast, as in my judgment you will conformably and gladly both hear what may be reformed in you, and also (as it is worthy) so knowledge and confess the same: I have therefore desired them to take the pains to note their mind in this letter which I send to you, as the sum of their sayings, and sent from me your assured friend and favourer, in that that is the very truth of God's word: wherein nevertheless, as I trust you will temper your own judgment, and in soberness affirm no truth of yourself, which should divide the unity of the congregation in spirit, and the received truth agreed upon by holy fathers of the church, consonant to the scripture of God, even to whatsoever you will do therein, (as I think you will not do otherwise than you should do) I being unlearned, and not of the knowledge to give sentence in such altercation and contention, must rather of good congruence shew myself in that you disagree with them, rather to follow their doctrine in truth, than your's, unless it may please Almighty God to inspire and comfort the hearts of such people to testify the same in the honest number, as ought to induce me to give credence unto them.

Only God knoweth the certain truth, which is communicated to us, as our capacity may understand it by faith, but that is through a glass darkly. And there have been those who have had a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge: Among whom I repute not you, but to this purpose I write it, that to call this or that truth, it requireth a deep and profound knowledge, considering that to me unlearned, what I take for truth may be otherwise, not having a sense exercised enough, as St. Paul saith, to discern good and evil: and it is shewed me, that an opinion or manner of teaching, which causeth dissention in a christian congregation, is not of God, by the doctrine of St. John in his epistle, where he saith, All who confess that Christ is come in the flesh, &c. are of God. And like as the word of God hath always caused dissention among men unchristened, whereupon hath ensued and followed martyrdom to the preacher: so in Christ's congregation, among them that profess Christ's name, in one Lord, one baptism, and one faith, they that preach and stir rather contention than charity, though they can defend their teaching, yet their teaching is not to be taken as of God, that it breaketh the chain of christian charity, and maketh division in the people, congregate and called by God into an unity of faith and baptism. But for this point I would pray to God, that not only in the truth may be agreement, but also such soberness and uniform behaviour used in teaching and preaching, as men may holily express (as they may) the charity of God, tending only to the union and love of us all, to the profit and salvation of our souls.

EDWARD BAYNTON.

LETTER

From BISHOP LATIMER, in Answer to SIR
EDWARD BAYNTON.

RIGHT worshipful sir, and my singular good master, &c. Whereas you have communicated my last letters to some of your friends, which rather desire this that in me, &c. what I think therein I will not now say; not that there could be any peril or danger in the said letters (well taken) as far as I can judge, but for that they were rashly and unadvisedly scribbled, as you might well know both by my excuse, and by themselves also, though no excuse had been made. And besides that, you know right well, that where the bee gathereth honey, even there the spider gathereth venom, not for any diversity of the flower, but for different natures in them that suck the flower: as in times past, and in the beginning, the very truth, and one thing in itself, was to some an offence, to some foolishness, to others otherwise disposed, the wisdom of God. Such difference there was in the hearers thereof.

But this notwithstanding, there is no more but either my writing is good or bad. If it be good, the communicating thereof to your friends cannot be hurtful to me; if it be otherwise, why should you not communicate it to them, who both could and would instruct you in the truth, and reform my error? Let this pass, I will not contend: "had I knew," ever cometh out of season. Truly I were not well advised if I would not either be glad of your instruction, or yet refuse mine own reformation; but yet it is good for a man to look before he leap, and God forbid that you should be so addict and sworn to me so wretched a fool, that you should not rather follow the doctrine of your friends in truth, so great learned men as they appear to be, than the opinions of me, having ever so christian a breast.

Wherefore do as you will: for as I would not if I could, so I cannot if I would, be noisome unto you; but yet I say I would my letters had been unwritten, if for no other cause, at leastway inasmuch as they cause me more writing, an occupation not sitting my mad head. And as concerning points which in my aforesaid letters your friends mislike, I have little leisure now to make an answer thereto, for the great business that I have in my little cure: I know not what other men have in their great cures, seeing that I am alone without any priest to serve my cure, without any scholar to read unto me, without any book necessary to be looked upon, without learned men to come and counsel withal. All which things others have at hand abundantly, but something must be done, howsoever it be. I pray you take it in good worth as long as I temper my own judgment, affirming nothing with prejudice of better. First, you mislike that I say I am sure I preach the truth, saying in reproof of the same, that God knoweth certain truth. Indeed God alone knoweth all certain truth, and God alone knoweth it as of himself, and none knoweth certain truth but God, and those who are taught of God, as St. Paul saith, for God hath made it plain to them: and Christ himself says, They shall all be taught of God: and your friends deny not but that certain truth is communicated to us, as our capacity may comprehend it by faith, which if it be truth, as it is, then there ought no more to be required of any man, but according to his capacity; now certain it is, that every man hath not like capacity, &c.

But as to my presumption and arrogance; either I am certain or uncertain that it is truth that I preach. If it be truth, why may I not say so, to encourage my hearers to receive the same more ardently, and pursue it more studiously? if it be uncertain, why dare I be so bold as to preach it? And if your friends, in whom you trust so greatly, be preachers themselves, after their sermon, I pray you ask them whether they be certain and sure that they have taught you the truth or no, and send me word what they say, that I may learn to speak after them. If they say they be sure, you know what followeth: if they say they be unsure, when shall you be sure, that have so doubtful and unsure teachers? And you yourself, whether are you certain or uncertain that Christ is your Saviour, and so forth of other articles that you are bound to believe? Or whether are you sure or unsure, that civil ordinances are the good works of God, and that you do God service in doing of them, if you do them for a good intent? If you are uncertain, take heed he is your sure friend that heareth you say so, and then with what conscience do you doubt, seeing, Whatsoever is not of faith is sin? But contrary say you, God alone knoweth certain truth, and you have it but through through a glasse darkly; and there are some who have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge: and to call this or that truth, it requireth a deep knowledge, considering that to you unlearned, what you take for truth may be otherwise, not having a sense exercised to discern good and evil, as you reason against me, and so you do best to know surely nothing for truth at all, but to wander meekly here and there, with every wind of doctrine, &c. Our knowledge here, you say, is but through a glasse darkly: what then? Therefore, it is not certain and sure.

I deny your argument by your leave; yea, if it be by faith, as you say, it is more sure, because the certainty of faith is the surest certainty, as Duns and other school-doctors say: that there is a great disagreement between certain knowledge and clear knowledge, for that may be of things absent that appear not, this requireth the presence of the object, I mean of the thing known; so that I certainly and surely know the thing which I perfectly believe, though I do not clearly and evidently know it. I know your school subtleties as well as you, which dispute as though enigmatical knowledge, that is to say, dark and obscure knowledge, might not be certain and sure knowledge, because it is not clear, manifest, and evident knowledge; and yet there have been (say they) which have had a zeal, but not after knowledge. True it is there have been such, and yet are too many to the great hindrance of Christ's glory, which nothing doth more obscure, than a hot zeal accompanied with great authority without right judgment. There have been also, which have had knowledge without any zeal of God, who holding the verity of God in unrighteousness, shall be beaten with many stripes, while they knowing the will of God do nothing thereafter. I mean not among Turks and Saracens that be unchristened, but of them that be christened. And there have been also, they that have lost the spiritual knowledge of God's word which they had before, because they have not followed after it, nor promoted the same, but rather with their mother's wits have impugned the wisdom of the Father, and hindered the knowledge thereof, which therefore hath been taken away from them; that Christ may be justified in his sayings, and overcome when he is judged, threatening, Matth. xiii. To him that hath not, that also which he hath, that is, that which he seemeth to have, shall be taken from him: when as to abuse that which a man hath, or not to use it well, is as not to have it. And also seeing it is true that God's wisdom will not dwell in a body subject to sin, although he abound too much in carnal wisdom; yet the same carnal and philosophical understanding of God's scriptures, is not the wisdom of God, which is hid from the wise, and is revealed to little ones. And if to call this or that truth, requireth a deep and profound knowledge, then every man hath either a deep and profound knowledge, or else no man can tell this or that truth, and it behoveth every preacher to have this deep and profound knowledge, that he may call this or that truth, which this or that he taketh in hand to preach for the truth; and yet he may be ignorant and uncertain in many things, both this and that, as Apollos was; but which things, whether this or that, he will not attempt to preach for the truth. And as for myself, I trust in God I may have my senses exercised to discern good and evil in those things, which without deep and profound knowledge in many things I preach not; yea there are many things in scripture in which I cannot certainly discern good and evil, I mean true and false, not with all the exercise I have in scripture, nor yet with the help of all the interpreters that I have, to content myself and others in all scruples that may arise: but in such I am wont to wade no further into the stream, than that I may either go over, or else return back again, ever having respect, not to the ostentation of my little wit, but to the edification of them that hear me, as far forth as I can, neither passing mine own nor yet their capacity.

And such manner of arguments might well serve the devil against cowards, to occasion them to wander and waver in the faith, and to be uncertain in things in which they ought to be certain: or else it may appear to me, and serve against such preachers as will define great subtleties and high matters in the pulpit, which no man can be certain and sure of by God's word to be truth, unless a man had a superlative sense to discern good and evil, as whether, if Adam had not sinned, we should have had stock-fish out of Island; how many larks for a penny, if every star in the element were a flickering hobby; how many years a man shall lie in purgatory for one if he buy not plenty of the oil that runneth over of lamps to slake the sin with, and so forget hell which cannot be slaked, to provide for purgatory.

Such argumentation (I say) might appear to me well against such preachers, not against me, which I simply and plainly utter true faith and the fruits of the same, which be the good works of God, which he hath prepared for us to walk in, every man to do the thing that pertaineth to his office and duty in his degree and calling, as the word appointeth; which thing a man may do with soberness, having a sense but indifferently exercised to discern good and evil. For it is but foolish humblity, willingly to continue always an infant in Christ, in infirmity. In reproof of which it was said, Ye have need of milk and not of strong meat. For St. Paul saith not, Be ye humble, that ye be not deceived. For though he would not that we should think arrogantly of ourselves, and above what it becometh us to think of ourselves, but so to think of ourselves that we may be sober and modest; yet he biddeth us so to think of ourselves, as God hath distributed to every one the measure of faith. For he that may not with meekness think in himself what God hath done for him, and of himself as God hath done for him, how shall he, or when shall he give due thanks to God for his gifts? And if your friends will not allow the same, I pray you inquire of them, whether they may with sobriety and modesty follow St. Paul's advice, where he saith unto us all, Be not children in understanding, but in malice; be ye infants. God give us all grace to keep the measure and to think of ourselves neither too high nor too low, but so that we may restore unto him who hath sent abroad his gifts again, with good use of the same, that we do our part with the same, to the glory of God. Amen.

For my life, I trust in God that I neither (by God's grace) shall, neither in soberness, nor yet in drunkenness, affirm any truth of myself, therewith intending to divide that unity of the congregation of Christ, and the received truth agreed upon by the holy fathers of the church, consonant to the scripture of God, though it shewed you ever so often, that an opinion or manner of teaching, which causeth dissention in a christian congregation, is not of God, by the doctrine of St. John in his epistle, where he saith, Every one that confesseth Christ in the flesh, is of God. First, Not every thing whereupon followeth dissention, causeth dissention, as I would that they shewed you, that would also shew you, whether this opinion, that a man may not marry his brother's wife, be of God or of men; if it be of men, then as Gamaliel said, dissolve it; if it be of God, as I think it is, and perchance your friends also, who can dissolve it, but shall seem to repugn against God? And yet there be many, not heathens, but in Christendom, that dissent from the same, which could bear full evil to hear said unto them, You are of the devil's side. So that such an opinion might seem to some to make a dissention in a christian congregation, saying that they may say perchance with more liberty than others, that an occasion is sometimes taken and not given, which with their favour I might abuse for my defence, saying that it is not granted unto all in these worst of times.

The Galatians having for preachers and teachers the false apostles, by whose teaching they were degenerated from the sweet liberty of the gospel into the four bonds of ceremonies, thought themselves, peradventure, a christian congregation, when St. Paul did write his epistle unto them, and were in a quiet trade under the dominion of masterly curates, so that the false apostles might have objected to St. Paul, that his apostleship was of God, forasmuch as there was a dissention in a christian congregation by occasion thereof, whilst some would renew their opinions by the occasion of the same, some would judge, as they were wont to do, follow their great lords and masters the false apostles, which were not heathen and unchristened, but christened and high prelates of the professors of Christ. Your friends, I know right well what Erasmus hath written in an epistle set before the pharisees of the first epistle to the Corinthians, which Erasmus hath caused a small dissention with his pen in a christian congregation, inasmuch as many have dissented from him, not only in cloisters (men more than christened men) of perfection, but also at Paul's Cross, and St. Mary's, besides many that with no small zeal have written against him, but not without answer.

And I would fain learn of your friends, whether St. Jerome's writings were of God, which caused dissention in a christian congregation, as it appeareth by his words in the prologue before the canonical epistles, which be these: And whilst that you, Eustochium, virgin of Christ, inquire so earnestly of me the truth of the scripture, you seem in some measure to put off my old age, corroded with teeth and bites of the envious, who call me a falsifier and corrupter of scriptures; but I am not affrighted at their envy in such a work, nor will I deny the truth of the scriptures to those that require it. I pray you, what were they that called St. Jerome a falsifier and corrupter of scripture, and for envy would have bitten him with their teeth; unchristian or christian? What had the unchristian to do with the christian doctrine? They were worshipful fathers of a christian congregation, men of much hotter stomachs than right judgments, of a greater authority than good charity. But St. Jerome would not cease to do good for the evil speaking of them that were naught, giving in that an example to those of the same: and if this dissention were in St. Jerome's time, what may be in our time? From ill to worse.

And I pray you what mean your friends by a christian congregation? All those (think you) that have been baptized? But many of those be in a worse condition, and shall have greater damnation than many unbaptized. For it is not enough to a christian congregation that it is of God, to have been baptized: but it is to be considered what we promise when we are baptized, to renounce Satan, his works, his pomps. Which things we bid not ourselves to do, let us not boast that we bid Christ's name in a christian congregation.

And where they add, in one Lord; I read in Matthew. Not every one that saith, Lord, Lord, &c. And in like, the Lord himself complaineth and rebuketh such professors and confessors, saying to them, Why call ye me Lord, and do not that I bid you? But I would your friends would take the pains to read over Chrysostom upon Matt. Hom. xlix. cap. xxiv. to learn to know a christian congregation, if it will please them to learn of me. And where they add, in one faith, St. James saith boldly, Shew me thy faith by thy works. And St. Jerome, if we believe, we shew the truth in working. And the scripture saith, He that believeth God, attacheth to his commandments. And the devils do shew to their little comfort. I pray God to save you and your friend, from that believing congregation, and from that faithful company.

There are all this toucheth not them that be unbaptized, but them that be baptized, and answer not to their baptism. For St. Jerome sheweth how true preachers would order themselves, when evil priests and false teachers, and the people that be by them deceived, should be angry with them for preaching the truth, threatening them to suffer death for the same, of the evil priests and false preachers, and the people deceived of them, which evil priests and false preachers, with the people deceived, be baptized as well as others. And I fear that St. Jerome might appear to some christian congregation, as they will be called, to write rashly, to divide the unity of a great honest number confessing Christ, in one baptism, one Lord, one faith, saying, The people, which before were brought up by their masters, must go up to the mountains, not such mountains which smoke when they are touched, but to the mountains of the Old and New Testament, the prophets, apostles, and evangelists. And when thou art occupied in reading in these mountains, if then thou find no instructors, (for the harvest is great, and the workmen few) yet shall the diligent study of the people be fleeing to the mountains, and the slothfulness of the masters shall be rebuked.

I do marvel why our christian congregations be so greatly grieved that lay-people would read the scripture, seeing that St. Jerome alloweth and approveth of the same, which compareth not here the unchristened to the christened, but the lay-people christened to their curates christened, under which they have been rocked and locked asleep in a subtle trade a great while full soundly, though now of late they have been awaked, but to their pain, at least to the pain of those that awakened them with the word of God; and it is properly said of St. Jerome to call themselves masters and not servants, meaning that servants teach not their own doctrine, but the doctrine of their master Christ, to his glory. Masters teach not Christ's doctrine, but their own, to their own glory; which masterly curates cannot be quiet, till they have brought the people asleep again: but Christ the very true master saith, Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation. My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither my ways your ways, saith the Lord: and there be those who have gone about counsels, which they could not establish. I pray God give our people grace so to awake, that their works may be approved, and our masters so to sleep, that their idleness do not rebuke them. For who is so blind as not to see how far our christian congregation doth gainsay St. Jerome, and speaketh after another manner? God amend what is amiss; for I understand we be something wide.

But now your friends have learned of St. John, That every one that confesseth Jesus Christ in the flesh, is of God: and I have learned of St. Paul, that there have been, not among the heathen, but among the christians, which confess Christ with their mouth, and deny him with their acts: so that St. Paul should appear to expound St. John, saying that I will not affirm any thing as of myself, but leave it to your friends to shew you, whether they who in deeds deny Christ, are by the bare confession of the mouth, of God: for your friends know well enough by the same St. John, He who is of God sinneth not: and there both have been, and now be, too many, who with the mouth only confess Christ to become in the flesh; but will not effectually hear the word of God, by consenting to the same, notwithstanding that St. John saith, He who is of God, heareth God's word, you hear not, because you are not of God; and many shall hear, I never knew you, which shall not only be christened, but also shall prophesy, and do powerful things in the name of Christ; and St. Paul said, there would come ravening wolves who will not spare the flock; meaning of them who should with their lips confess Christ in the flesh, and usurp by succession the office, which Christ calleth false prophets, and biddeth us beware of them, saying, They shall come in sheep's clothing, and yet they may wear both fatten, silk, and velvet, called afterwards naughty servants, not feeding, but smiting their fellow-servants, eating and drinking with the drunken, who shall have their portion with hypocrites. They are called servants, I suppose, because they confess Christ in the flesh; and naughty they are called, because they deny him in their deeds, not giving meat in due season, and exercising mastership over the flock. And yet your friends reason as though there could none bark and bite at true preachers, but they that be unchristened, notwithstanding that St. Augustine, upon the same epistle of St. John, calleth such confessors of Christ, Antichrists, according to the doctrine of St. Paul, Hate that is evil; and so making division, not between christened and unchristened, but between christians and antichristians, when neither tongue nor pen can divide the antichristian from their blind folly. And I wish you would cause your friends to read over St. Augustine upon the epistle of St. John, and tell you the meaning thereof, if they think it expedient for you to know it, as I remember it is Tractatu iii. but I am not sure nor certain of that, because I did not see it since I was at Cambridge; and here I have not St. Augustine's works to look for it, but well I know that there he teacheth us to know the christians from the antichristians, which both be christened, and both confess Jesus to be Christ, if they are asked the question; and yet the one part denieth it in the very deed. But to know the difference, we must not stand upon our talk, but not attend to our doings and conversation of life, whether we not only do put our endeavour thereto, but also persuade ourselves as though it were not necessary for us to accomplish such things, &c. but that it is enough to bear rule and authority over them, and to bestow ourselves wholly upon secular matters, pleasures and pomps of this world. And yet we will appear at the least to be of God alone, but they far otherwise confess Christ, who are approved to be of God by their confession.

And yet as long as they minister the word of God, or his sacraments, or any thing that God hath ordained to the salvation of mankind, wherewith God hath promised to be present, to work with the ministration of the same to the end of the world, they to be heard, to be obeyed, to be honoured for God's ordinance sake, which is effectual and fruitful, whatsoever the minister be, though he be a devil, and neither church nor member of the same, as Origen saith, and Chrysostom; so that it is not all one to honour them and trust in them, St. Jerome saith: but there is required a judgment to discern when they minister God's word and ordinance of the same, and their own, lest peradventure we take chalk for cheese, which will edge our teeth, and hinder digestion. For as it is commonly said, The blind eateth many a fly, as they did which were persuaded by the high priests to ask Barabbas and to crucify Jesus: and ye know that to follow the blind guides, is to come into the pit with the same. And will you know, saith Augustine, how pertyly they resist Christ, when men begin to blame them for their misliving, and intolerable secularity and negligence? They dare not for shame blaspheme the name of Christ himself, but they will blaspheme the ministers and preachers by whom they be blamed.

Therefore whereas you will pray for agreement both in the truth, and in uttering of the truth, when shall that be, as long as we will not hear the truth, but disturb with crafty conveyance the preachers of the truth, because they reprove our wickedness with the truth? And, to say the truth, it were better to have a deformity in preaching, so that some would preach the truth of God, and that which is to be preached without detriment and adulteration of the word, (as Lyranus saith in his time few did, what they do now-a-days I refer to them that can judge) than to have such an uniformity, that the silly people should be thereby occasioned to continue still in ignorance, corrupt judgment, superstition and idolatry, and esteem things as they do all, preposterously, doing what they need not to do, and leaving undone what they ought to do, for lack of knowing what is to be done, and so shew their love to God, not as God commandeth, (who saith, If you love me, keep my commandments: and again, He that knoweth my precepts, doth them, he loveth me) but as they command, which seek their own things, not Christ's; as tho' to tythe the mint were more than judgment, faith, and mercy.

And what is to live in state of curates, but that he taught which said, Peter loveth thou me? feed, feed, feed: which is now set aside, as though to love, were to do nothing else but to wear rings, mitres, and rochets, &c. And when they err in right living, how can the people but err in loving, which is now turned to piping, playing, and curious singing, which will not be reformed (I believe) unless by the strong hand of God. And I have both St. Augustine and St. Thomas, with divers others, that [law] is taken not only for ceremonies, but also for morals, where it is said, ye are not under the law, though your friends reprove the same. But they make no division in a christian congregation. And whereas both you and they would have a soberness in our preaching, I pray God send it unto us, whatsoever you mean by it. For I see well, whosoever will be happy, and busy with woe to you, he shall shortly after come before you.

And where your friends think that I made a lie, when I said, that I have thought in times past that the pope had been lord of the world, though your friends are much better learned than I, yet I am sure that they know not what either I think or have thought better than I, according to that, No man knoweth the thing of a man, &c. as though better men than I have so thought so, as Bonifacius Octavus (as I remember) the great learned man John of the Burnt Tower, Prefectus Cardinalis in his book where he proveth the pope to be above the council general and special; and where he saith that the pope is king of kings, and lord of lords, and that he is the true lord of the whole world by good right, although in fact he is not so; and that Constantine did but restore his own unto him when he gave unto him Rome; so that, as St. John saith Christ did, He came unto his own, and his own received him not; and yet I hear not that any of our christian congregations have reclaimed against him, until now of late dissention began. Who be your friends I cannot tell; but I wish you would desire them to be my good masters, and that they will do me no good, at least do me no harm; and though they can do you more good than I, yet I am for I would be as loth to hurt you as they, either with mine own opinions, manner of preaching, or writing.

And as for the pope's high dominion over all, there is one Raphael Maruphus in London, an Italian, and in times past a merchant of dispensations, which I suppose would die in the quarrel, as God's true knight and true martyr. As touching purgatory, and worshipping of saints, I shewed to you my mind before my ordination, and yet I marvelled something, that after private communication had with him, you would (as it were) advise me to open my mind before him, not giving me warning before, saving I cannot interpret your evil doings towards me; and yet neither my ordinary nor you did allowed the thing that I said, and I looked not to escape better than Dr. Crome: but when I have opened my mind ever so much, yet I shall be reported to deny my preaching, by them that have belied it, as he was: I shall have need of great patience to bear the false report of the malignant church.

Sir, I have had more business in my little cure since I spake with you, what with sick folks, and what with matrimonies, than I have had since I came to it, or than I would have thought a man should have in a great cure. I wonder how men can go quietly to bed, who have great and many cures, and yet peradventure are in none of them all. But I pray you to tell none of your friends that I spake so foolishly, lest I make a dissention in a christian congregation, and divide a sweet and peaceable union, or as many as may rest with this in such an age. Sir, I had just made an end of this scribbling, and was beginning to transcribe it more correctly, but there came a man of my lord of Farley's, with a citation to appear before my lord of London in haste, to be punished for such excesses as I committed at my last being there, so that I could not perform my purpose; I doubt whether you can read it as it is. If you can, well be it; if not, I pray you send it me again, and that you so do, whether you can read it or not. Jesus, mercy, what a world is this, that I shall be put to so great labour and pains, besides great charges, above my power, for preaching of a poor simple sermon! But I think our Saviour Christ said true, I must needs suffer, and so enter: so dangerous a thing it is to live virtuously with Christ, yea, in a christian congregation. God make us all christians, after the right fashion, Amen.

A Public and Authentic INSTRUMENT of the BISHOPS for Dissolving and Inhabiting of the SCRIPTURE, and divers other BOOKS, to be read in ENGLISH, in the Time of KING HENRY VIII. 1536.

IN the name of God, Amen. Be it known to all and singular true and faithful people, to whom these present letters testimonial, or this present public and authen-instrument shall come, or shall see, read, hear, or understand the same, and whom this underwritten shall may teach, or appertain in any manner of wise to me, William, by the sufferance of Almighty God, Archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all the realm of England, sendeth greeting in our Lord God everlasting. We signify unto you all, and let you well know by these presents, that where the king our sovereign lord, hearing of many books in the English tongue, containing any detestable errors, and damnable opinions, printed in parts beyond the seas, to be brought into divers towns, and sundry parts of this his realm of England, and sown abroad in the same, to the great decay of our catholic faith, and perilous corruption of his people, unless speedy remedy were briefly provided, his highness willingly evermore to employ all his study and mind in the high degree which Almighty God hath called him unto, the wealth of his subjects, that they might not only be in tranquillity and peace, but also to be kept pure and clean from all contagion and wrong opinions in Christ's religion: considering also that he being defender of the faith, would be very loth to suffer such evil seed to be sown amongst his people, and so take root that might overthrow the corn of the catholic doctrine before sprung in the souls of his subjects; for the repelling of such books, calling unto him of his great goodness, and gracious disposition, not only certain of the chief nobles and clerks of his realm, but also of each university a certain number of the chief learned men of them, proposed such of the books, as his grace had ready, thereunto them to be read; requiring them to hear in that behalf their advice and judgment of them: who with great diligence and mature deliberation, perusing over the said books, found in them many errors and heresies, both detestable and damnable, being of such a sort, that they were soon like to corrupt a great part of the people (if they might be suffered to remain in their hands any time), gathering also out of them many great errors, and pestilent heresies, and noting them in writing, to the intent to shew for what cause they reputed the said books damnable, of which hereafter out of each book gathered, many do ensue. However many more there be in the said books, which books totally do abound full of heresies, and detestable opinions.

HERESIES and ERRORS contained in the BOOK called, The PARABLE of the WICKED MAMMON.

SAINTS in heaven cannot help us thither.

To build a church in honour of our lady, or of other saint, is in vain, they cannot help thee, they are not thy friends.

To bid the poor man pray for me, is only to remember him to do his duty, not that I have any trust in his prayer.

Churches are for preaching only, and not as they be used now.

To worship God otherwise, than to believe that he is just and true in his promise, is to make God an idol.

HERESIES and ERRORS contained in the BOOK called, The OBEDIENCE of a CHRISTIAN MAN.

THAT we are able to make satisfaction to our neighbour, but not to God.

That children neither ought nor can contract matrimony without the consent of their parents.

Paul was of higher authority than Peter.

Saints be saved, not by their merits, but only by the merits of Christ.

HERESIES, BLASPHEMIES, and HERESIES, noted in the BOOK of the REVELATION of ANTI-CHRIST, and the EPISTLE going before.

To bind a man perpetually to any vow of religion, is without doubt an error.

To feign the constitutions of religion are good because holy men did ordain them, as Augustine, Benedict, Francis, Dominick, and such others, that is to leave the faith; and to follow such examples of fathers in some things, that is, in these things, is erring.

If they would make all the observations of the ceremonies, as Lent, fasting, holy-days, confession, matrimony, mass, mattins, relics, &c. free and indifferent, he should not be Antichrist; but now because he commandeth it in the name of Christ, he doth utterly corrupt the church, suppress the faith, and advance sin.

The ERRORS and HERESIES contained in the BOOK called, The SUM of the SCRIPTURES.

WE deserve nothing of God.

We deserve not everlasting life by our good works: for God hath promised it unto us before that we began to do good.

We must love death, and more desire to die than to fear death.

Thou shalt not count at night how much money thou hast gained.

Thou shalt not vex or grieve by justice, or otherwise, the poor that oweth unto thee: for thou mayest not do it without sin.

He that is rich and liveth of his rents, may not use to over-spend his goods as he will, but thy goods belong as well unto the poor as to thee.

God hath not given riches to rich men for to boast and brag therewith; nor to make great cheer, neither to make themselves lords, but to the intent that they should be servants unto all the world.

Out of the BOOK of BEGGARS.

THERE be many men of great literature and judgment, that for the love they have unto the church, and unto the common-wealth, have not feared to put themselves into the greatest infamy that may be in the objection of all the world, yea in the peril of death, to declare their opinion in this matter, which is, that there is no purgatory; but that it is a thing invented by the covetousness of the spirituality, only to translate all kingdoms from other princes unto them; and that there is not one word spoken of it in all holy scripture. God took Enoch away, that is to say, he departed out of this world like other men; the first is wrong translated, for the scripture says, he was translated, not taken away; and the last is false, for in Heb. xi. it is said, by faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death, and was not found, because God had translated him; and in Eccles. Enoch pleased God and was translated into paradise, that he might declare the wisdom of his people.

Out of the PRIMMER.

HE putteth in the book of seven psalms, but he leaveth out the whole litany, by which appeareth his erroneous opinion against praying to saints.

He hath left out all the hymns and anthems of our lady, by which appeareth his erroneous opinion against praying to our lady.

The Ungodly and Erroneous SAYING contained in an ENGLISH WORK, inscribed, An EXPOSITION upon the 7th Chapter of the First EPISTLE to the CORINTHIANS.

WHOSOEVER in himself doth not feel this godly thing, this gift of chastity, but doth feel incontinency, to him, I say, a commandment is given that he may be married.

Hereof doth follow, that no person may make a vow, or promise to live chaste or single, and that none are bound to keep any such vows, but rather to break them: and he that shall observe them, it is damnable, and by the law of God already condemned.

The touching of women, some persons have compassed too straightly, so that they dare not touch a woman's hand or skin; moreover they imagined many, both statutes and ceremonies, to keep them from company pany of women, as they thought that built abbies, but how fortunately that hath come to pass, what place thereby hath been given to Satan, it were horrible to be spoken of.

He that is compelled outwardly to abstain from women, and is inwardly full of lust, is a dissembler, and it is double lechery.

Mark what foul-slayers they be that provoke foolish youth to a vow of chastity, compelling them to nourish inwardly hidden malice.

All other evils may be suffered with a mean conscience.

This cannot so be endured, this can be helped by no medicine but by marriage.

It is good for a man not to touch a woman; this word good is not understood of merit and deserving before God, as though an unmarried man were better before him, than the married, like as St. Jerome hath expounded this text; for it concerneth only faith, and no deed or work, but it is spoken of temporal quietness of this life, so that the virgin and maid hath much more joy and tranquillity.

Chastity is a good thing, if lust and incontinency make it not so common a thing as we have hitherto used to do, and yet do, but all amiss; but the apostle willeth, that all men universally be conjugal: but all the bishops since his time have destroyed this godly ordinance, when they babble and rail in pulpits, changing this word every into certain.

Men ought to stint of their statutes-making, for a better statute can none be than this, that men without any respect of time use their wife, not to exempt certain days as they have which they call vigils, and women conceived.

Fasting is a measureable usage of meats and drinks; prayer is a crying, sighing, desiring, and mourning.

No man ought to enforce and compel men to fasting and prayer, as they hitherto by laws have done.

Before God, all things are alike and equal.

Abominably they do sin who make nuns swell in pride, when they babble, that their religion is more precious than matrimony, and then feign that they shall have a crown or garland of gold, so making them arrogant, wicked, unfaithful; chastity is a gift of God, and therefore can no man neither promise, nor vow, nor keep it.

The sects of all them that are called religious, and of all manner of shavelings, are falsely called the spiritual orders: for matrimony like as in very deed, so it ought to be called the spiritual state before other orders worldly and secular; matrimony is of all other the highest religion, and most spiritual estate.

By testimony of scriptures, all the apostles and all the bishops' successors were married.

St. Paul saith, That he ought to be chosen to be a bishop that is the husband of one wife.

Seeing you chuse not married men to be bishops, either Christ must be a fool and unrighteous, who did not so chuse, or you Antichrists and deceivers.

You put away universal marriage from priests, contrary unto God, to nature, to reason, to right, only of presumption, without any manner of cause.

There is no sin nor mischief in all the world so great, that can hinder a man from priest-hood, but godly matrimony.

What other thing is it to say, that a priest should not marry, than to say, that a man should not be a man?

This I dare be bold to say, that where one is chaste, there ought to be more than an hundred thousand to live married.

To keep a young man in a cloister to live chaste, is as much as to offer a child to Moloch there to be burnt.

All which great errors and pestilent heresies being contagious and damnable, with all the books containing the same, with the translation of scripture corrupted by William Tindal, as well in the Old Testament as in the New, and all other books in English containing such error, the king's highness present in person, by one whole advice and assent of the prelates and clerks, as well of the universities, as of all other assembled together, determined utterly to be repelled, rejected, and put away out of the hands of his people, and not to be suffered to go abroad among his subjects; and his highness willeth further that his pleasure and determination should be notified by preachers abroad unto the people, as well for putting away of all such books, as reading, retaining, or having hereafter of any other like, delivering unto certain preachers the form of a writing to be published in effect unto the people in their sermons, whereof the form here followeth, willing them in all his realm to publish the same.

Here followeth the BILL in ENGLISH, to be published by the PREACHER.

IT is the office and duty of every preacher and teacher of the word of God, not only to shew and declare unto his audience that which might be profitable and wholesome for the wealth of their souls, to be followed and taken, but also to note and signify unto them such things as may be dangerous and contagious, to the intent they might be avoided and eschewed, and also as far as they can judge who be teachers and authors of the same; this example we have of our Saviour Christ where he saith, Beware of false prophets, &c. St. Paul likewise many times giveth warning to such as he wrote unto, that they should beware of the false apostles, who in his absence went about to corrupt the doctrine which he had taught them being present. Wherefore considering that it hath pleased the king's highness, like a noble and a virtuous prince, tendering not only the present bodily wealth and tranquillity of all his subjects, for their and their worldly benefit and advantage, but moost chiefly regarding the wealth of their souls and their due order towards God, thereby to deserve and attain immortal glory, to assemble and call together the chief personages of his prelates, and a great number of learned men of both universities, charging and commanding them to the discharge and exoneration of his conscience, to first read, examine and discuss, the contents of such books as are now spread abroad within this his grace's realm in the English tongue, concerning the points and articles of our faith, and after their learning and conscience make relation unto his highness, whether the same books be expedient and profitable for his people, to the direction and ordering of their conscience and soul, or else contagious and pestiferous for the same: and whether the opinions contained in them, were agreeable to God's word and doctrine or no, forasmuch as the said congregation and assembly had free liberty and licence granted unto every man to say as his conscience and learning served him, without any reproof or blame to be imposed or arrested for any thing to be spoken there, whole person soever it touched, or any necessity to agree to the greater part, but only to say that his own learning and conscience could maintain and justify; after mature deliberation and consultation had, it was there, by the whole consent, no man repugning or gain-saying, determined and agreed that the books now being abroad in the English tongue contain false traditions and corrupt doctrine, far different from the true sense of the gospel and catholic understanding of the scripture, only persuading pernicious heresies to the destruction of the souls of good christian men, and that the certainty thereof can report unto you of mine own knowledge, being one of the said assembly, and hearing and seeing the said opinions read, declared and examined, and by the true sense and meaning of God's learning reprov'd and rejected. I think therefore my duty is, taking upon me the office of a preacher, following the example of our master Christ and St. Paul, as is aforesaid, to warn and admonish you by the words of Christ, as I spake before; Beware of false prophets, &c. and take heed yourself that you be not infected by the contagion and infection of such false apostles, as have in our English tongue set forth books to seduce you from the true knowledge of God's laws, and bring you by their false interpretations of scripture into detestable and abominable heresies, to the destruction of your souls.

struction of our souls : wherefore you that have the books called, The obedience of a christian man ; The book of scripture ; The revelation of Antichrist ; The application of beggars ; The mammon of unrighteousness ; The matrimony of Tindal ; The New Testament in English, of the translation which is now printed, and such other books in English, the authors whereof either are not, or do not put to their names, be pernicious books ; detest them, abhor them, keep them not in your hands, deliver them to the superiors such as call for them : and it by reading them heretofore, any thing remaineth in your breasts of that teaching, either forget it, or by information of the truth expel and purge it, to the intent that you being so purified and cleansed of that contagious doctrine and pestiferous traditions, may be fit and apt to receive and retain the true doctrine and understanding of Christ's laws, to the comfort and edification of your souls ; thus I move and exhort you in God to do, this is your duty to do.

The prelates of the church having the cure and charge of your souls ought to compel you, and your prince to punish and correct your not doing of the same, unto whom, as St. Paul saith, the sword is given by God's ordinance for that purpose : you shall also farther understand, that the king's highness, forasmuch as it was reported unto him that there is engendered in divers of his subjects, an opinion, that it is his grace's duty to cause the scripture of God to be translated into the English tongue to be communicated unto the people, and that the prelates, and also his highness, do wrong in hindering of the same, his highness willed therefore every man here present in the said assembly, freely and frankly to shew and open unto him what might be proved, and confirmed by scripture, and holy doctors in that behalf, to the intent that his highness (as he there openly protested) might conform himself thereunto, minding to do his duty towards his people, as he would they should do their duties towards him : in which matter, after the scripture declared, holy doctors and authors alledged and said, and all things said, which might be on both sides, and for both parts spoken, deduced, and brought forth, finally it appeared, that the having of the whole scripture in English, is not necessary to christian men ; but that without having any such scripture, endeavouring themselves to do well, and to apply their minds to take and follow such lessons as the preacher teacheth them, and so learned by his mouth, may as well edify spiritually in their souls, as if they had the same scriptures in English. And like as the having the scriptures in the vulgar tongue, and in the common people's hands, hath been by both holy fathers of the church heretofore in some times thought meet and convenient, so at another time hath been thought to holy fathers not expedient to be communicated amongst them ; wherein forasmuch as the king's highness, by the advice and deliberation of his council, and the agreement of the great learned men, thinketh in his conscience, that the divulging of the scripture at this time in the English tongue, to be committed to the people, considering such pestilent books, and such evil opinions, as he now spread amongst them, should rather be to their further confusion and delusion, than the edification of their souls, and that holy doctors testify, upon such-like considerations, the same hath been done in times past, it was thought here in that assembly to all and singular in that congregation, that the king's highness and the prelates, in so doing and not suffering the scripture to be divulged and communicated in the English tongue unto the people, at this time doth well. And also I think and judge the same, exhorting and moving you, that in consideration his highness did there openly say and protest that he would cause the New Testament to be, by learned men, literally and purely translated into the English tongue, to the intent that he might have it in his hands ready to be given to his people, as he might see their manners and behaviour meet, apt, and convenient to receive the same, that you will so detest those pernicious errors and heresies and new opinions, so detest that arrogancy of knowledge and understanding which sheweth your fancies, and shew yourself in conning and reasoning, so sober, quiet, meek, and temperate, as all fear of mistaking the gift of scripture taken away, you may appear such in your prince's eyes, and eyes of your prelates, as they shall have no just cause to fear any such danger ; persuading unto yourself in the mean time, without grudging or murmuring, the very truth, which is this, that we cannot require or demand scripture to be divulged in the English tongue, otherwise than upon the discretion of our superiors, so as whensoever they think in their conscience it may do you good, they may and do well to give it unto you : and whensoever it shall be seen otherwise unto them, they do amiss in suffering you to have it. Of and upon which decree, order, and determination above recited, his gracious highness being in person in the chapel, called the old chapel, which sometime was called St. Edward's chamber, sat on the east side of the parliament chamber, within his grace's palace at Westminster, upon the 24th day of May, in the year of our Lord God 1530, and in the two and twentieth year of his reign, called before his grace the three notaries hereunder written, and then and there in the presence of all the personages there assembled and gathered together, willed and required the said three notaries to make public and authentic instruments, and us to set thereunto our seal accordingly in and for witness, and perpetual memory and monument of this his grace's desire, order, and determination, and of all and singular the premises, and all the personages then and there being present, to testify the same, and bear record and testimony thereupon : in witness of all and singular the premises, We William, archbishop, primate and legate, aforesaid, have commanded and obtained these present letters testimonial, or present public or authentic instrument, containing therein the order, decree, and determination aforesaid, to be made and to be subscribed, and consigned by the hands of the notaries hereafter named, and to be sealed with our own seal. All which premises have been done in manner and form above specified, then and there being present the noble personage of Thomas Moor, knight, great chancellor of England ; our reverend brother in Christ, Cuthbert, by the permission of God, bishop of Durham ; and worshipful personages, Mr. Stephen Gardiner, secretary ; Mr. Richard Samson, dean of the chapel, doctor of law ; Mr. Richard Wolman, master of the requests ; Mr. John Bell, counsellor, doctors of holy decrees ; Mr. Nicholas Wilson, the king's counsellor, Mr. Richard Duck, archdeacon of Wiltshire, doctors of divinity ; Mr. John Oliver, Mr. Edmund Steward, doctors of the law, chaplains to our sovereign lord the king's grace ; Mr. Richard Mawdley, Mr. William Mortimer, Mr. Edward Crome, Mr. Edward Wiggan, doctors also of divinity ; Mr. Robert Carter, Mr. Edward Leighton, Mr. Hugh Latimer, and Roger Tilton, masters of arts in both the universities aforesaid, with many more learned men of both universities, in a great number assembled then and there together, witness to the premises required and exhibited. These being premised, now let us see the answer of bishop Latimer again to this aforesaid proposal or instrument of the bishops, in a letter which the said Latimer wrote to king Henry the same time in that behalf.

Here followeth a letter of bishop Latimer's, written to king Henry the eighth upon this occasion. You heard before of two proclamations set out by the bishops in the name of king Henry, one in the year 1531, and the other in the year 1546 ; in which proclamations, being authorized by the king's name, were inhibited all English books, either containing or tending to any matter of the scripture. Where also we have expressed a catalogue of some of the errors which the said bishops have falsely picked out, and maliciously imputed to godly writers. Now bishop Latimer growing in some favour with the king, and seeing the great decay of Christ's religion by reason of these two proclamations, and touched therefore with the zeal of conscience, directed unto king Henry this letter here ensuing, thereby intending by all means possible, to persuade the king's mind to set open again the freedom of God's holy word amongst his subjects. The copy of which letter here followeth.

From BISHOP LATIMER to KING HENRY the EIGHTH, for restoring again of the free LIBERTY of Reading the HOLY SCRIPTURES.

To the most mighty Prince, King of England, HENRY the Eighth, Grace, Mercy, and Peace, from God the FATHER, by our Lord JESUS CHRIST.

THE holy doctor St. Augustine, in an epistle which he wrote to Casalanus, saith, That he which for fear of any power hideth the truth, provoketh the wrath of God to come upon him, for he feareth men more than God. And according to the same, the holy man St. John Chrysostom saith, that he is not only a traitor to the truth, which openly for truth teacheth a lie; but he also which doth not freely pronounce and shew the truth that he knoweth. These sentences (most redoubted king) when I read now of late, and marked them earnestly in the inward parts of mine heart, they made me sore afraid, troubled and vexed me grievously in my conscience, and at last drove me to this strait, that either I must shew forth such things as I have read and learned in scripture, or else be of that sort that provoke the wrath of God upon them, and be traitors unto the truth: which thing, rather than it should happen, I had rather suffer extreme punishment.

For what other thing is it to be a stranger unto the truth, than to be a traitor and a Judas unto Christ, who is the very truth, and cause of all truth? Who saith, that whosoever denieth him before men, he will deny him before his Father in heaven. Which denying ought more to be feared and dreaded, than the loss of all temporal goods, honour, promotion, fame, prison, slander, hurts, banishments, and all manner of torments and cruelties, yea, and death itself, be it ever so painful and shameful. But alas! how little do men regard those sharp sayings of these two holy men! And how little do they fear the terrible judgment of Almighty God! And especially they which boast themselves to be guides and captains unto others, and challenging unto themselves the knowledge of holy scripture, yet will neither shew the truth themselves (as they be bound) or suffer them that would. So that unto them it may be said, that which our Saviour Christ said to the pharisees, Matth. xiii. Woe be unto you, scribes and pharisees, who shut up the kingdom of heaven before men, and neither will you enter in yourselves, neither suffer them that would to enter in. And they will, as much as in them lieth, debar not only the word of God, which David calleth a light to direct and shew every man how to order his affections and lusts, according to the commandments of God, but also by their subtle wiliness they instruct, move, and provoke in a manner, all kings in Christendom, to aid, succour, and help them in this their mischief; and especially in this your realm they have so blinded your liegepeople and subjects with their laws, customs, ceremonies, and Banbury glosses, and punished them with cursings, excommunications, and other corruptions (corrections I would say) and now at the last, when they see they cannot prevail against the open truth (which the more it is persecuted, the more it increaseth by their tyranny) they have made it treason to your noble grace to have the scripture in English.

Here I beseech your grace to pardon me a while, and patiently to hear me a word or two; yea, though it be so that, as concerning your high majesty and regal power, whereunto Almighty God hath called your grace, there is as great difference between you and me, as between God and man: for you be here to me and to all your subjects, in God's stead, to defend, aid, and succour us in our right, and so I should tremble and quake to speak to your grace. But again, as concerning that you be a mortal man, in danger of sin, having in you the corrupt nature of Adam, in which we are all both conceived and born: so have you no less need of the merits of Christ's passion for your salvation, than I and other of your subjects have, which be all members of the mystical body of Christ. And though you be an higher member, yet you must not disdain the lesser. For as St. Paul saith, Those members that are taken to be most vile, and had in least reputation, be as necessary as the other, for the preservation and keeping of the body. This, most gracious king, when I considered, and also your favourable and gentle nature, I was bold to write this rude, homely, and simple letter to your grace, trusting that you will accept my true and faithful mind, even as it is.

First, I will exhort your grace to mark the life and process of our Saviour Christ, and his apostles, in preaching and setting forth of the gospel; and to note also the words of our master Christ, which he said to his disciples when he sent them forth to preach his gospel, and these have ever in your mind the golden rule of our Saviour Christ, The tree is known by it's fruit. For by the diligent marking of these, your grace shall clearly know and perceive who are the true followers of Christ, and teachers of his gospel, and who are not. And concerning the first, all scripture sheweth plainly that our Saviour Jesus Christ's life was very poor.

Begin at his birth, and I beseech you, who ever heard of a poorer, or so poor as he was? It were too tedious to write how poor Joseph and the blessed virgin Mary took their journey from Nazareth toward Bethlehem, in the cold and frosty winter, having nobody to wait upon them, but he both master and man, and she both mistress and maid. How vilely, thinks your grace, were they treated in the inns and lodgings by the way, and in how vile and abject a place was this poor maid, the mother of our Saviour Jesus Christ, brought to bed, without company, light, or any other thing necessary for a woman in that condition? Was not here a poor beginning, as concerning this world? Yes truly. And according to this beginning was the process and end of his life in this world, and yet he might by his godly power have had all the goods and treasures of this world at his pleasure, when and where he would.

But this he did to shew us, that his followers and vicars should not regard and set by the riches and treasures of this world, but after the saying of David were ought to take them, which saith thus; If riches, promotions, and dignity happen to a man, let him not set his affiance, pleasure, trust, and heart upon them. So that it is not against the poverty in spirit, which Christ preacheth in the gospel of St. Matthew, chap. v. to be rich, to be in dignity and in honour, so that their hearts be not fixed and set upon them so much, that they neither care for God nor good men. But they be enemies to this poverty in spirit, have they ever so little, that have greedy and desirous minds to the goods of this world, only because they would live after their own pleasures and lusts. And they also be private enemies (and so much the worse) which have professed, as they say, wilful poverty, and will not be called worldly men, and they have lord's lands, and king's riches; yea, rather than they would lose one jot of that which they have, they will set debate between king and king, realm and realm, yea, between the king and his subjects, and cause rebellion against the temporal power, to which our Saviour Christ himself was obedient, and paid tribute, as the gospel declareth; unto whom the holy apostle St. Paul teacheth every christian man to obey. Yea, and beside all this, they will curse and censure, as much as in them lieth, even into the deep pit of hell, all that gainsay their appetite, whereby they think their goods, promotions, or dignities should decay.

Your grace may see what means and craft the spirituality (as they will be called) imagine, to break and withstand the acts which were made in your grace's last parliament against their superfluities. Wherefore they that thus do, your grace may know them not to be true followers of Christ. And although I named the spirituality to be corrupt with this unthriftly ambition; yet I mean not all to be faulty therein, for there be some good of them. Neither will I that your grace should take away the goods due to the church, but take away all evil persons from their goods, and set better in their stead.

name nor appoint no person nor persons, but remit or grace to the rule of our Saviour Christ, as in Matthew the 7th chapter, By their fruits you shall know them. As touching the words that our Saviour Christ spake to his disciples when he sent them to preach his gospel, they be read in Matthew, the fifteenth chapter, where he sheweth, That here they shall be hated and despised of all men worldly, and brought before kings and rulers, and that all evil should be said of them for their preaching sake; but he exhorteth them to take patiently such persecution by his own example, saying, become ye not the servant to be above the master.
 And seeing they call me Beelzebub, what marvel is it if they call you devilish persons and heretics. Read the fifteenth chapter of St. Matthew's gospel, and there ye shall see that he promised to the true preachers worldly promotions or dignity, but persecution and kinds of punishment, and that they should be betray-even by their own brethren and children. In John he saith, In the world ye shall have oppression, and the world shall hate you; but in me you shall have peace.
 And in the tenth chapter of St. Matthew's gospel, saith our Saviour Christ also, Lo I send you forth as sheep, among wolves. So that the true preachers go like sheep, harmless, and be persecuted, and yet they revenge not their wrongs, but remit all to God; so far is it off that they will persecute any other but with the word of God only, which is their weapon. And so this is the most evident token that our Saviour Jesus Christ would that the gospel and the preachers of it should be known by,
 that it should be despised among those worldly wise men, that they should repute it but foolishness and deceiv-ing doctrine, and the true preachers should be persecuted and hated, and driven from town to town, yea, at the last lose both goods and life.
 And yet they that did this persecution, should think that they did well, and a great pleasure to God. And the apostles remembering this lesson of our Saviour Christ, were content to suffer such persecutions, as you may read in the Acts of the apostles, and the epistles. But ye never read that they ever persecuted any man. The apostle St. Paul saith, That every man that will be godly in Christ Jesus, should suffer persecution.
 And also he saith further, in the epistle to the Philippians, in the first chapter, That it is not only given to us to believe in the Lord, but also to suffer persecution for his sake.
 Wherefore take this for a sure conclusion, that there where the word of God is truly preached, there is persecution, as well of the hearers, as of the teachers: and where is quietness and rest in worldly pleasure, there is not the truth. For the world loveth all that are contrary to it. And, to be short, St. Paul calleth the gospel, the word of the cross, that word of punishment.
 And the holy scripture doth promise nothing to the preachers and followers of it in this world, but trouble, persecution, and persecution, which these worldly men will not suffer, nor away withal.
 Therefore pleaseth it your good grace, to return to the golden rule of our master and only Saviour Jesus Christ, which is this, By their fruits you shall know them. For where you see persecution, there is the gospel, and there is the truth: and they that do persecute, be void without all truth; not caring for the light, which (as our Saviour Jesus Christ saith, in the third chapter of St. John's gospel) is come into the world, and which shall utter and shew forth every man's works. And they whose works be naught, dare not come to this light, but go about to stop and hinder it, favouring to prevent, as much as possible, the reading of the holy scripture in our mother tongue, saying, it would cause heresy and insurrection, and so they make, at least they would fain persuade your grace to keep it back. But here mark their shameless boldness, who be not ashamed, contrary to Christ's doctrine, to gather figs of thorns, and grapes of thistles, and to mix light darkness and darkness light, sweet bitter and bitter sweet, good evil and evil good; and to say, that which teacheth all obedience should cause dissention and strife; but such is their belly-wisdom, wherewith they judge and measure every thing, to hold and keep still this wicked mammon, the goods of this world, which is their god, and hath so blinded the eyes of their hearts, that they cannot see the clear light of the sacred scripture, though they babble ever so much of it.

But, as concerning this matter, other men have shewed your grace their minds, how necessary it is to have the scripture in English. Which thing also your grace hath promised by your last proclamation: which promise I pray God that your gracious highness may shortly perform, even to-day before to-morrow. Nor let the wickedness of these worldly men detain you from your godly purpose and promise. Remember the subtle worldly wise counsellors of Hanun the son of Naas, king of the Ammonites, whom, when David sent his servants to comfort the young king for the death of his father, by crafty imaginations counselled Hanun, not only not to receive them gently, but to treat them most shamefully and cruelly, saying, "That they came not to comfort him, but to espy and search his land, so that afterward, they bringing David word how every thing stood, David might come and conquer it." And he caused the young king to shear their heads, and to cut their coats by the points, and sent them away like fools; whom he ought rather to have made much of,
 and to have treated them gently, and have given them great thanks and rewards: O wretched counsellors. But see what followed of this carnal and worldly wisdom:
 truly nothing but destruction of all the whole realm, and also of them that took their parts.

Therefore, good king, seeing that the right David, that is to say, our Saviour Christ, hath sent his servants, that is to say, his true preachers, and his own word also to comfort our weak and sick souls, let not these worldly men make your grace believe, that they will cause insurrections and heresies, and such mischiefs as they imagine of their own mad brains, lest that he be avenged upon you and your realm, as was David upon the Am-monites, and as he hath ever been avenged upon them which have obstinately withstood and gainsaid his word.
 But peradventure they will lay this against me, and say that experience doth shew, how that such men as call themselves followers of the gospel, regard not your grace's commandment, neither obey your proclamation; and that was well proved by those persons which of late were punished in London for keeping such books as your grace had prohibited by proclamation: and so like as they regarded not this, so they will not regard or esteem other your grace's laws, statutes, or ordinances. But this is but a crafty persuasion. For your grace knoweth, that there is no man living, especially that loveth worldly promotion, that is so foolish to set forth, promote, or advance his enemies, whereby he should be hindered of his worldly pleasures and fleshly desires; but rather he will seek all the ways possible that he can, utterly to confound, destroy, and put him out of the way. And so as concerning your last proclamations, prohibiting such books, the very true cause of it, and chief counsellors (as men say, and of likelihood it should be) were they whose evil living and cloaked hypocrisy these books uttered and disclosed.
 And howbeit that there were three or four that would have had the scripture to go forth in English, yet it happened there, as it is always seen, that the most part overcometh the better, and so it might be that these men did not take this proclamation as your's, but as their's set forth in your name, as they have done many times more, which hath put this your realm in great hindrance and trouble, and brought it in great penury; and more would have done, if God had not mercifully provided to bring your grace to knowledge of the falsehood and privy treason, which their head and captain was about; and be you sure not without adherents, if the matter be duly searched. For what marvel is it, that they being so nigh of your counsel, and so familiar with your lords, should provoke both your grace and them to prohibit these books, which before by their own authority have forbidden the New Testament under pain of everlasting damnation: for such is their manner to send a thousand men to hell, ere they send one to God, and yet the New Testament (and so I think by the other) was meekly-offered to every man that would and could, to amend it, if there were any fault.

Moreover, I will ask them the cause of all insurrections, which have heretofore been in this realm. And whence is it that there be so many extortioners, bribers, murderers, and thieves, which daily do not only break your grace's laws, ordinances, and statutes, but also the laws and commandments of Almighty God? I think they will not say these books, but rather their pardons, which cause many a man to sin in trust of them. For as for those malefactors which I now rehearsed, you shall not find one among a hundred, but he will cry out, both of these books, and also of them that have them, yea and will be glad to spend the goods which he hath wrongfully gotten, upon faggots, to burn both the books, and them that have them.

And as touching these men that were lately punished for these books, there is no man, I hear say, that can lay any word or deed against them that should sound to the breaking of any of your grace's laws, this only except, if it be your's, and not rather their's. And be it so that there be some that have these books, that be evil, unruly, and self-willed persons, not regarding God's laws, nor man's, yet these books be not the cause thereof, no more than was the bodily presence of Christ and his words the cause that Judas fell, but their own forward mind and carnal wit, which should be amended by the virtuous example of living of their curates, and by the true exposition of the scripture. If the lay-people had such curates that would thus do their office, neither these books, nor the devil himself, could hurt or put them out of order, so that the lack of good curates is the destruction and cause of all mischief. Neither do I write these things because that I will either excuse these men lately punished, or to affirm all to be true written in these books, which I have not all read, but to shew that there cannot such inconvenience follow of them, and especially of the scripture, as they would make men believe should follow.

And though it be so that your grace may by other books, and namely by the scripture itself, know and perceive the hypocrite wolves clad in sheep's cloathing, yet I think myself bound in conscience to utter unto your grace such things as God puts in my mind to write. And this I do (God so judge me) not for hate of any person or persons living, nor for that I think the word of God should go forth without persecution, if your grace had commanded that every man within your realm should have it in his mother's tongue. For the gospel must needs have persecution unto the time that it be preached throughout all the world, which is the last sign that Christ shewed to his disciples should come before the day of judgment; so that if your grace had once commanded that the scripture should be put forth, the devil would set forth some wile or other to persecute the truth. But my purpose is, for the love that I have to God principally, and the glory of his name, which is only known by his word, and for the true allegiance that I owe unto your grace, and not to hide in the ground of my heart the talent given me by God, but to chaffer it forth to others, that it may increase to the pleasure of God, to exhort your grace to avoid and beware of these mischievous flatterers, and their abominable ways and counsels.

And take heed whose counsels your grace doth take in this matter; for there be some that for fear of losing of their worldly worship and honour, will not leave off their opinion, which rashly, and that to please men withal by whom they had great promotion, they took upon them to defend by writing, so that now they think that all their felicity which they put in this life should be marred, and their wisdom not so greatly regarded, if that which they have so slanderously oppressed should be now put forth and allowed. But alas, let these men remember St. Paul, how fervent he was against the truth (and that of a good zeal) before he was called;

he thought no shame to suffer punishment and great persecutions for that which before he despised and called heresy. And I am sure that their living is not more perfect than St. Paul's was, as concerning the more works of the law, before he was converted.

Also the king and prophet David was not ashamed to forsake his good intent in building of the temple after that the prophet Nathan had shewed him that it was not the pleasure of God that he should build a house for him; and notwithstanding that Nathan before allowed and praised the purpose of David, he was not ashamed to revoke and eat his words again when he knew that they were not according to God's will and pleasure.

Wherefore they be fore drowned in worldly wisdom that think it against their worship to acknowledge their ignorance; whom I pray to God that your grace may espy, and take heed of their worldly wisdom, which is foolishness before God, that you may do what God commandeth, and not what seemeth good in your own sight without the word of God, that your grace may be found acceptable in his sight, and one of the members of his church; and according to the office that he hath called your grace unto, you may be found a faithful minister of his gifts, and not a defender of his faults for he will not have it defended by man or man's power, but by his word only, by which he hath ever more defended it, and that by a way far above man's power or reason, as all the stories of the Bible may mention.

Wherefore, gracious king, remember yourself, be pity upon your soul, and think that the day is ever at hand when you shall give account of your office, and of the blood that hath been shed with your sword. On which day that your grace may stand stedfastly, and not be ashamed, but be clear and ready in your reckoning, and to have, as they say, your discharge sealed with the blood of our Saviour Christ, which only doth cleanse at that day, is my daily prayer to him that suffered death for our sins, who also prayeth to his Father for grace for us continually. To whom be all honour and praise for ever, Amen. The Spirit of God perfect your grace.

December 1, 1530.

In this letter of Bishop Latimer to the king above prefixed, many things we have to consider: First, his good conscience to God, his good will to the king, his duty of a right pastor unto truth, his tender care to the commonwealth, and especially to the church of Christ. Further, we have to consider the abuse of prince's courts, how kings may be abused with flatterers and wicked counsellors about them; and especially, we may note the subtle practices of prelates, in abusing the name and authority of kings, to set forth their own malignant proceedings. We may see moreover, and rather marvel at in the said letter, the great boldness and divine stoutness in this man, who as yet being a bishop, so freely and plainly without any fear of death adventuring his own life to discharge his conscience, durst so boldly, to so mighty a prince, in such a dangerous case, against the king's law and proclamation, to come out in such a terrible time, take upon him to write, and to admonish that which no counsellor durst so much once mention unto him in defence of Christ's gospel. Whose example; if the bishops and prelates of this realm, for their parts likewise, in like cases would follow (as indeed they ought to do), it is very probable that many things would not be so out of frame as they are.

Finally, this moreover in the said letter is to be noted, how blessedly Almighty God wrought with this faithful servant's bold adventure, and wholesome counsel, though it did not prevail through the iniquity of the time, yet God so wrought with his servant in doing his duty, that no danger, nor yet displeasure resulted unto him thereby, but rather thanks and good will of the prince; for not long after the same he was advanced by the king to the bishopric of Worcester, as is above declared.

seeing bishop Latimer was so bold and plain with the (as is before specified) no great marvel if he did the like freedom and plainness towards other meaner persons, in admonishing them of their misorder, especially if any such occasion were given, where truth and justice required his defence against injury and oppression. For example whereof we have another letter of his, written to a certain justice of the peace in Warwickshire, who as he is long since departed, so he shall be unnamed. The letter, although it may seem somewhat long and tedious, yet I thought here not to overlook the same for several reasons: First, That the virtue and faithful conscience of this good pastor may appear great and large; also, for that all other bishops and pastors by this example may learn with like zeal and resolution to discharge their duty and conscience in reforming things amiss, and in powdering with the salt of God's word the sores of the people. Which thing if every bishop for his part within his diocese had done in king Edward's days, in redressing such corruption of that time with like diligence as that man did, verily I suppose that the persecution of queen Mary had not so plagued the church as it did. Item, Another respect is, because of justices and all others placed in office, which may be heed here, not to abuse their authority to tread down truth, and bear down poor men with open wrong and extortion of partiality. And finally, that all various oppressors whatsoever, by the said letter, may receive some fruit of wholesome admonition.

BISHOP LATIMER's LETTER to a JUSTICE of the PEACE.

RIGHT worshipful, health in the Lord. And now sir, I understand, that you be in great admiration of me, and take very grievously my manner of writing to you; adding thereunto, that you will not bear it at my hand, no if I were the best bishop in England, &c.
 Ah sir, I see I may well say as the common saying is,
 I have fished and caught a frog; brought little to me with much ado. You will not bear it with me, you say. Why, sir, what will you do with me? You will fight with me, I suppose. It may seem unseemly for a justice of peace to be a breaker of peace: I am of the doting time of my foolish youth is gone and past.
 What will you then do with me, in that you say you will not bear it at my hand? What hath my hand offended you? Perchance you will summon me before some judge, and call me into some court. God turn it to good. I refuse no judgment. Let us accuse one another, that one of us may amend another, in the name of the Lord. Let justice proceed in judgment. And then I dare do best, have best, for club-halfpenny. Or peradventure you will set pen to paper, and all to rattle in a letter, wherein confuting me you will defend yourself and your brother against me. Now that would be, says long Robin, as is commonly said. I cannot use but must allow such diligence. For so should your integrities and innocencies best appear, if you be able to defend both your own proceedings, and your brother's doings in this matter to be upright. And then will I gladly give place, confessing my fault humbly, as conquered with just reasons. But I think it will not be.
 It now first of all let me know, what it is that you will not bear at my hand? What have I done with my hand?
 What hath my hand trespassed you? Forsooth, that can tell no man better: for I have charitably admonished you in a secret letter, of your supper-dealing and such like behaviour. What a sore matter is this? And will you not bear so much with me? Will you not take a shew of my good will towards you, and towards the saving of your soul at my hand? O Lord God, who could have thought that Mr. N. had been so imprudent, that he would not bear a godly admonition for the wealth of his soul? I have in use to commit such trespasses many times in a year with your betters, by two or three grees, both lords and ladies, and the best of the land, and yet hitherto I have not heard that any of them have said in their displeasure, that they will not bear it at my hand. Are you yet to be taught what is the office, liberty, and privilege of a preacher? What is else but even to rebuke the world of sin without respect of persons? which thing undoubtedly is the peculiar office of the Holy Ghost in the church of God, so that it be practised by lawful preachers. You could but ill bear (belike) to hear your fault openly reprov-ed in the pulpit, which cannot bear the same in a secret sealed-up letter, written both friendly, charitably, and truly; unless perhaps to rebuke sin sharply, be now to lack all charity, friendship, and truth. But Mr. N. if you will give me leave to be plain with you, I fear you are so plunged in worldly purchasings, and so drowned in the manifold dregs of this deceivable world, that I believe you have forgotten your catechism. Read therefore again the opening of the first commandment, and then tell me, whether you have just cause to complain of me, or I of you, &c.

Also, sir, you said further, that I am wonderfully abused by my neighbour, &c. How so, good Mr. N.? Wherein? or how will you prove it to be true, and when? So you said, that he had abused you, and given you wrong information; but the contrary is found true by the good testimony of Mr. Chambers, who heard as well as you what my neighbour said, and hath testified the same both to you, and against you, till like himself. Mr. N. to forge and feign, (which argueth an ill cause) that is one thing; but to prove what a man doth say, that is another thing. As though you were privileged to out-face poor men, and bear them in hand what you list, as may seem to make for me maintenance for your naughty cause. Trust me, Mr. N. I was but very little acquainted with my neighbour when this matter began; but now I have found him so conformable to honesty, upright in his dealings, and so true in his talk, that I esteem him better than I do some others whom I have perceived and found otherwise. For I will flatter no man, nor yet claw his back in his folly, but esteem all men as I find them, allowing what is good, and disallowing what is bad, among all men, either friends or enemies, according to St. Paul's precept, not esteemed of the children of this world; I hate you, saith he, that which is evil, and cleave to that which is good. And let us not at any time, for the favour of men, call good evil, and evil good, as the children of this world are commonly wont to do, as it is every where to be seen.
 And now what manner of man do you make me, master N. when you note me to be so much abused by so ignorant a man, so simple, so plain, and so far without all wrinkles? Have I lived so long in this tottering world, and have I been so many ways troubled and tossed up and down, and so much as it were seasoned with so many experiences to and fro, to be now so bewitched and alienated from his wits, as though I could not discern cheese from chalk, truth from falsehood, but that every silly soul, and base-witted man, might easily abuse me to what enterprize he listed at his pleasure? Well, I say not nay, but I may be abused. But why do you not tell me, how your brother abused me, promising before me and many more, that he would stand to your awardship, and now doth deny it? Why do you not tell me, how those two false faithless wretches abused me, promising also to abide your award, and do it not? Yea, why do you not tell me how you yourself have abused me, promising to redress the injury and wrong that your brother hath done to my neighbour, and have not fulfilled your promise? These notable abuses be nothing with you, but only you must needs burden me with my neighbour's abusing me, which is nothing at all, as far as ever I could perceive, so God help me at my need. For if he had abused me as you and others have done, I should be soon at a point with him, for any thing further doing for him, &c.

Likewise, sir, you said further, that I shall never be able to prove that either your brother or the two tenants agree to stand to your award, &c. No, sir, Mr. N. you say belike as you would have it to be, or as your brother with his adherents have persuaded you to think it to be, so inducing you to do their request to your own shame and rebuke, if you persevere in the same, besides the danger of your soul, for consenting, at least wise, to the maintenance by falsehood of your brother's iniquity. For in that you would your awardship should take no effect, you shew yourself nothing inclinable to the redress of your brother's unright dealing with an honest poor man, which hath been ready at your request to do you pleasure with his things, or he had never come into this wrangle for his own goods with your brother.

Ah, master N. what manner of man do you shew yourself to be? or what manner of conscience do you shew yourself to have? For, first, as touching your brother, you know well that sir Thomas Coking, with a letter of his own hand writing, hath witnessed unto your brother's agreement; which letter he sent to me unsealed, and I shewed the same to my neighbour, and others before I sealed it, and perchance have a copy of the same yet to shew. With what conscience then can you say that I shall never be able to prove it? Shall not three men upon their oaths make a sufficient proof, think you? The Lord himself says, in the mouth of two or three, &c. Yea, you think it true, I dare say, in your conscience, if you have any conscience, though I were in my grave, and so unable to prove any thing. As for the two tenants, they be as they be, and I trust to see them handled according as they be; for there be three men yet alive, that dare swear upon a book, that they both did agree. But what should we look for at such men's hands, when you yourself play the part you do? But God is yet alive, who seeth all, and judgeth justly.

Also, sir, you said yet further, that the justices of the peace in the county think you very unnatural, in taking part with me before your brother, &c. Ah, master N. what a sentence is this to come out of your mouth? For partaking is one thing, and ministering of justice is another thing; and a worthy minister of justice will be no partaker, but one indifferent between party and party. And did I require you to take my part, I pray you? No, I required you to administer justice between your brother and my neighbour, without any partaking with either. But what manner of justices be they, I pray you, who would so fain have you to take part naturally with your brother, when you ought and should reform and amend your brother, as you yourself know, no man better? What, justices! No, jugglers you might more worthily call such as they be, than justices. Be they those justices which call you unnatural, for that you will not take your brother's part against all right and conscience, whom you had picked out and appointed to have the final hearing and determining my neighbour's cause, after your substantial and final award-making? Verily, I think no less. Forsooth he is very much obliged to you, and I also for his sake. Is that the wholesome counsel that you have to give your poor neighbours in their need? Indeed you shew yourself a worthy juggler; oh, I would have said a justicer, among other of your juggling and partaking-justices. O good God! what is in the world? Marry, sir, my neighbour had spun a fair thread, if your partaking-justice through your good counsel had had his matter in ordering and finishing. I pray God save me and all my friends, with all God's flock, from your natural, and so partaking-justices. Amen.

Lord God! who would have thought that there had been so many partaking-justices in Warwickshire, if master N. himself, one of the same order, (but altogether out of order) and therefore knoweth it best, had not told us the tale? But these call you, you say, very unnatural, &c. And why not rather, I pray you, too much natural? For we read of a double nature, sound and corrupt. That was full of justice: this, unless it be restored, abideth always unjust, bringeth forth the fruits of wickedness one after another; so that he that will not help his brother, having a just cause in his need, may be justly called unnatural, as one following the disposition and inclination of corrupt nature against the will of God: and so to be natural may seem to be cater-cousin, or cousin-german with, to be diabolical.

I fear we have too many justices that be too much natural, to their own punishment both of body and soul. For worthy justices having ever the fear and dread of God before their eyes, (of which sort we have fewer amongst us than I wish we had) will have no respect at all in their judgments and proceedings, to vicinity of blood, but altogether to the worth and justice of the cause, judging that to be just which is so in the sight of God, though not of men; of which number I pray God make you one, Amen. He is just that doth justice. But he that sinneth (as they all do which do unjustly for favour and pleasure of men) is of the devil, and he, of which sort all our partaking and natural justice be with all their partiality and naturalty. Wherefore it would be right and just that as many as be such justices, be justly deprived of their offices, and further also to be punished, according to the quantity or quality of their crime, so that by that means they may be cut off, as men born and bred to the hurt and detriment of the common-wealth, which trouble us when they ought to help us, Amen.

Sir, finally, and last of all, you added these words following: Well, said you, let bishop Latimer tell me how he meddled with my brother, for he is like to find as crabbed and as froward a piece of him, as ever he found in his life, &c. Ah, sir, and is your brother such an one as you speak of indeed? Merciful God! what a commendation is this for one brother to give another? Is this your glorying, my friend? And were it not possible, think you, to make him better? It is written, Vexation giveth understanding. And again, It is good, O Lord, that thou hast humbled me. At least, I may pray to God for him, as David did for his like, after this sort; Bind fast asses with bridle and snaffle, that they approach not near unto thee. In the mean season, I would I had never known either of you both; for so should I have been without this inward sorrow of my heart, to see such unwillingness in you both to godliness; for I cannot but be heavy-hearted, to see such men so wickedly minded. Well, let us ponder a little better words, where you say, I shall find him as crabbed and as froward a piece as ever I found in my life, &c. Mark well your own words. For by the tenor of the same it plainly appeareth, that you consider your brother's cause, when in he so stiffly standeth, to be unjust and very naught. For he that standeth so in a good quarrel and a just cause, as many good men have done, is called a fast man, a constant, a truly man. But he that is obstinate and untractable in wickedness and wrong doing, is commonly called a crabbed and froward piece, as you name your brother to be.

Wherefore knowing so well your brother's cause to be so wicked, why have you not endeavoured yourself as a worthy justice, to reform him accordingly, as I required you, and you promised me to do, now almost twelve months ago. In short, Mr. N. if you will not come off shortly, and apply yourself thereunto more effectually hereafter than you have heretofore, be you well assured thereof, I shall report you to all the friends that I have in England, both high and low, as well his crabbedness and frowardness, as your colourable support of the same; that I trust I shall be able thereby either to bring you both to some goodness, or at least I shall so warn my friends and all honest hearts to beware of your wickedness, that they shall either take no hurt at all, or at least less harm by you through my advertisement; in that knowing you perfectly, they may the better avoid and shun your company. You shall not hinder me, Mr. N. no, though you would give me all the lands and goods you have, as rich as you are noted to be. I will not forsake such a just cause, neither will I communicate with other men's sins. For whether it be by detestable pride, whether by abominable avarice, or by both linked together, it is no small iniquity to keep any poor man so long from his right and duty so stiff-neckedly and obstinately, or, whether ye will, crabbedly and frowardly. And what is it then any manner of ways to consent to the same? You know, I suppose, Mr. N. what that is, that is, to take or detain by any manner of way another man's goods against his will that is the owner, as some define it. If he be a thief that doth so openly, what shall he be that approveth him which is the doer, defendeth, maintaineth, and supporteth him by any manner of colour? Consider with yourself, good Mr. N. what it is to oppress and to defraud your brother in his business, and what followeth thereof. It is truly said, sin is not forgiven, except the thing be restored in that is taken away. No restitution, no salvation; which is as well to be understood of things gotten by fraud, guile, and deceit, as of things got by open theft and robbery. Wherefore let not your brother, Mr. N. ravillation continue in the devil's possession. I will do the best I can, and wrestle with the devil with all my strength, to deliver you both from him. I will leave no stone unturned to have both you and your brother red. There is neither archbishop nor bishop, nor yet learned man neither in universities or elsewhere, that I am acquainted with, that shall not write unto you, nor in their writing by their learning confute you.

There is no godly man of law in this realm that I am acquainted with, but they shall write unto you, and defend you by law. There is neither lord nor lady, nor yet any noble personage in this realm, that I am acquainted with, but they shall write unto you, and resist and threaten you with their authority.

will do all this; yea, and kneel upon both my knees before the king's majesty, and all his honourable councill, with most humble petition for your reformation, lest the devil shall possess you still, to your final damnation. So that I do not despair, but verily trust in some way or other, to pluck both you and also your beloved brother, as crabbed as you say he is, out of the devil's claws, in spite of the devil's heart.

These premises well considered, look upon it good for N. that we have no further ado: God's plague is clearly upon us; therefore let us now diligently look out us, and in no wise defend, but willingly acknowledge and amend whatsoever hath been amiss. These are the capital points of your talk, as I was informed, for you had perused my nipping and unpleasant letter.
And I thought good to make you some answer to them, perchance I might so move you, rather to call yourself to some better remembrance, and so more earnestly apply yourself to accomplish and perform what you have begun and promised to do, namely, the thing itself.
Being of such sort, as apparently tendereth both to your conscience, and also to God's high pleasure

Thus, lo, with a mad head, but yet a good will, after a scrambling I know not well what (but I know you read it, and comprehend it well enough), I bid you off heartily well to fare in the Lord, with good health, and long life to God's pleasure.

HUGH LATIMER.

During the time that the said Bishop Latimer was at Oxford, we read not much of what he did there, besides his conference with Dr. Ridley, and his refutation at the time of his disputation. Otherwise, later, we find very few or none that he wrote to his friends abroad, save only these few lines, which he sent to Mrs. Wilkinfon of London, a pious woman, and afterwards an exile for the gospel's sake. Who, so long as she remained in England, was a singular patroness to good sorts of God, and learned bishops, as to bishop Coverdale, to the bishop of Hereford, to Mr. Coverdale, to the bishop of Exeter, to Dr. Cranmer, with many others. The substance and effect of which his letter to Mrs. Wilkinfon followeth.

to Mr. HUGH LATIMER to Mrs. WILKINSON, Widow, in London.

If the gift of a pot of water shall not be in oblivion with God, how can God forget your manifold and untold gifts, when he shall say to you, I was in prison and you visited me? God grant us all to do and suffer while we are here, as may be to his will and pleasure, Amen.
Your's in Bocardo.

Your's in Bocardo,

HUGH LATIMER.

Touching the memorable actions of this worthy man, among many others this is not to be neglected, what a great surprize he attempted, in sending to king Henry the manner whereof is this. There was then, and remaineth still an old custom received from the old Romans, that upon New-year's day, being the first day of January, every bishop with some handsome new-year's gift should gratify the king; and so they did, some with gold, some with silver, some with a purse full of money, and some one thing, some another: but bishop Latimer being then bishop of Worcester, among the rest, presented a New Testament for his new-year's gift, with a napkin having this posy about it, Fornicators and adulterers God will judge.

And thus haſt thou (gentle reader) the whole life, both of Dr. Ridley and biſhop Latimer, two worthy fathers in the church of Chriſt, their writings, diſputations, ſufferings, their painful travels, and faithful preachings, ſtudious ſervice in Chriſt's church, their patient imprisonment, and conſtant fortitude in that which they had taught, with all their proceedings from time to time, ſince their firſt ſpringing years to this preſent month of queen Mary, being the month of October, Anno 1555. In which month they were brought forth together, to their final examination and execution. Wherefore as we have heretofore declared both their lives ſeverally and diſtinctly one from another; ſo now jointly to couple them both together, as they were both together joined in one ſociety or cauſe of martyrdom, we will, by the grace of Chriſt, proſecute the reſt that remaineth concerning their laſt examination, degrading and conſtant ſuffering, with the order and manner alſo of the commiſſioners, and what were their words, their objections, their orations there uſed, and what again were the anſwers of thoſe men to the ſame, as in the proceſs here followeth to be ſeen.

The ORDER and MANNER of the EXAMINATION of Dr. RIDLEY, and BISHOP LATIMER, in Sept. 1555.

FIRST, after the appearing of Thomas Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury, before the pope's delegate, and the queen's commissioners in St. Mary's church at Oxford, about the 12th of September, whereof more shall be said (by God's grace) when we come to the death of the said archbishop; shortly after, on the 28th of the said month, another commission was sent down to Oxford from cardinal Poole, to John White, bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Brooks, bishop of Gloucester, and Dr. Holyman, bishop of Bristol. The contents and virtue of which commission was, that the said bishops of Lincoln, Gloucester, and Bristol, or two of them, should have full power and authority to cite, examine and judge, Mr. Hugh Latimer and Dr. Ridley, for divers and sundry erroneous opinions, which the said Hugh Latimer and Nicholas Ridley did hold and maintain in open disputations had in Oxford, in the months of May, June, and July, in the year 1554, as long before in the time of perdition, and since. Which opinions, if the named persons would now recant, giving and yielding themselves to the determination of the universal and catholic church planted by Peter in the blessed see of Rome, that then the deputed judges, by the said authority of their commission, should have power to receive the said penitent persons, and forthwith administer unto them the reconciliation of the holy father the pope; but if the said Hugh Latimer, and Nicholas Ridley, would stoutly and stubbornly maintain these their erroneous opinions and assertions, that then the said lords by their commission should proceed in form of judgment, according to the law of heretics; that is, degrading them from their promotion and dignity of bishops, priests, and all other ecclesiastical orders, should pronounce them as heretics, and therefore clean cut them off from the church, and so yield them to receive punishments due to all such heresy and schism.

Wherefore the last of September the said two persons, Nicholas Ridley and Hugh Latimer, were cited to appear before the said lords in the divinity school at Oxford at eight of the clock. At which time the lords repaired thither, placing themselves in the high seat made for public lectures and disputations, according to the usage of that school, being then fair set and trimmed with cloth of tissue, and cushions of velvet: and after the said lords were placed and set, the said Latimer and Ridley were sent for. And first Dr. Ridley appeared, and by

by and by bishop Latimer. But because it seemed good severally to examine them, bishop Latimer was kept back until Dr. Ridley was thoroughly examined. Therefore soon after the coming of Dr. Ridley into the school, the commission was published by an appointed notary, and openly read. But Dr. Ridley standing bareheaded, humbly expecting the cause of that his appearance, as soon as he had heard the cardinal named, and the pope's holiness, put on his cap. Wherefore after the commission was published, the bishop of Lincoln spake as followeth.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, although neither I, nor yet my lords here, in respect of our own persons do look for cap or knee, yet because we bear and represent such persons as we do, that is, my lord cardinal's grace, legate a latere to the pope's holiness, as well in that he is of a noble parentage (and there Dr. Ridley moved his cap with lowly obeisance) descending from the royal blood, as in that he is a man worthy to be revered with all humility, for his great knowledge and learning, noble virtues and godly life, and especially in that he is here in England deputy to the pope's holiness, it should have become you at this name to have uncovered your head. Wherefore except you will of your ownself take the pains to put your hand to your head, and at the nomination, as well of the said cardinal, as of the pope's holiness, uncover the same, lest that this your contumacy, exhibited now before us, should be prejudicial to the said most reverend persons, (which thing we may in no case suffer) you shall cause us to take the pains to oblige some man to pluck off your cap from you. To whom Dr. Ridley (desiring licence) answered:

Ridley. As touching what you said, my lord, that you of your own persons desire no cap or knee, but only require the same in consideration that you represent the cardinal's grace's person, I would have you know, and thereupon make my protestation, that I did put on my cap at the naming of the cardinal's grace, neither for any contumacy that I bear towards your own persons, neither for any derogation of honour towards the lord cardinal's grace. For I know him to be a man worthy of all humility, reverence and honour, in that he came of the most regal blood, and in that he is a man endued with manifold graces of learning and virtue; and as touching these virtues and points, I, with all humility (therewith he put off his cap, and bowed his knee) and obeisance that I may, will reverence and honour his grace; but in that he is legate to the bishop of Rome (and therewith put on his cap) whose usurped supremacy and abused authority I utterly refuse and renounce, I may in no wise give any obeisance or honour unto him, lest that my so doing might be prejudicial to mine oath, and a derogation to the verity of God's word: and therefore that I might not only by confession profess the verity, in not reverencing the renounced authority, contrary to God's word, but also in gesture, in behaviour, and all my doings, express the same, I have put on my cap, and for this consideration only, and not for any contumacy to your lordships, neither contempt of this worshipful audience, neither derogation of any honour due to the cardinal's grace, both for his noble parentage, and also his excellent qualities, I have kept on my cap.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, you excuse yourself of that with which we pressed you not, in that you protest you keep on your cap, neither for any contumacy towards us (who look for no such homage from you) neither for any contempt of this audience: which although justly they may, yet (as I suppose) in this case do not require any such obeisance of you, neither in derogation of any honour due to my lord cardinal's grace, for his regal descent (at which word Dr. Ridley moved his cap) and excellent qualities; for although in all the premises honour be due, yet in these respects we require none of you, but only in that my lord cardinal's grace is here in England, deputy of the pope's holiness (at which word the lords and others put off their caps, and Dr. Ridley put on his) and therefore we say unto you the second time, that except you take the pains yourself, to put your hand to your head, and put off your cap, you shall put us to the pains to cause some man to take from you, except you alledge some infirmity and sickness, or other more reasonable cause, upon the consideration whereof we may do as we think good.

Ridley. The premises I said only for this end, that might as well appear to your lordships, as to this worshipful audience, why and for what consideration I of such kind of behaviour, in not humbling myself to your lordships with cap and knee: and as for my sickness, I thank my Lord God, that I am as well as I have been this long time; and therefore I do not pretend that which is not, but only this, that it might appear by this my behaviour, that I acknowledge no point that usurped supremacy of Rome, and therefore condemn and utterly despise all authority coming from him. In taking off my cap, do as it shall please your lordships, and I shall be content.

Then the bishop of Lincoln, after the third admonition, commanded one of the beadles (that is, an officer of the university) to pluck his cap from his head. Dr. Ridley bowing his head to the officer, gently permitted him to take it away.

After this, the bishop of Lincoln, in a long oration exhorted Dr. Ridley to recant, and submit himself to the universal faith of Christ, in this manner.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, I am sure you have sufficiently pondered with yourself the effect of this our commission with good advice, considering both points thereof, that authority is given to us, if you shall receive a true doctrine of the church, which first was founded by Peter at Rome immediately after the death of Christ, and from him by lineal succession hath been brought to this our time, if you will be content to renounce your former errors, recant your heretical and seditious opinions, content to yield yourself to the undoubted faith and truth of the gospel, received and always taught by the catholic and apostolic church, which the king and queen, all the nobles of this realm, and commons of the same, all christian people have and do confess, you only standing alone by yourself: you understand and perceive, I am sure, that authority is given to us to receive you, to reconcile you, and upon due penance to join and associate you again into the number of the catholics and Christ's church, from which you have so long strayed, without which no man can be saved; which thing I and my lords here, yea, all, as well nobles and commons of this realm, most heartily desire, and I, for my part, (here he put off his cap) most earnestly exhort you to do.

Remember, Mr. Ridley, it is no strange countenance whither I exhort you to return. You were once one of us, you have taken degrees in the school. You were made a priest, and became a preacher, setting forth the same doctrine which we do now. You were made bishop according to our laws; and, to be short, it is no so long ago since you separated yourself from us, as in the time of heresy, became a setter forth of that devilish and seditious doctrine which in these latter days was preached amongst us. For at what time the new doctrine of only faith began to spring, the council, willing to win my lord chancellor, sent you to him (I then being in my lord's house, unknown, as I suppose, to you); and after you had talked with my lord secretly and were departed, immediately my lord declared certain points of your talk, and means of your persuasion, and amongst others this was one, that you should say, Truly, my lord, this matter of justification is but a trifle, let us not stick to condescend herein to them; but for God's love, my lord, stand stoutly in the verity of the sacrament: for I see they will assault thee also. If this be true, (as my lord is a man credible enough in such a matter) hereby it is declared of what mind you were then, as touching the blessed sacrament.

Also in a sermon of yours at Paul's Cross, you as effectually and catholicly spake of that blessed sacrament as any man might have done, whereby it appeared that is no strange thing, nor unknown place whereunto I exhort you. I wish you to return thither from whence you came, that is, with us to acknowledge the church of God, wherein no man may err, to acknowledge the supremacy pacy of our most reverend father in God the holiness, which (as I said) linically taketh his de-from Peter, upon whom Christ promised, before th, to build his church; which supremacy or ative the most ancient fathers in all ages, in all did acknowledge: and here he brought a place or t of the doctors, but especially fixed upon a place Augustine, who writeth after this manner: All the an countries beyond the sea are subject to the of Rome. Here you see, Mr. Ridley, that all ndom is subject to the church of Rome. What hinder you therefore to confess the same as St.

 ine and other fathers?

Dr. Ridley desired his patience to suffer him to say somewhat of the premises, lest the multitude of names might confound his memory; and having leave of him, he said in this manner:

My lord, I most heartily thank your lord-as well for your gentleness, as also for your soin talk, and for your good and favourable zeal learned exhortation, in which I have marked lly three points, which you used to perswade me re my doctrine and religion, which I perfectly and am thoroughly perswaded to be grounded, pon man's imaginations and decrees, but upon the ble truth of Christ's gospel, and not to look back return to the Romish see, contrary to mine oath, ry to the prerogative and crown of this realm, and lly (which moveth me most) contrary to the ex-word of God.

The first point is this, that the see of Rome taking beginning from Peter, upon whom you say Christ built his church, hath in all ages, lineally from father to son, been brought to this time.

And, That even the holy fathers from time to time have confessed the same. .

ardly, That in that I was once of the same opi-and together with you I did acknowledge the ft, Astouching the saying of Christ, from whence lordship gathereth the foundation of the church Peter, truly the place is not to be understood as like it, as the circumstance of the place will declare.

After that Christ had asked his disciples whom men said him to be, and they answered, that some had said he was a prophet, some Elias, some one thing, some another; then he said, Whom say ye that I am?

Peter said, I say that thou art Christ the Son of
To whom Christ answered, I say, Thou art and upon this stone I will build my church; is to say, Upon this stone, not meaning Peter self, as though he would have constituted a mor-tan, so frail and brittle a foundation of his stable infallible church; but upon this rock-stone, that his confession of thine, that I am the Son of I will build my church. For this is the found-and beginning of all christianity, with word, and mind, to confess that Christ is the Son of Whofoever believeth not this, Christ is not in and he cannot have the mark of Christ printed in forehead, which confesseth not that Christ is the Son of God.

Therefore Christ said unto Peter, that upon this rock, is, upon this confession, that he was Christ the Son of God, he would build his church; to declare, without this faith no man can come to Christ: so this belief, that Christ is the Son of God, is the foundation of our christianity, and the support of our church. Here you see upon what foundation Christ's church is built, not upon the frailty of man, but upon the stable and infallible word of God.

as touching the lineal descent of the bishops in of Rome, true it is, that the patriarchs of Rome apostles time, and long after, were great main-rs and setters-forth of Christ's glory, in which, e all other countries and regions, there especially preached the true gospel, the sacraments were most administered; and as, before Christ's coming, it acity to valiant in power, and martial affairs, that e world was in a manner subject to it, and after
p. 29.

Christ's passion divers of the apostles there suffered persecution for the gospel's sake: so after that the emperors, their hearts being illuminated, received the gospel, and became christians; the gospel there, as well for the fame of the place, flourished most, whereby the bishops of that place were had in more reverence and honour, most esteemed in all councils and assemblies, not because they acknowledged them to be their head, but because the place was most revered and spoken of; for the great power and strength of the same. As now here in England; the bishop of Lincoln, in sessions and sittings, hath the pre-eminence of other bishops, not that he is the head and ruler of them; but for the dignity of the bishopric (and therewith the people smiled). Wherefore the doctors in their writings have spoken most reverently of this see of Rome, and in their writings preferred it; and this is the prerogative which your lordship did rehearse the ancient doctors to give to the see of Rome.

In like manner; I cannot; nor dare but commend; reverence, and honour the see of Rome, as long as it continued in the promotion and setting forth of God's glory, and in due preaching of the gospel, as it did many years after Christ. But after that the bishops of that see, seeking their own pride, and not God's honour, began to set themselves above kings and emperors, challenging to them the title of God's vicars, the dominion and supremacy over all the world, I cannot but with St. Gregory, a bishop of Rome also, confess that place is the very true Antichrist, whereof St. John speaketh by name of the whore of Babylon; and say, with the said St. Gregory, He that maketh himself a bishop over all the world, is worse than Antichrist.

Now whereas you say St. Augustine should seem not only to give such a prerogative, but also supremacy to the see of Rome, in that he saith all the christian world is subject to the church of Rome, and therefore should give to that see a certain kind of subjection; I am sure that your lordship knoweth, that in St. Austin's time there were four patriarchs, of Alexandria, Constantinople, Antioch, and Rome, which patriarchs had under them certain countries; as in England the archbishop of Canterbury hath under him certain bishoprics in England and Wales, to whom he may be said to be their patriarch. Also your lordship knoweth right well, that at the time St. Austin wrote that book he was then bishop in Africa. Farther, you are not ignorant, that between Europe and Africa lieth the sea called the Mediterranean sea, so that all the countries in Europe to him which is in Africa, may be called countries beyond the sea. Hereof St. Austin saith, All the christian countries beyond the seas and remote regions, are subject to the see of Rome. If I should say all countries beyond the sea, I do except England, which to me now being in England, is not beyond the sea. In this sense, St. Austin saith, All the countries beyond the sea are subject to the see of Rome; declaring thereby, that Rome was one of the sees of the four patriarchs, and under it Europe, by what subjection I pray you? Only for a pre-eminence; as we here in England say, that all the bishoprics in England are subject to the archbishop of Canterbury.

For this pre-eminence also the other doctors (as you recited) say, that Rome is the mother of churches, as the bishopric of Lincoln is mother to the bishopric of Oxford, because the bishopric of Oxford came from the bishopric of Lincoln, and they were once both one; and so is the archbishopric of Canterbury mother to the other bishoprics which are in her province. In like manner the archbishopric of York, is mother to the North bishoprics; and yet no man will say, that Lincoln, Canterbury, or York, is supreme head to the other bishoprics; neither then ought we to confess the see of Rome to be supreme head, because the doctors in their writings confess the see of Rome to be mother of churches.

Now where you say, I was once of the same religion which you are of, the truth is I cannot but confess the same. Yet so was St. Paul—a persecutor of Christ. But in that you say, I was one of you not long ago, in that I in doing my message to my lord of Winchester, should defire him to stand stout in that gross opinion of the supper of the Lord: in very deed I was sent (as your lordship said) from the council to my lord of Winchester, to exhort him also to receive the true confession of justification; and because he was very refractory, I said to him, What make you so great a matter herein? You see many anabaptists rise against the sacrament of the altar; I pray you, my lord, be diligent in confounding of them: for at that time my lord of Winchester and I had to do with two anabaptists in Kent. In this sense I willed my lord to be stiff in the defence of the sacraments against the detestable errors of anabaptists, and not in the confirmation of that gross and carnal opinion now maintained.

In like sort, as touching the sermon which I made at St. Paul's Cross, you shall understand, that there were at St. Paul's, and divers other places, fixed railing bills against the sacrament, terming it Jack of the Box, The Sacrament of the Halter, Round Robin, with such unseemly terms; for which causes, I, to rebuke irreverent behaviour of certain evil-disposed persons, preached as reverently of that matter as I might, declaring what estimation and reverence ought to be given to it, what danger ensued the mishandling thereof, affirming in that sacrament to be truly and verily the body and blood of Christ; effectually by grace and spirit; which words the unlearned understanding not, supposed that I had meant of the gross and carnal being which the Romish decrees set forth, that a body having life and motion, should be indeed under the shapes of bread and wine.

With that the bishop of Lincoln interrupting him, said:

Lincoln. Well, Mr. Ridley; thus you wrest places to your own pleasure; for whereas St. Augustine saith, That the whole christian world is subject to the see of Rome without any limitation, and useth these words, Beyond the seas, and remote regions, only to express the latitude of the dominion of the see of Rome, willing thereby to declare all the world, yea countries far distant from Rome, yet nevertheless are subject to that see, yet you would wrest it, and leave it only to Europe. I am sure you will not deny, but all the countries is more than Europe.

Ridley. Indeed, my lord, if St. Augustine had said simply, All the countries, and not added, Beyond the seas, it had been without limitation; but in that he said, All the countries beyond the seas, he himself doth limit the universal proposition, declaring how far he meant by All the countries.

The bishop not staying for his answer, proceeded, saying:

Lincoln. Well, if I should stay upon this place, I could bring many more places of the fathers for a confirmation thereof; but we have certain instructions, according to which we must proceed, and came not hither to dispute the matter with you, but only to take your answers to certain articles, and used this in the way of disputation, in which you interrupted me; wherefore I will return thither again.

You must consider that the church of Christ lieth not hid, but is a city on the mountain, and a candle in the candlestick. Ponder with yourself, that the church of Christ is catholic, and universally spread throughout the world, not contained in the alligation of places, not comprehended in the circuit of England, not contained in the compass of Germany and Saxony, as your church is.

Wherefore, Mr. Ridley, for God's love be you not singular; acknowledge with all the realm the truth, it shall not be (as you alledge) prejudicial to the crown; for their majesties the king and queen have renounced that usurped power taken of their predecessors, and justly have renounced it. For I am sure you know there are two powers, the one declared by the sword, the other by the keys. The sword is given to kings and rulers of countries; the keys were delivered by Christ to Peter, and of him left to all the successors. As touching our goods, possessions, and lives, we with you acknowledge us subjects to the king and queen, who hath the temporal sword; but as concerning matters of religion, as touching God's quarrel and his word, we acknowledge another head; and as the king and the queen's highness do in all worldly affairs justly challenge the prerogative and primacy, so in spiritual and ecclesiastical matters they acknowledge themselves not to be heads and rulers, but members of Christ's body. Why, therefore, do you stick at that matter, which their majesties have forsaken, and yielded?

Wherefore, Mr. Ridley, you shall not only not do injury to the crown, and be prejudicial to their majesty's honour, in acknowledging with all Christendom the pope's holiness to be supreme head of Christ's church militant here on earth, but do a thing most agreeable to them, and most desired of his holiness. Thus if you will do, revoking together all your errors, acknowledging with the residue of the realm the common and public fault, you will do what all men most heartily desire to your soul; then shall we with great joy, by the authority committed to us from the cardinal's grace, receive you into the church again, acknowledge you to be no longer a rotten, but a lively member of the same; if you shall still be singular, if you shall still obstinately persevere in your errors, stubbornly maintaining your former heresies, then we must against our will, according to our commission, separate you from us, and cut you off from the church, lest the rottenness of one part should by process of time, putrify and corrupt the whole. Then must we confess and publish you to be none of us, then must we yield you up to the temporal judges, whom, except it otherwise please the king and queen's highness, you must receive punishment by the law of this realm, due for heretics.

Wherefore, Mr. Ridley, consider your state, remember your former degrees, spare your body, especially consider your soul, which Christ so dearly bought with his precious blood, do not rashly cast away that which was precious in God's sight; enforce us not to do that we may do, which is not only to publish you to be none of us, but to cut you off from the church: we cannot, nor can we condemn you to die, (as most untruly hath been reported of us) but that is the office of temporal judges; we only declare you to be not of the church, and then you must, according to the determination, and pleasure of the rulers, abide their determination, so that we, after we have given you up to the temporal rulers, have no further to do with you.

But I trust, Mr. Ridley, we shall not have occasion to do what we may. I trust you will suffer us to stay in that point of our commission, which we most heartily desire, that is, upon recantation and repentance to receive, to reconcile you, and again to join you to the unity of the church.

Then Dr. Ridley, with often interruption, at length spake.

Ridley. My lord, I acknowledge an unspotted church of Christ, in which no man can err, without which no man can be saved, which is spread throughout all the world, that is, the congregation of the faithful; neither do I alligate or bind the same to any one place as you have said, but confess the same to be spread throughout the world; and where Christ's sacraments are duly ministered, his gospel truly preached and followed, there doth Christ's church shine as a city upon a hill, and as a candle in the candlestick: but rather it is such as you would have the church of Christ bound to a place, who appoint the same to Rome, that there and no where else is the foundation of Christ's church. But I am fully persuaded that Christ's church is every where founded in every place where his gospel is truly received, and effectually followed. And in that the church of Christ is in doubt, I use herein the counsel of Vincent of Lyrinensis, whom I am sure you will allow, who giving precepts how the catholic church may be kept from schisms and heresies known, writeth in this manner. When (saith he) one part is corrupted with heresy, then prefer the whole world before that one part; if the greatest part be infected, then prefer antiquity.

In like manner now when I perceive the greatest part of christianity to be infected with the poison of the of Rome, I repair to the usage of the primitive church, which I find quite contrary to the pope's decrees: as in that the priest receiveth alone, that it is made unlawful to the laity to receive in both kinds; and such like: wherefore it requireth, that I prefer the antiquity of the primitive church, before the novelty of the Romish church.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, these faults which you charge the see of Rome withal, are indeed no faults. For first, it was never forbid the laity, but that they might, if they demanded, receive under both kinds. You know also, that Christ after his resurrection, at the time he went with his apostles to Galilee, opened himself by breaking of bread. You know that St. Paul after his long sailing towards Rome, brake bread, and that the apostles came together in breaking of bread, which declareth that it is not unlawful to administer the sacrament under the form of bread only. And yet the church had just occasion to decree, that the laity should receive in one kind only, thereby to take away an opinion of the unlearned, that Christ was not wholly both flesh and blood, under the form of bread. Therefore to take away their opinion, and to establish better the people's faith; the Holy Ghost in the church thought fit to decree, that the laity should receive only in one kind; and it is no news for the church upon just consideration to alter rites and ceremonies. For you read in the Acts of the Apostles, that St. Paul writing to certain of the Gentiles, who had received the gospel, biddeth them to abstain from things stifled, and from blood, so that this seemeth to be an express commandment; yet who will say but that it is lawful to eat bloodings? How is it lawful but by the permission of the church?

Ridley. My lord, such things as St. Paul enjoined to the Gentiles for a sufferance, by a little to win the Jews to Christ, were only commandments of time, and respected not the successors. But Christ's commandment, Do this, (that is, that which he did in remembrance, which was not to administer in one kind only) was not a commandment for a time, but to persevere to the world's end.

But the bishop of Lincoln, not attending to this answer, without any stay proceeded in this oration.

So that the church seemeth to have authority by the Holy Ghost, whom Christ said he would send after his ascension, which should teach the apostles all truth, to have power and jurisdiction to alter such points of the scripture, ever reserving the foundation: but we came not, as I said before, in this sort to reason the matter with you, but have certain instructions ministered unto us, according to the tenor of which we must proceed, proposing certain articles, unto which we require your answer directly, either affirmatively, or negatively, to every of them, either denying them or granting them, without farther disputations or reasoning; for we have already stretched our instructions, in that we suffered you to debate and reason the matter, in such sort as we have done: which articles you shall hear now, and to-morrow at eight o'clock, in St. Mary's church, we will require and take your answers; and then according to the same proceed: and if you require a copy of them, you shall have it, pen, ink, and paper, also such books as you shall demand, if they be to be gotten in the university.

The ARTICLES.

IN the name of God, Amen. We John of Lincoln, James of Gloucester, and John of Bristol, bishops, &c.

1. We do object to thee, Nicholas Ridley, and to thee Hugh Latimer, jointly and severally, first, that thou Nicholas Ridley in this high university of Oxford, in the year 1554, in the months of April, May, June, July, or in some one or more of them, hast affirmed and openly defended and maintained, and in many other times and places besides, that the true and natural body of Christ, after the consecration of the priest, is not really present in the sacrament of the altar.

2. Item. That in the year and months aforesaid thou hast publicly affirmed and defended, that in the sacrament of the altar remaineth still the substance of bread and wine.

3. Item. That in the said year and months thou hast openly affirmed, and obstinately maintained, that in the mass is no propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and the dead.

4. Item. That in the year, place, and months aforesaid, these the aforesaid assertions solemnly had been condemned, by the scholastical censure of this school, as heretical and contrary to the catholic faith, by the worshipful Dr. Weston, prolocutor then of the convocation-house, as also by other learned men of both the universities.

5. Item. That all and singular the premises be true, notorious, famous, and openly known by public fame, as well to them near hand, as also to them in distant places far off.

All these articles I thought good here to place together, that as often as hereafter rehearsal shall be of any of them, the reader may have recourse hither, and peruse the same; and not to trouble the story with several repetitions thereof.

EXAMINATION upon the said ARTICLES.

AFTER these articles were read, the bishops took counsel together. At last the bishop of Lincoln said, These are the very same articles which you in open disputation here in the university did maintain and defend. What say you unto the first? I pray you answer affirmatively, or negatively.

Ridley. Why, my lord, I supposed your gentleness had been such, that you would have given me space until to-morrow, that upon good advice I might bring a determinate answer.

Lincoln. Yea, Mr. Ridley, I mean not that your answers now shall be prejudicial to your answers to-morrow. I will take your answers at this time, and yet notwithstanding it shall be lawful to you to add, diminish, alter, and change these answers to-morrow what you will.

Ridley. Indeed, in like manner at our last disputations I had many things promised, and few performed. It was said, that after disputations I should have a copy thereof, and license to change mine answers, as I should think good. It was meer also that I should have seen what was written by the notaries at that time. So your lordship pretended great gentleness in giving me a time; but this gentleness is the same that Christ had of the high priest. For you, as your lordship saith, have no power to condemn me, neither at any time to put a man to death: so in like sort the high-priests said, that it was not lawful for them to put any man to death, but committed Christ to Pilate, neither would suffer him to absolve Christ, although he sought all the means for it that he might.

Then spake Dr. Weston, one of the audience, What, do you make the king Pilate?

Ridley. No, Mr. Doctor, I do but compare your deeds with Caiaphas's deeds and the high-priests, which would condemn no man to death, as you will not, and yet would not suffer Pilate to absolve and deliver Christ.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, we mind not but that you shall enjoy the benefit of answering to-morrow, and will take your answers now as now, to-morrow you shall change, take out, add, and alter what you will. In the mean season we require you to answer directly to every article, either affirmatively or negatively.

Ridley. Seeing you appoint me a time to answer, to-morrow, and yet would take mine answers out of hand: first I require the notaries to take and write my protestation, that in no point I acknowledge your authority, or admit you to be my judges, in that point you are authorized from the pope. Therefore whatsoever I shall say or do, I protest I neither say it, neither do it willingly, thereby to admit the authority of the pope, and if your lordship will give me leave, I will shew the causes which move me thereunto.

Lincoln. No, Mr. Ridley, we have instructions to the contrary. We may not suffer you.

Ridley.

Ridley. I will be short; I pray your lordship suffer me to speak in a few words.

Lincoln. No; Mr. Ridley, we may not abuse the hearers ears.

Ridley. Why; my lord, suffer me to speak three words.

Lincoln. Well, Mr. Ridley; to-morrow you shall speak forty. The time is far past; therefore we require your answer determinately. What say you to the first article? and thereupon rehearsed the same.

Ridley. My protestation always saved, that by this mine answer, I do not condescend to your authority, in that you are legate to the pope, I answer thus: In a sense the first article is true, and in a sense it is false; for if you take really for truly, for spiritually by grace and efficacy, then it is true that the natural body and blood of Christ is in the sacrament really and truly; but if you take these terms so grossly, that you would conclude thereby a natural body having motion, to be contained under the forms of bread and wine, really and truly, then really is not the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament, no more than the Holy Ghost is in the element of our baptism. Because this answer was not understood, the notaries knew not how to note it; wherefore the bishop of Lincoln desired him to answer affirmatively or negatively, either to grant the article, or to deny it.

Ridley. My lord, you know that where any equivocation (which is a word having two significations) is, except distinction be given, no direct answer can be made; for it is one of Aristotle's fallacies, containing two questions under one, which cannot be satisfied with one answer. For both you and I agree herein, that in the sacrament is the very true and natural body and blood of Christ, even that which was born of the virgin Mary, which ascended into heaven, which sitteth at the right hand of God the Father, which shall come from thence to judge the quick and the dead, only we differ in the way and manner of being; we confess all one thing to be in the sacrament, and dissent in the manner of being there. I being fully by God's word thereunto persuaded, confess Christ's natural body to be in the sacrament indeed by spirit and grace, because that whosoever worthily receiveth that bread and wine receiveth effectually Christ's body, and drinketh his blood, that is, he is made effectually partaker of his passion; and you make a grosser kind of being, inclosing a natural, a lively, and a moving body, under the shape or form of bread and wine.

Now, this difference considered, to the question thus I answer, that in the sacrament of the altar is the natural body and blood of Christ really and truly, or spiritually by grace and efficacy; for so every worthy receiver receiveth the very true body of Christ; but if you mean really and indeed, so that thereby you would include a lively and a moveable body under the forms of bread and wine, then in that sense is not Christ's body in the sacrament really and indeed.

This answer taken and penned by the notaries, the bishop of Lincoln proposed the second question or article. To whom he answered:

Ridley. Always my protestation reserved, I answer thus; that in the sacrament is a certain change, in that bread, which was before common bread, is now made a lively representation of Christ's body, and not only a figure, but effectually representeth his body; that even as the mortal body is nourished by that visible bread, so is the internal soul fed with the heavenly food of Christ's body, which the eye of faith seeth, as the bodily eye seeth only bread. Such a sacramental mutation I grant to be in the bread and wine, which truly is no small change, but such a change as no mortal man can make, but only that omnipotency of Christ's word.

Then the bishop of Lincoln desired him to answer directly, either affirmatively or negatively, without further declaration of the matter. Then he answered:

Ridley. That notwithstanding the sacramental mutation of which he spake, and all the doctors confessed, the true substance and nature of bread and wine remaineth: with which the body is in like sort nourished, as the soul is by grace and spirit with the body of Christ. Even so in baptism the body is washed with the visible water, and the soul is cleansed from all filth by the invisible Holy Ghost, and yet the water ceaseth not to be water, but keepeth the nature of water still: in like manner in the sacrament of the Lord's supper the bread ceaseth not to be bread.

Then the notaries penned, that he answered affirmatively to the second article. The bishop of Lincoln declared a difference between the sacrament of the altar and baptism, because that Christ did not say by the water, This is the Holy Ghost, as he did by the bread, This is my body.

Then Dr. Ridley cited St. Augustine, which conferred both the sacraments one with the other: but the bishop of Lincoln notwithstanding, thereupon recited the third article, and required a direct answer. To whom Ridley said:

Ridley. Christ, as St. Paul writeth, made one perfect sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, neither can any man reiterate that sacrifice of his, and yet is the communion an acceptable sacrifice to God of his praise and thanksgiving; but to say that thereby sin was taken away (which wholly and perfectly was done by Christ's passion, of which the communion is only a memory) that is a greater derogation from the merits of Christ's passion: for the sacrament was instituted, that we receiving it, and thereby recognizing and remembering his passion, should be partakers of the merits of the same. For otherwise doth this sacrament take upon it the office of Christ's passion, whereby it might follow, that Christ died in vain.

The notaries penned this his answer to be affirmative.

Lincoln. Indeed, as you alledge out of St. Paul, Christ made one perfect oblation for all the whole world, that is, that bloody sacrifice upon the cross: yet nevertheless he hath left this sacrifice, but not bloody, in the remembrance of that by which sins are forgiven; which is no derogation of Christ's passion.

Then the bishop of Lincoln recited the fourth article. To which Dr. Ridley answered:

Ridley. That in some part the fourth was true, and in some part false; true, in that his assertions were condemned as heresies, although unjustly; false, in that it was said, they were condemned Scienria Scholastica, in that the disputations were in such sort ordered, that it was far from any school act.

This answer being penned by the notaries, the bishop of Lincoln rehearsed the fifth article. To which Dr. Ridley answered:

Ridley. That the premises were in such sort true, as in these answers he had declared. Whether that all men speak evil of them, he knew not, in that he came not so much abroad to hear what every man reported.

When this answer also was taken by the notaries, the bishop of Lincoln said:

Lincoln. To-morrow, at eight o'clock, you shall appear before us in St. Mary's church, and then because we cannot well agree upon your answer to the first article (for it was long before he was understood) if it will please you to write your answer, you shall have pen, ink, paper, and books, such as you shall require; but if you write any thing more than your answers to these articles, we will not receive it: so he charging the mayor with him, declaring also to the mayor, that he should suffer him to have a pen and ink, dismissed Dr. Ridley, and sent for Mr. Latimer, who being brought to the divinity-school, there tarried till they called for him.

BISHOP LATIMER appeareth before the COMMISSIONERS.

NOW after Dr. Ridley was committed to the mayor, then the bishop of Lincoln commanded the bailiffs to bring the other prisoner, who, as soon as he was placed, said to the lords:

Latimer. My lords, If I appear again, I pray you not to send for me until you be ready. For I am an old man, and it is great hurt to mine old age to tarry so long gazing upon the cold walls. Then said the bishop coln:

Mr. Latimer, I am sorry you are brought n, although it is the bailiff's fault, and not mine:
shall be amended.

Mr. Latimer bowed his knee down to the d, holding his hat in his hand, having a kerchief head, and upon it a night-cap or two, and a great such as townsmen use, with two broad flaps to n under the chin), wearing an old thread-bare e frieze gown girded to his body with a penny er girdle, at which hanged by a long string of er his Testament, and his spectacles without a case, ading about his neck upon his breast. After this shop of Lincoln began on this manner.

Mr. Latimer, you shall understand, that my lords here have a commission from my lord al Poole's grace, legate a latere to this realm of and, from our most reverend father in God, the holiness, to examine you upon certain opinions of your's, which you, as well here openly positions in the year of our Lord 1554, as at sun-and at divers other times, did affirm, maintain, and mately defend. In which commission be specially points; the one which we must desire you is, that shall now recant, revoke, and disannul these your s, and together with all this realm, yea, all the d, confess the truth, we, upon due repentance on part, shall receive you, reconcile you, acknowledge no longer a strayed sheep, but adjoin you again to unity of Christ's church, from which you, in the of schism, fell. So that it is no new place to ch I exhort you; I desire you to return thither from nce you went.

Consider, Mr. Latimer, that without unity of the ch there is no salvation, and in the church there no errors. Therefore what should hinder you to fess that which all the realm confesseth, to forsake which their majesties the king and queen have reneced, and all the realm recanted: it was a common or, and it is now of all confessed: it will be no more ne to you than it was to us all. Consider, Mr.
imer, that within these twenty years this realm also all the world confessed one church, acknowledged Christ's church an head, and by what means, and what occasion it cut off itself from the rest of christiay, and renounced that which in all times and ages confessed, it is well known, and might be now dered upon what good foundation the see of Rome was taken, save that we must spare them that are dead, whom the rehearsal would be opprobrious; it is no rped power, as it hath been termed, but founded on Peter by Christ, a sure foundation, a perfect ilder; as by divers places, as well of the ancient fa-ers, as by the express word of God, may be proved.
With that Mr. Latimer, who before leaned his head his hand, began to remove his cap and kerchief on his ears. The bishop proceeded, saying,

For Christ spake expressly to Peter, saying, Feed my ep, and rule my sheep, which word doth not only clare a certain ruling of Christ's flock, but includeth o a certain pre-eminence and government; and efore is the king called a King from ruling: so that aying, Rule, Christ declared a power which he gave Peter, which jurisdiction and power Peter by hand livered to Clement, and so in all ages it hath remained the see of Rome. This, if you will confess with us, d acknowledge with all the realm your errors and se assertions, then will you do what we most desire, en shall we rest upon the first part of our commission, en shall we receive you, acknowledge you one of the urch, and according to the authority given unto us, nister unto you, upon due repentance, the benefit of olution, to which their majesties the king and queen ere not ashamed to submit themselves, although they themselves were unspotted, and needed no reconiliation: yet lest the putrefaction and rottenness of all he body might be noisome, and do damage to the head also, they (as I said) most humbly submitted themselves to my lord cardinal's grace, by him, as a legate
No. 30.

to the pope's holiness, to be partakers of the reconciliation. But if you shall stubbornly persevere in your blindness, if you will not acknowledge your errors, if you, as you stand alone, will be singular in your opinions, if by schisms and heresy you will divide yourself from the church, then must we proceed to the second part of the commission, which we would be loth to do, that is, not to condemn you, for that we cannot do (that the temporal sword of the realm, and not we, will do), but to separate you from us, acknowledge you to be none of us, to renounce you as no member of the church, to declare that you are the son of perdition, a lost child, and as you are a rotten member of the church, so to cut you off from the church, and so to commit you to the temporal judges, permitting them to proceed against you, according to the tenor of their laws.

Therefore, Mr. Latimer, for God's love consider your estate, remember you are a learned man, you have taken degrees in the schools, borne the office of a bishop; remember you are an old man, spare your body, accelerate not your death, and especially remember your soul's health, and the peace of your conscience; consider that if you should die in this state, you shall be a stinking sacrifice to God; for it is the cause that mak-eth the martyr, and not the death: consider that if you die in this state, you die without grace, for without the church can be no salvation. Let not vain-glory have the upper hand, humble yourself, captivate your understanding, subdue your reason, submit yourself to the determination of the church; do not force us to do all that we may do, let us rest in that part which we most heartily desire, and I, for my part, (then the bishop put off his cap) again with all my heart exhort you.

After the bishop had somewhat paused, then Mr.
Latimer lift up his head (for before he leaned on his elbow) and asked whether his lordship had done speaking; and the bishop answered, Yea.

Latimer. Then will your lordship give me leave to speak a word or two?

Lincoln. Yea, Mr. Latimer, so that you use a modest kind of talk, without railing or taunts.

Latimer. I beseech your lordship, license me to sit down.

Lincoln. At your pleasure, Mr. Latimer, take as much ease as you will.

Latimer. Your lordship gently exhorted me in many words to come to the unity of the church. I confess (my lord) a catholic church, spread throughout all the world, in which no man may err, without which unity of the church no man can be saved, but I know perfectly by God's word, that this church is in all the world, and hath not it's foundation in Rome only, as you say; and methought your lordship brought a place out of the scriptures to confirm the same, that there was a jurisdiction given to Peter, in that Christ bade him govern his people. Indeed, my lord, St. Peter did his office well and truly, in that he was bid to govern; but since the bishops of Rome have taken a new kind of government. Indeed they ought to govern, but how, my lord? not as they will themselves; but this government must be hedged in and ditched in.
They must rule, but according to the word of God.

But the bishops of Rome have turned the rule according to the word of God, into the rule according to their own pleasures, and as it pleaseth them best; as there is a book set forth which hath divers points in it, and amongst others, this point is one which your lordship went about to prove by this word, and the argument which he bringeth forth for the proof of that matter is taken out of Deuteronomy, where it is said, If there ariseth any controversy among the people, the priests of the order of Levi shall decide the matter, according to the law of God; so it must be taken.
This book perceiving this authority to be given to the priests of the old law, taketh occasion to prove the same to be given to the bishops and other the clergy of the new law: but in proving this matter, whereas it was said there, as the priests of the order of Levi should determine the matter according to God's law, that

that (according to God's law) is left out, and only is recited, as the priests of the order of Levi shall decide the matter, so it ought to be taken of the people; a large authority, I ensure you. What gelding of scripture is this? what clipping of God's coin? with which terms the audience smiled. This is much like the ruling which your lordship talked of. Nay, nay, my lords, we may not give such authority to the clergy, to rule all things as they will. Let them keep themselves within their commission. Now, I trust, my lord, I do not rail yet.

Lincoln. No, Mr. Latimer, your talk is more like taunts than railing; but in that I have not read the book which you blame so much, nor know of any such, I can say nothing therein.

Latimer. Yes, my lord, the book is open to be read, and is intituled to one which is bishop of Gloucester, whom I never knew, neither did at any time see him to my knowledge. With that the people laughed, because the bishop of Gloucester sat there in commission.

Then the bishop of Gloucester stood up, and said it was his book.

Latimer. Was it your's, my lord? Indeed I knew not your lordship, neither ever did I see you before, neither yet see you now, through the brightness of the sun shining betwixt you and me. Then the audience laughed again; and bishop Latimer spake unto them, saying, Why, my masters, this is no laughing matter. I answer upon life and death. Wo unto you that laugh now, for ye shall weep.

The bishop of Lincoln commanded silence, and then said; Mr. Latimer, if you had kept yourself within your bounds, if you had not used such scoffs and taunts, this had not been done.

After this the bishop of Gloucester said in excusing of his book: Mr. Latimer, hereby every man may see what learning you have.

Then Mr. Latimer interrupted him, saying: Lo, you look for learning at my hands who have gone so long to the school of oblivion, making the bare walls my library, keeping me so long in prison without book, or pen and ink; and now you let me loose to come and answer to articles. You deal with me as though two were appointed to fight for life and death, and overnight the one, through friends and favour, is cherished, and hath good counsel given him how to encounter with his enemy. The other, for envy or lack of friends, all the whole night is set in the stocks. In the morning when they shall meet, the one is in strength and lusty; the other is still in his limbs, and almost dead for feebleness. Think you, that to run through this man with a spear is not a goodly victory?

But the bishop of Gloucester interrupting his answer, proceeded, saying: I went not about to recite any places of scripture in that place of my book; for then if I had not recited it faithfully, you might have had just occasion of reprehension: but I only in that place formed an argument a majore, in this sense; that if in the old law the priests had power to decide matters of controversy, much more then ought the authority to be given to the clergy in the new law: and I pray you, in this point what availeth their rehearse, According to the law of God?

Latimer. Yes, my lord, very much. For I acknowledge authority to be given to the spirituality to decide matters of religion, and as my lord said even now, to rule; but they must do it according to the word and law of God, and not after their own will, after their own imaginations and fancies.

The bishop of Gloucester would have spoke more, saying that the bishop of Lincoln said, that they came not to dispute with Mr. Latimer, but to take his determinate answers to their articles, and so began to propose the same articles which were proposed to Dr. Ridley. But Mr. Latimer interrupted him, speaking to the bishop of Gloucester: Well, my lord, I could with more faithful dealing with God's word, and not to leave out a part, and snatch a part here and another there, to rehearse the whole faithfully.

But the bishop of Lincoln, not attending to this, ing of bishop Latimer, proceeded in rehearsing articles in form and sense as I declared before in examination of the articles proposed to Dr. Ridley, and required bishop Latimer's answer to the first. Then bishop Latimer making his protestation, that notwithstanding these his answers it should not be taken thereby he should acknowledge any authority of bishop of Rome, saying, that he was the king's queen's majesty's subject, and not the pope's, he could serve two masters at one time, except he should now renounce one of them; required the notaries to take his protestation, that whatsoever he should say or do, it should not be taken as though he did then agree to any authority that came from the bishop of Rome.

The bishop of Lincoln said, that his protestation should be so taken; he required him to answer briefly affirmatively or negatively, to the first article, and recited the same again: and Mr. Latimer answered followeth:

Latimer. I do not deny, my lord, that in the sacrament by spirit and grace is the very body and blood of Christ, because that every man by receiving bodily bread and wine, spiritually receiveth the body and blood of Christ, and is made partaker thereby of the benefits of Christ's passion: but I deny that the body and blood of Christ is in such manner in the sacrament as he would have it.

Lincoln. Then, Mr. Latimer, you answer affirmatively.

Latimer. Yea, if you mean of that gross and carnal thing that you do take.

The notaries took his answer affirmatively.

Lincoln. What say you, Mr. Latimer, to the second article? and recited the same.

Latimer. There is, my lord, a change in the bread and wine, and such a change as no power, but the omnipotency of God can make, in that which before was bread, should now have the dignity to exhibit Christ's body, and yet the bread is still bread, and the wine still wine; for the change is not in the nature, but in the dignity, because now that which was common bread hath the dignity to exhibit Christ's body: for where it was common bread, it is now no more common bread, neither ought it to be so taken, but as holy bread sanctified by God's word.

With that the bishop of Lincoln smiled, saying, Lo, Mr. Latimer, see what steadfastness is in your doctrine. That which you abhorred and despised most, you now most establish: for whereas you most railed at holy bread, you now make your communion holy bread.

Latimer. Tush, a rush for your holy bread. I say the bread in the communion is an holy bread indeed.

But the bishop of Lincoln interrupted him, and said, O, you make a difference betwixt holy bread and holy bread (with that the audience laughed). Well, Mr. Latimer, is not this your answer, that the substance of bread and wine remaineth after the words of consecration?

Latimer. Yes, verily, it must needs be so. For Christ himself calleth it bread, St. Paul calleth it bread, the doctors confess the same, the nature of a sacrament confirmeth the same, and I call it holy bread, not in that I make no difference between your holy bread and this, but for the holy office which it beareth, that is, to be a figure of Christ's body, and not only a bare figure, but effectually to represent the same.

So the notaries penned his answer in the affirmative.

Lincoln. What say you to the third question? and recited the same.

Latimer. No, no, my lord, Christ made one perfect sacrifice for all the world, neither can any man offer him again, neither can the priest offer up Christ again for the

of man, which he took away by offering himself for all (as St. Paul faith) upon the cross, neither there any propitiation for our sins saving his cross only.

So the notaries penned his answer to this article also affirmatively.

Lincoln. What say you to the fourth, Mr. Latimer?
He then recited it. After the recital whereof, when Mr.
Latimer answered not, the bishop asked whether he heard him or no?

Latimer. Yes, but I do not understand what you mean thereby.

Lincoln. Marry, only this, that these your assertions were condemned by Dr. Weston, as heresies; is not so, Mr. Latimer?

Latimer. Yes, I think they were condemned. But unjustly, he that is judge of all, knoweth.
The notaries also took this answer affirmatively.

Lincoln. What say you, Mr. Latimer, to the fifth article? and then recited it.

Latimer. I know not what you mean by these terms.
I am no lawyer, I wish you would propose the matter plainly.

Lincoln. In that we proceed according to the law, we must use their terms also. The meaning only is this,
that these your assertions are notorious, evil spoken and yet common and frequent in the mouths of the people.

Latimer. I cannot tell how much, nor what men talk of them. I come not so much among them, in that I have been secluded a long time. What men report of them I know not, and care not.

This answer taken, the bishop of Lincoln said, Mr.
Latimer, we mean not that these your answers shall be judicial to you. To-morrow you shall appear before us again, and then it shall be lawful for you to alter and change what you will. We give you respite till to-morrow, trusting that after you have pondered well the things against that time, you will not be ashamed to confess the truth.

Latimer. Now, my lord, I pray you give me license in three words to declare the causes why I refused the authority of the pope.

Lincoln. Nay, Mr. Latimer, to-morrow you shall have license to speak forty words.

Latimer. Nay, my lords, I beseech you to do with me as it shall please your lordships; I pray you let me not be troubled to-morrow again.

Lincoln. Yes, Mr. Latimer, you must needs appear again to-morrow.

Latimer. Truly, my lord, as for my part, I require no respite, for I am at a point; you shall give me respite in vain: therefore I pray you let me not trouble you to-morrow.

Lincoln. Yes, for we trust God will work with you again to-morrow. There is no remedy, you must needs appear again to-morrow at eight o'clock in St. Mary's church. And forthwith the bishop charged the mayor with Mr. Latimer, and dismissed him, and then brake up their session for that day, about one o'clock in the afternoon.

The SECOND SESSION.

THE next day following (which was the first of October) somewhat after eight o'clock, the said wards repaired to St. Mary's church, and after they were set in a high throne, well trimmed with cloth of blue and silk, then appeared Dr. Ridley, who was set at a framed table a good space from the bishop's seat, which table had a silk cloth cast over it, and the place was encompassed about in a quadrate form, partly for the gentlemen who repaired thither, (for this was the session-day of gaol-delivery) and the heads of the university to sit, and partly to keep off the press of the audience: for the whole body, as well of the university, as the town, came hither to see the end of these two sessions. After Dr. Ridley's appearance, and the silence of the audience, the bishop of Lincoln spake in manner following.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, yesterday when we challenged you for not uncovering your head, you excused yourself of that whereof no man accused you, in saying you did not put on your cap for any obstinacy towards us, who as touching our own persons desired no such obedience of you, but only in respect of those whose persons we bear; neither (you said) for any contempt that you bear to this worshipful audience, which, although justly, may yet, in this case, require no such humility of you;

neither for any derogation of honour to my lord cardinal's grace, in that he is descended from the royal blood, in that he is a man most noble, both for his excellent qualities and singular learning; for as touching those points, you said, you would with all humility, honour, reverence, and worship his grace; but in that he is legate to the most reverend father in God, the pope's holiness, (with that the bishop, with all then present, put off their caps, but Dr. Ridley moved not his) you said you neither could, nor would by any means be induced to give him honour: but forasmuch as this is the point, as we told you yesterday, why we require honour and reverence of you, we tell you now as we did then, unless you take the pains to move your bonnet, we will take care to cause your bonnet to be taken from you, unless you pretend sickness, as yesterday you did not.

Ridley. I pretend now no other cause than I did yesterday, that is, only that hereby it may appear, that not only in word and confession, but also by all my gesture and behaviour, in no point I agree or admit any authority from the pope, and not for any pride of mind, (as God is my judge) neither for contempt of your lordships, or of this worshipful audience, neither for derogation of honour due to my lord cardinal's grace, as concerning those points which your lordship spake of, that is, his noble parentage, and singular graces in learning. And as for taking my cap away, your lordship may do as it shall please you, it shall not offend me, but I shall be content with your ordinance in that behalf.

Lincoln. Forasmuch as you do now answer as you did yesterday, we must do also as we did then, and forthwith one of the beaules very hastily snatched his cap from his head.

After this the bishop of Lincoln began the examination in the following manner.

Lincoln. Mr. Ridley, yesterday we took your answer to certain articles, which we then proposed unto you: but because we could not be thoroughly satisfied with your answer then to the first article, neither could the notaries take any determinate answer of you, we (you requiring the same) granted you license to bring your answer in writing, and thereupon commanded the mayor that you should have pen, paper, and ink, yea, any books also that you would require, if they were to be gotten:
we licensed you then also to alter your former answers this day at your pleasure: therefore we are now come hither, to see whether you are in the same mind now, that you were yesterday, (which we would not wish) or contrary, contented to revoke all your former assertions, and in all points consent to submit yourself to the determination of the universal church; and I for my part most earnestly exhort you, (and therewith he put off his cap) not because my conscience pricketh me, as you said yesterday, but because I see you a rotten member, and in the way of perdition.

Yesterday I brought forth, amongst others, St. Augustine, to prove that authority hath always been given to the see of Rome, and you wrested the words far contrary to St. Augustine's meaning, in that you would have all the world to be applied only to Europe, which is but a third part of all the world, whereas indeed the process of St. Augustine's words will not admit of your interpretation. For he saith not, All the christian countries beyond the seas, &c. but first, All the christian countries are subject to the church of Rome, afterwards addeth, Beyond the sea, but only to augment the dominion of the see of Rome.

But Dr. Ridley still persevered in his former answer, saying, I am sure, my lord, you have some skill in Cos-mography, in which you shall understand that there is a sea called, The Mediterranean sea, cast between Europe and

and Africa, in which he meant Europe beyond the sea, even as if I should say the whole world beyond the sea, excepting England in which I stand. And here many words were spent upon the interpretation of the same place of St. Austin.

After long disputation, the bishop of Lincoln said, that the meaning of St. Augustine might be known by the consent of the other doctors, and rehearsed divers.

But as Dr. Ridley required the rehearsal of the places, and to read the very words of the doctors, saying, that perhaps those which the bishop rehearsed, being proposed in other terms in the doctors, would admit a contrary meaning and interpretation: but in that book out of which the bishop rehearsed them, was none of the doctors, but only some sentences drawn out of the doctors by some studious man: he could not recite the very words of the doctors.

Then after the bishop of Lincoln mentioned Cyril, who (as he said) made against Mr. Ridley, in the sacrament, even by Philip Melancthon's own alledging in his common places, and forthwith called for Melancthon, but in vain, because all such books were burned a little before, wherefore he passed it over.

Cyril also in another place proving to the Jews that Christ was come, useth this reason: Altars are erected in Christ's name in Britain, and in far countries: therefore Christ is come. But we may use the contrary of that reason: Altars are plucked down in Britain: therefore Christ is not come. A good argument a contrariis. I will stand to it in the schools by and with any man. You see what a good argument this your doctrine maketh for the Jews, to prove that Christ is not come.

Dr. Ridley, smiling, answered, Your lordship is not ignorant that this word Altar in the scripture signifieth as well the altar whereupon the Jews were wont to make their burnt sacrifices, as the table of the Lord's supper. Cyril meaneth there by this word Altars, not the Jewish altar, but the table of the Lord, and by that saying (Altars are erected in Christ's name, therefore Christ is come) he meaneth, that the communion is administered in his remembrance: therefore Christ is come: for the strength of his argument is, because the remembrance of a thing cannot be, except itself be past; then could not all countries celebrate the communion in remembrance of Christ's passion, except Christ had been come and suffered. As for the taking down of the altars, it was done upon just considerations, for that they seemed to come too nigh to the Jewish usage. Neither was the supper of the Lord at any time better administered, or more duly received, than in those latter days when all things were brought to the rites and usage of the primitive church.

Lincoln. A goodly receiving, I promise you, to set an oyster-table instead of an altar, and to come from puddings at Westminster to receive; and yet when your table was constituted, you could never be content, in placing the same, now East, now North, now one way, then another, until it pleased God of his goodness to place it clean out of the church.

Ridley. Your lordship's irreverent terms do not elevate the thing. Perhaps some men came more devoutly from puddings, than other men do now from other things.

Lincoln. As for that, Mr. Ridley, you ought to be judge of no man: but by this your reasoning you cause us to stretch and enlarge our instructions. We came not to reason, but to take your determinate answers to our articles, and then he read the first article in manner above specified.

Now, Mr. Ridley, what say you to the first article? If you have brought your answer in writing, we will receive it: but if you have written any other matter, we will not receive it.

Then Dr. Ridley took a sheet of paper out of his bosom, and began to read that which he had written; but the bishop of Lincoln commanded the beadle to take it from him. But he desired license to read it, saying, that it was nothing but his answers, but the bishop would in no wise suffer him.

Ridley. Why, my lord, will you require my answer, and not suffer me to publish it? I beseech you, my lord, let the audience bear witness to your doings.

Lincoln. Well, Mr. Ridley, we will first see what you have written, and then if we shall think it good to be read, you shall have it published; but except you will deliver it first, we will take none at all of you.

With that Dr. Ridley, seeing no remedy, delivered it to an officer, who immediately delivered it to the bishop of Lincoln, who after he had secretly communicated it to the other two bishops, declared the sentence, but would not read it as it was written, saying, that it contained words of blasphemy: therefore he would not fill the ears of the audience therewithal, and so abused their patience: notwithstanding Dr. Ridley desired very instantly to have it published, saying, that except a line or two, there was nothing contained but the ancient fathers saying for the confirmation of his assertions.

After the said bishops had secretly viewed the whole, then the bishop of Lincoln said: In the first part, Mr. Ridley, is nothing contained but your protestation, that you would not have these your answers to be taken, though you seemed thereby to consent to the authority or jurisdiction of the pope's holiness.

Ridley. No, my lord, I pray you read it out that the audience may hear it; but the bishop of Lincoln would in no wise, because (he said) there were contained words of blasphemy.

Then the bishop of Lincoln recited the first article and required Dr. Ridley's answer to it. Then Dr. Ridley said, that his answer was there in writing, and desired that it might be published; but the bishop would not read the whole, but here and there a piece of it. So the notaries took his answer, that he referred him to his answer in writing exhibited now, and also before at the time of disputation, Dr. Weston being procurator.

In like manner the bishop of Lincoln recited the second article, and required an answer, and Dr. Ridley referred him to his answer in writing exhibited now, and also before at the time of disputation: and his answers were taken to all the rest of the articles.

These answers in this manner rehearsed, taken and penned by the notaries, the bishop of Gloucester began an exhortation to move Dr. Ridley to turn.

Gloucester. If you would once empty your stomach, captivate your senses, subdue your reason, and together with us consider what a feeble ground of your religion you have, I do not doubt but you might easily be brought to acknowledge one church with us, to confess one faith with us, and to believe one religion with us. For what a weak and feeble stay in religion is this, I pray you? Latimer leaneth to Cranmer, Cranmer to Ridley, and Ridley to the singularity of his own will: so that if you overthrow the singularity of Ridley's will, then must needs the religion of Cranmer and Latimer fall also. You remember well, Mr. Ridley, that the prophet speaketh most truly, saying, Woe, woe be to them which are singular and wise in their own conceits.

But you will say here, it is true that the prophet saith, but how know you, that I am wise in mine own conceit? Yes, Mr. Ridley, you refuse the determination of the catholic church; you must needs be singular and wise in your own conceit, for you bring scripture for the proof of your assertions, and we also bring scriptures: you understand them in one sense, and we in another. How will you know the truth herein? If you stand to your own interpretation, then you are singular in your own conceit: but if you say you will follow the mind of the doctors and ancient fathers, likely you understand them in one meaning, and we take them in another: how will you know the truth herein? If you stand to your own judgment, then are you singular in your own conceit, then can you not avoid the woe which the prophet speaketh of.

Wherefore if you have no stay but the catholic church in matters of controversy, except you will rest upon the singularity and wisdom of your own brain, if the prophet most truly saith, Woe, woe be to them that are wise in their own conceit: then for God's love, Dr. Ridley stand not singular, be not you wise in your conceit, please not yourself overmuch. How were the Arians, the Manichees, Eutychians, with divers heretics which have been in the church, how, I say, were they suppressed and convinced? By opening in disputations? No truly, the Arians had more places for the confirmation of their heresy, than the catholics for the defence of the truth. How were they convinced? Only by the determination of the church. And indeed except we do constitute the church our foundation, stay, and judge, we can have no end of controversies, no end of disputations. For what we all bring scriptures and doctors for the proof of our assertions, who should be judge of this our controversy? If we ourselves then be singular and wise in our own conceits, then cannot we avoid the woe that the prophet speaketh of.

It remaineth therefore that we submit ourselves to the determination and arbitrement of the church, with whom God promised to remain to the world's end, to whom he promised to send the Holy Ghost which should teach it the truth. Wherefore, Mr. Ridley, if you will avoid the woe that the prophet speaketh of, be not wise in your own judgment: if you will not be wise in your own judgment, captivate your own understanding, subdue your reason, and submit yourself to the determination of the church.

This is briefly the sum of the oration of the bishop of Gloucester, by which he endeavoured in many more words, amplifying and enlarging the matter eloquently with sundry points of rhetoric to move affection, to persuade Dr. Ridley to turn and forsake his opinion.

To whom Dr. Ridley answered in few words, That he did most truly with the prophet, Woe be to him that is wise in his own conceit; but that he acknowledgeth much singularity in him, nor knew any cause why he should attribute so much to himself. And whereas he said the bishop Cranmer leaned to him, that was most untrue, in that he was but a young scholar in comparison of Dr. Cranmer; for when he was but a young scholar, Cranmer was then a doctor; so that he confessed Cranmer might have been his schoolmaster for many years. It seemed that he would have spoke more, the bishop of Gloucester interrupted him, saying: Why, Mr. Ridley, it is your own confession, for Mr. Cranmer, at the time of his disputation, confessed his leaning to lie in Mr. Cranmer's books, and Mr. Cranallo said that it was your doing.

The bishop of Lincoln likewise with many words, gently holding his cap in his hand, desired him to answer. But Dr. Ridley made an absolute answer, That he was fully persuaded the religion which he defended to be grounded upon God's word, and therefore without offence towards God, great peril and damage of soul, he could not forsake his master and Lord God; he desired the bishop to perform his grant, in that his ship said the day before, that he should have license to renew his cause, why he could not with a safe conscience admit the authority of the pope. But the bishop of Lincoln said, that whereas then he had denied license to speak three words, he was contented that he should speak forty, and that grant he would perform.

Then stepped forth Dr. Weston, who sat by, and said, Why, my lord, he hath spoken four hundred already.

Dr. Ridley confessed he had, but they were not of the prescribed number, neither of that matter. The bishop of Lincoln bade him take his license: but he would speak but forty, and then he would tell them with his fingers: and presently Dr. Ridley began to speak: but before he had ended half a sentence, the doctors sitting by, cried out, and said, that his number was out: and with that he was put to silence.

After this the bishop of Lincoln, who sat in the first, began to speak as followeth:

Now I perceive, Mr. Ridley, you will not permit nor suffer us to stay in that point of our commission which we most desired: for indeed, for my part, I take God to witness, I am sorry for you. Whereupon Dr. Ridley answered:

I believe it well, my lord, forasmuch as one day it will be burdensome to your soul.

Lincoln. Nay, not so, Mr. Ridley, but because I am sorry to see such stubbornness in you, that by no means you may be persuaded to acknowledge your errors, and receive the truth: but seeing it is so, because you will not suffer us to persist in the first, we must of necessity proceed to the other part of our commission. Therefore I pray you hearken to what I shall say, and forthwith he read the sentence of condemnation, which was written in a long process: the tenor of which, because it is sufficiently already expressed before, we thought meet in this place to omit, forasmuch as they are rather words of course than things devised upon deliberation. Howbeit indeed the effect was, that forasmuch as the said Nicholas Ridley did affirm, maintain, and stubbornly defend certain opinions, assertions, and heresies, contrary to the word of God, and the received faith of the church, as in denying the true and natural body of Christ, and his natural blood, to be in the sacrament of the altar: secondly, in affirming the substance of bread and wine to remain after the words of consecration: thirdly, in denying the mass to be a lively sacrifice of the church for the quick and the dead; and by no means would be brought from these his heresies: they therefore, the said John of Lincoln, James of Gloucester, John of Bristol, did judge and condemn the said Nicholas Ridley as an heretic, and so adjudged him presently, both by word and also in deed, to be degraded from the degree of a bishop, from priesthood, and all ecclesiastical order; declaring moreover the said Nicholas Ridley to be no member of the church, and therefore committed him to the secular powers, of them to receive due punishment according to the tenor of the temporal laws; and further excommunicating him by the great excommunication.

The last APPEARANCE and EXAMINATION of BISHOP LATIMER before the COMMISSIONERS.

THIS sentence being published by the bishop of Lincoln, Dr. Ridley was committed as a prisoner to the mayor, and immediately Mr. Latimer was sent for: but in the mean time the carpet or cloth which lay upon the table whereat Dr. Ridley stood, was removed, because (as men reported) Mr. Latimer had never the degree of a doctor, as Dr. Ridley had. But as soon as Mr. Latimer appeared, as he did the day before, perceiving no cloth upon the table, he laid his hat, which was an old felt, under his elbows, and immediately spoke to the commissioners, saying:

Latimer. My lords, I beseech your lordships to set a better order here at your entrance: for I am an old man, and have a very sore back, so that the press of the multitude doth me much harm.

Lincoln. I am sorry, Mr. Latimer, for your hurt. At your departure we will see to better order.

With that Mr. Latimer thanked his lordship, making a very low courtsey. After this the bishop of Lincoln began in this manner.

Mr. Latimer, although yesterday, after we had taken your answers to those articles which we proposed, we might have justly proceeded to judgment against you, especially in that you required the same; yet we having a good hope of your returning, desiring not your destruction, but rather that you would recant, revoke your errors, and turn to the catholic church, deferred farther process till this day; and now according to the appointment, we have called you before us, to hear whether you are content to revoke your heretical assertions, and submit yourself to the determination of the church, as we most heartily desire, and I for my part, as I did yesterday, most earnestly do exhort you, or to know whether you persevere still the man that you were, for which we would be sorry.

It seemed that the bishop would have farther proceeded, if Mr. Latimer had not interrupted him by saying:

Your lordship doth often repeat the catholic church, as though I should deny the same. No, my lord, I confess there is a catholic church, to the determination of which I will stand, but not the church which you call catholic, which ought rather to be termed diabolic. And whereas you join together the Romish and catholic church, stay there, I pray you. For it is one thing to say the Romish church, and another thing to say catholic church: I must use here in this mine answer the counsel of Cyprian, who when cited before certain bishops that gave him leave to take deliberation and counsel, to try and examine his opinion, he answereth them thus: In sticking and persevering in the truth there must no counsel or deliberation be taken. And again, being demanded of them sitting in judgment, which was most like to be of the church of Christ, whether he who was persecuted, or they who did persecute? Christ, said he, hath foreshewed, that he that doth follow him, must take up his cross. Christ gave knowledge that his disciples should have persecution and trouble. How think you then, my lords, is it like that the see of Rome, which hath been a continual persecutor, is rather the church, or that small flock which hath continually been persecuted by it, even to death? Also the flock of Christ hath been but few in comparison to the residue, and ever in subjection: which he proved, beginning at Noah's time, even to the apostles.

Lincoln. Your cause and Cyprian's is not one, but clean contrary; for he suffered persecution for the sake of Christ and his gospel; but you are in trouble for your errors and false assertions, contrary to the word of God, and the received truth of the church.

Mr. Latimer interrupted him, saying, Yes, verily, my cause is as good as St. Cyprian's: for his was the word of God, and so is mine.

Lincoln. Also at the beginning and foundation of the church, it could not be but that the apostles should suffer great persecution. Further, before Christ's coming, continually there were very few which truly served God: but after his coming began the time of grace, then began the church to increase, and was continually augmented, until it came unto this perfection, and now hath justly that jurisdiction which the unchristian princes before by tyranny did resist: there is a diverse consideration of the state of the church now in the time of grace, and before Christ's coming. But, Mr. Latimer, although he had instructions given us determinately to take your answer to such articles as we should propose, without any reasoning or disputations, yet we hoping by talk somewhat to prevail with you, appointed you to appear before us in the divinity-school, a place for disputations. And whereas then notwithstanding you had license to speak your mind, and were answered to every matter, yet you could not be brought from your errors; we thinking that from that time you would with good conversation ponder your state, gave you a respite from that time yesterday, when we dismissed you, until this time, and now have called you again here in this place, by your answers to learn whether you are the same man you were then or no? Therefore we will propose unto you the same articles which we did then, and require of you a determinate answer, without further reasoning, and he immediately recited the first article.

Latimer. Always my protestation saved that by these mine answers it should not be thought that I did condescend and agree to your lordship's authority, in that you are legaced by authority of the pope; so that thereby I might seem to consent to his jurisdiction: to the first article I answer now as I did yesterday, that in the sacrament the worthy receiver receiveth the very body of Christ, and drinketh his blood by the spirit and grace. But after a corporal being, which the Romish church prescribeth, Christ's body and blood is not in the sacrament under the forms of bread and wine.

The notaries took his answer affirmatively. For the second article he referred himself to his answers made before.

After this the bishop of Lincoln recited the third article, and required a determinate answer.

Latimer. Christ made one oblation and sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, and that a perfect sacrifice neither needeth there to be any other, neither can there be any other propitiatory sacrifice.

The notaries took his answer affirmatively.

In like manner did he answer to the other articles not varying from his answers made the day before.

After his answers were penned by the notaries, the bishop of Lincoln had exhorted him in like manner to recant as he did Dr. Ridley, and revoke his errors and false assertions, and Mr. Latimer had answered that he neither would nor could deny his master Christ and his verity, the bishop of Lincoln desired Mr. Latimer to hearken to him: and then Mr. Latimer hearkening for some new matter and other talk, the bishop of Lincoln read his condemnation, after which the said three bishops brake up their sessions, and dismissed the audience.

But Mr. Latimer required the bishop to perform his promise, in saying the day before that he should have license briefly to declare the cause why he refused the pope's authority.

But the bishop of Lincoln said, that now he could not hear him, neither ought to talk with him.

Then Mr. Latimer asked him whether it were lawful for him to appeal from this his judgment. The bishop asked him again, to whom he would appeal. To the next general council, said Mr. Latimer, which shall be truly called in God's name. With that relation the bishop was content: but he said it would be a long season before such a convocation as he would be called.

Then the bishop committed Mr. Latimer to the mayor, saying, Now he is your prisoner, Mr. Mayor. Because the press of the people was not diminished, each man looking for the farther process, the bishop of Lincoln commanded avoidance, and desired Mr. Latimer to tarry till the press was diminished, lest he should take hurt at his going out, as he did at his entrance. And so Dr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer continued in custody till the 16th day of the said month of October.

A COMMUNICATION between Dr. BROOK, Bishop of GLOUCESTER, and Dr. RIDLEY, the House of Mr. IRISH, Mayor of OXFORD, October 15, 1555, at which Time he was degraded.

ON the 15th day in the morning, Dr. Brook, bishop of Gloucester, and the vice-chancellor of Oxford, Dr. Marshall, with divers other of the chief and heads of the same university, and many others accompanying them, came to the house of Mr. Irish, then Mayor of Oxford, where Dr. Ridley, late bishop of London, was close prisoner. And when the bishop of Gloucester came into the chamber where the late Dr. Ridley did lie, he told him for what purpose the coming was unto him, saying, That yet once again the queen's majesty did offer unto him by them, her gracious mercy, if that he would receive the same, and come home again to the faith which he was baptized in, and revoke his erroneous doctrine that he of late had taught abroad, to the destruction of many. And further said, That if he would not recant and become one of the catholic church with them, then they must needs (against their wills) proceed according to the law, which they would be very loth to do, if they might otherwise. But, said he, we have been oftentimes with you, and have requested that you would recant this your fantastical and devilish opinion, which hitherto you have maintained, although you might in so doing win many, and do much good. Therefore, good Mr. Ridley, consider well yourself the danger that shall ensue both of body and soul, if that you shall so wilfully cast yourself away, refusing mercy offered unto you at this time.

My lord, said Dr. Ridley, you know my mind full herein: and as for the doctrine which I have taught, my conscience assureth me that it was sound, and according to God's word (to his glory be it spoken) which doctrine, the Lord God being my helper, I will maintain so long as my tongue shall wag, and breathe within my body, and in confirmation thereof seal the same with my blood.

Brooks. Well, it were best, Mr. Ridley, not to so, but to become one of the church with us. For I know this well enough, that whosoever is out of the holie church cannot be saved. Therefore I say once more, that while you have time and mercy offered you, receive it, and confesse with us the pope's holiness to be chief head of the same church.

Ridley. I marvel that you will trouble me with any vain and foolish talk. You know my mind concerning the usurped authority of that Romish antichrist. I confessed openly in the schools, so do I now, that by my behaviour and talk I do no obedience at all unto the bishop of Rome, nor to his usurped authority, and that for divers good and godly considerations. And here Dr. Ridley would have reasoned with the said books, bishop of Gloucester, concerning the bishop of Rome's authority, but could not be suffered, and yet spake so earnestly against the pope therein, that the bishop told him, if he would not hold his peace, he should be compelled against his will. And seeing, faith that you will not receive the queen's mercy now offered unto you, but stubbornly refuse the same, we will, against our wills, proceed according to our commission to degrading, taking from you the dignity of bishophood. For we take you for no bishop, and therefore will the sooner have done with you: so committing you to the secular power, you know what doth follow.

Ridley. Do with me as it shall please God to suffer me, I am well content to abide the same with all my heart.

Brooks. Put off your cap, and put upon you this surplice.

Ridley. Not I truly.

Brooks. But you must.

Ridley. I will not.

Brooks. You must, therefore make no more ado but put this surplice upon you.

Ridley. Truly if it come upon me, it shall be against my will.

Brooks. Will you not put it upon you?

Ridley. No, that I will not.

Brooks. It shall be put upon you by one or other.

Ridley. Do therein as it shall please you, I am well content with that, and more than that; the servant is not above his master. If they dealt so cruelly with our Saviour Christ, as the scripture maketh mention, and he suffered the same patiently, how much more doth it become us his servants? And in saying these words they put upon the said Dr. Ridley a surplice, with all the tinkets appertaining to the mass. And as they were putting on the same, Dr. Ridley did vehemently inveigh against the Romish bishop, and all that foolish apparel, calling him Antichrist, and the apparel foolish and abominable, yea, too foolish for a device in a play, inso-much that Brooks was exceeding angry with him, and bade him hold his peace, for he did but rail. Dr. Ridley answered him again, and said, So long as his tongue and breath would suffer him, he would speak against their abominable doings, whatsoever happened unto him for so doing.

Brooks. Well, you had best hold your peace, lest your mouth be stopped. At which words one Edrige, the reader then of the Greek lecture, standing by, said to Dr. Brooks, Sir, the law is that he should be gagged, therefore let him be gagged. At which words Dr. Ridley looking earnestly upon him that so said, shook his head at him, and made no answer; but said with a sigh, Oh well, well, well.

So they proceeded in their doings, yet nevertheless Dr. Ridley was ever speaking things not pleasant to their ears, although one or other bade him hold his peace, lest he should be caused against his will.

But when they came to that place where Dr. Ridley should hold the chalice and the wafer cake (called the singing-bread) they bade him hold the same in his hands: Dr. Ridley said, They shall not come into my hands; for if they do, they shall fall to the ground for me. Then there was one appointed to hold them in his hand, while bishop Brooks read a certain thing in Latin, touching the degradation of spiritual persons, according to the pope's law.

Then they put the book in his hand, and read another thing in Latin, the effect thereof was, "We do take from thee the office of preaching the gospel," &c. At which words Dr. Ridley gave a great sigh, looking up towards heaven, saying, O Lord God, forgive them this their wickedness.

Having put on him the mass-gear, they began to take it away (beginning with the uppermost garment), again reading a thing in Latin, according to the order contained in the pope's law. Now when all was taken from him, saving only the surplice left on his back, as they were reading and taking it away, Dr. Ridley said unto them, Lord God, what power be you of, that you can take from a man that which he never had? I was never a finger in all my life, and yet you will take from me that which I never had.

So when this their abominable and ridiculous degradation was ended very solemnly, Dr. Ridley said unto Dr. Brooks, Have you done? If you have done, then give me leave to talk a little concerning these matters. Brooks answered and said, Mr. Ridley, we may not talk with you, you be out of the church, and our law is, that we may not talk with any that be out of the church. Then Dr. Ridley said; Seeing that you will not suffer me to talk, neither will vouchsafe to hear me, what remedy but patience? I refer my cause to my heavenly Father, who will reform things that be amiss, when it shall please him.

At which words they would have been gone, but Mr. Ridley said, My lord, I would wish that your lordship would vouchsafe to read over and peruse a little book of Bertram's writing, concerning the sacrament. I promise you, you shall find much good learning therein, if you will read the same with an indifferent judgment. To which Dr. Brooks made no answer, but was going away. Then said Dr. Ridley, Oh, I perceive you cannot away with this manner of talk. Well, as it is to no purpose, I will say no more; I will speak of worldly affairs. I pray you therefore, my lord, hear me, and be a means to the queen's majesty, in behalf of a great many poor men, especially my poor sister and her husband, who standeth there. They had a poor living granted unto them by me, when I was in the see of London, which is taken away from them, by him that occupieth the same room, without all law or conscience.

Here I have a supplication to the queen's majesty in their behalf. You shall hear the same read, so shall you perceive the matter better. Then he read the same, and when he came to the place in the supplication that touched his sister by name, he wept, so that for a little time he could not speak for weeping. But recovering himself, he said, This is nature that moveth me, but I have now done; and with that read out the rest, and delivered the same unto his brother, commanding him to put it up to the queen's majesty, and to sue not only for himself, but also for such as had any leases or grants by him, and were put from the same by Dr. Bonner, then bishop of London. Whereunto Brooks said, Indeed, Mr. Ridley, your request in this supplication is very lawful and honest: therefore I must needs in conscience speak to the queen's majesty for them.

Ridley. I pray for God's sake so do.

Brooks. I think your request will be granted, except one thing hinder it, and that is (I fear) because you do not allow the queen's proceedings, but obstinately withstand the same, that it will hardly be granted.

Ridley. What remedy? I can do no more but speak and write. I trust I have discharged my conscience therein, and God's will be done.

Brooks. I will do what lieth in me.

A COPY of the SUPPLICATION written to the QUEEN.

Dr. Ridley to the Queen's Majesty.

MAY it please your majesty, for Christ our Saviour's sake, in a matter of a conscience (and not for myself, but for other poor men) to vouchsafe to hear and understand understand this humble supplication. It is so (honourable prince) that in the time while I was in the ministry of the see of London, divers poor men, tenants thereof, have taken new leases of their tenancies and holding: and some have renewed and changed their old, and therefore have paid fines and sums of money, both to me and to the chapter of St. Paul's, for the confirmation of the same.

Now I say, that the bishop, who at present occupieth the same room, will not allow the aforesaid leases, which must redound to many a poor man's utter ruin and decay. Wherefore this is mine humble supplication unto your honourable grace, that it may please the same, for Christ's sake, to be unto the aforesaid poor men their gracious patroness and defender, either that they may enjoy their aforesaid leases and years renewed, as I suppose when their matter shall be heard with conscience, both justice, conscience, and equity shall require, for that their leases shall be found (I trust) made without fraud or cunning, either on their part, or of mine, and always also the old rents reserved to the see, without any kind of damage thereof: or if this will not be granted, then that it may please your gracious highness, to command that the poor men may be restored to their former leases and years, and to have rendered to them again such sums of money as they paid to me and to the Chapter-house for their leases and years, so now taken from them. Which thing, concerning the fines paid to me, may be easily done, if it shall please your majesty to command some portion of those goods which I left in my house, when I fled in hope of pardon for my trespasses towards your grace, which goods (as I have heard) be yet reserved in the same house. I suppose that half the value of my plate that I left in mine offices, and especially in an iron chest in my bed-chamber, will go nigh to restore all such fines received, the true sums and parcels whereof are not set in their leases: and therefore if that way shall please your highness, they must be known by such ways and means, as your majesty, by the advice of men of wisdom and conscience, shall appoint: but yet, for Christ's sake, I crave and humbly beseech your majesty, of your gracious pity and mercy, that the former way may take place.

I have also a poor sister that came to me out of the north, with three fatherless children, whom I married after to a servant of mine own house; she is put out of that which I did provide for them. I beseech your honourable grace, that her case may be mercifully considered, and that the rather, in contemplation that I never had of him, which suffered indurance at my entrance into the see of London, not one penny of his moveable goods, for it was almost half a year after his deposition before I entered into that place; yea, and also if any were left, known to be his, he had license to carry it away, or there for his use it did lie safe, as his officers do know. I paid for the lead which I found there, when I occupied any of it to the behoof of the church, or of the house. And moreover, I had not only no part of his moveable goods, but also (as his old receiver, and then mine, called Mr. Stanton, can testify) I paid for them towards his servants common liveries and wages, after his deposition, fifty-three or fifty-five pounds, I cannot tell which.

In all these matters I beseech your honourable majesty to hear the advice of men of conscience, and especially the archbishop of York; which for that he was continually in my house a year and more, before mine imprisonment, I suppose he is not altogether ignorant of some part of these things; and also his grace doth know my sister, for whose succour, and some relief, now unto your highness I make humble suit.

N. R.

October 16, 1555.

The degradation being past, and all things finished, Dr. Brooks called the bailiffs, delivering to them Dr. Ridley, with this charge, to keep him safely from any man speaking with him, and that he should be brought to the place of execution when they were commanded. Then Dr. Ridley, in praising God, burst out in these words, and said, God, I thank thee, and to thy praise be it spoken, there is none of you able to lay to my charge any open or notorious crime: for if you could, it would surely be laid in my lap, I see very well. Whereunto Brooks said, he played the part of a proud pharisee, exalting and praising himself.

But Dr. Ridley said, No, no, no, as I have said before to God's glory be it spoken. I confess myself to be a miserable wretched sinner, and have great need of God's help and mercy, and do daily call and cry for the same: therefore I pray you have no such opinion of me. Then they departed, and in going away, a certain warden of a college, of whose name I am not sure, advised Dr. Ridley to repent and forsake that erroneous opinion. Whereunto Dr. Ridley said, Sir, repent you, for you are out of the truth: and, I pray God (if it be his blessing will) have mercy upon you, and grant you the understanding of his word. Then the warden, being in a passion thereat, said, I trust that I shall never be of your erroneous and devilish opinion, either yet to be in that place whither you shall go. He is, saith he, the most obstinate and wilful man that I ever heard talk since I was born.

The BEHAVIOUR of Dr. RIDLEY at his SUPPER the Night before his Suffering.

THE night before he suffered, his beard was washed and his legs; and as he sat at supper, the same night, at the house of Mr. Irish, (who was his keeper) he asked his hostess, and the rest at the table, to-morrow marriage: for, said he, to-morrow I must be married, and so shewed himself to be as merry as ever he was any time before. And wishing his sister at his marriage, he asked his brother, sitting at the table, whether she could find in her heart to be there or no: and he answered, Yea, I dare say, with all her heart. At which word he said, He was glad to hear of her so much therein. At this discourse Mrs. Irish wept.

But Dr. Ridley comforted her, and said, O Mrs. Irish, you love me not now, I see well enough; for in that you weep, it doth appear you will not be at my marriage, neither are content therewith. Indeed you be not so much my friend as I thought you had been. But quiet yourself, though my breakfast shall be somewhat sharp and painful, yet I am sure my supper shall be more pleasant and sweet.

When they arose from the table, his brother offered to stay all night with him. But he said, No, no, that you shall not. For I intend (God willing) to go to bed, and to sleep as quietly to night, as ever I did in my life. So his brother departed, exhorting him to be of good cheer, and to take his cross quietly, for the reward was great, &c.

The BEHAVIOUR of Dr. RIDLEY and Mr. LATIMER, at the TIME of their DEATH; October 16, 1555.

UPON the north side of the town, in the ditch over-against Baliol-college, the place of execution was appointed: and for fear of any tumult that might arise to hinder the burning of them, the lord Williams was commanded by the queen's letters, and the householders of the city to be there assistant, sufficiently appointed; and when every thing was in readiness, the prisoners were brought forth by the mayor and bailiffs.

Dr. Ridley had a fair black gown furred, and faced with fairs, such as he was wont to wear being bishop, and a tippet of velvet furred likewise about his neck, a velvet night-cap upon his head, and a corner-cap upon the same, going in a pair of slippers to the stake, and going between the mayor and an alderman, &c.

After him came Mr. Latimer in a poor Bristow freeze frock much worn, with his buttoned cap and kerchief on his head, all ready to the fire, a new long shroud hanging over his hose down to the feet: which at the first sight stirred men's hearts to pity them, beholding on the one side the honour they sometime had, and on the other the calamity whereunto they were fallen.

Dr. Ridley, as he passed toward Bocardo, looked up where Dr. Cranmer lay, hoping belike to have seen him.

and LATIMER, who were burnt together in one Fire, at Oxford.*

at the glafs window, and to have spoke unto him. Dr. Cranmer was then bufy with friar Soto and his fcholars difputing together, fo that he could not fee him though that occafion. Then Dr. Ridley looking back, faw Mr. Latimer coming after. Unto whom he faid, Be you there? Yea, faid Mr. Latimer, have after me, as I can follow. So he following a pretty way off, at length they came to the ftake, the one after the other, where firft Dr. Ridley entering the place, marvelloufly and devoutly holding up both his hands, looked towards heaven: then fhortly after feeing Mr. Latimer with a cheerful look he ran to him, embraced and comforted him, and as they that ftood near reported, comforted him, faying, Be of good heart, brother, for God will either alluage the fury of the flame, or elfe lengthen us to abide it.

With that he went to the ftake, kneeled down by it, and earnestly prayed, and behind him Mr. Latimer kneeling, as earnestly calling upon God as he. After prayer, the one talked with the other a little while, and thofe who were appointed to fee the execution removed themfelves out of the fun. What they faid I can learn of no man.

Then Dr. Smith began his fermen to them upon this text of St. Paul, in the 13th chapter of the firft epiftle to the Corinthians: "If I yield my body to the fire to be burnt, and have not charity, I fhall gain nothing thereby." Wherein he alledged, that the goodnefs of the life, and not the order of death, maketh the holinefs of the perfon: which he confirmed by the examples of Adam, and of a woman in Oxford that of late hanged herfelf, for that they and fuch like as he recited, might be adjudged righteous, which desperately separated their lives from their bodies, as he feared that thofe that ftood before him would do. But he cried ftill to the people to beware of them, for they were heretics, and died out of the church. And on the other fide, he declared their diverfities in opinions, as Lutherans, Oecampadians, Zuinglians, of which feft they were he was, and that was the worft: but the old church of Chrift, and the catholic faith, believed far otherwife. At which place they lifted up both their hands and eyes to heaven, as it were calling God to witnefs of the truth. Which countenance they made in many other places of his fermen, where they thought he fpake amifs. He ended with a very fhort exhortation to them to repent and come home again to the church, and fave their fouls and fouls, which elfe were condemned. His fermen was fcarce in all a quarter of an hour.

Dr. Ridley faid to Mr. Latimer, Will you begin to deliver the fermen, or fhall I? Mr. Latimer faid, Be you firft, I pray you. I will, faid Dr. Ridley.

Then the wicked fermen being ended, Dr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer kneeled down on their knees to my lord Williams of Tame, the vice-chancellor of Oxford, and divers other commissioners appointed for that purpose, who fat upon a form thereby. Unto whom Dr. Ridley faid, I befeech you, my lord, even for Chrift's fake, that I may fpeak but two or three words: and fhall my lord bent his head to the mayor and vice-chancellor, to know (as it appeared) whether he might be leave to fpeak, the bailiffs, and Dr. Marfhall, the vice-chancellor, ran haftily unto him, and with their hands ftopped his mouth, and faid, Mr. Ridley, if you will revoke your erroneous opinions, and recant the fame, you fhall not only have liberty fo to do, but alfo the benefit of a fubject, that is, have your life. Not otherwife? faid Dr. Ridley. No, quoth Dr. Marfhall: therefore if you will not do fo, then there is no remedy but you muft fuffer for your deferts. Well, fays Dr. Ridley, fo long as the breath is in my body, I will never deny my Lord Chrift, and his known truth: and fo fhall be done in me. And with that he rofe up, and faid with a loud voice, Well then I commit our caufe to Almighty God, who will indifferently judge all.

To which Mr. Latimer added his old pofey, Well, there is nothing hid but it fhall be opened: and he faid he could anfwer Smith well enough, if he might be fuffered. Incontinently they were commanded to make No. 30.

themselves ready, which they with all meeknefs obeyed. Dr. Ridley took his gown and his tippet, and gave it to his brother-in-law Mr. Shipfide, who all the time of his imprifonment, although he might not be fuffered to come to him, lay there at his own charges to provide him neceffaries, which from time to time he fent him by the ferjeant that kept him. Some other of his apparel that was little worth he gave away, the others the bailiffs took away.

He gave away divers other fmall things to gentlemen ftanding by, and divers of them pitifully weeping; to Sir Henry Lea he gave a new groat, and to divers of my lord Williams's gentlemen, fome napkins, fome nutmegs, and races of ginger, his dial, and fuch other things as he had about him, to every one that ftood next him. Some plucked the points off his hofe. Happy was he that might get any rag of him.

Mr. Latimer gave nothing, but very quietly fuffered his keeper to pull off his hofe, and his other array which to look unto was very fimple; and being stripped into his fhroud, he feemed as comely a perfon to them that were there prefent, as one could well fee; and whereas in his cloaths he appeared a withered and filly old man, he now ftood bolt upright, as comely a father as one might behold.

Then Dr. Ridley ftanding as yet in his trufs, faid to his brother, It were beft for me to go in my trufs ftill. No, fays his brother, it will put you to more pain: and the trufs will do a poor man good. Whereunto Dr. Ridley faid, Be it in the name of God, and fo unlaced himfelf. Then being in his fhirt, he ftood upon the aforefaid ftone, and held up his hand and faid, O heavenly Father, I give unto thee moft hearty thanks, for that thou haft called me to be a profeflor of thee, even unto death; I befeech thee, Lord God, have mercy on this realm of England, and deliver the fame from all her enemies.

Then the smith took a chain of iron, and brought the fame about both their middles: and as he was knocking in the ftaple, Dr. Ridley took the chain in his hand and fhaked it, for it did gird in his belly; and looking afide to the smith, faid, Good fellow, knock it in hard, for the flefh will have it's courfe. Then his brother brought him a bag of gunpowder, and tied it about his neck. Dr. Ridley asked him what it was, his brother faid gunpowder. Then, faid he, I will take it to be fent of God, therefore I will receive it as fent from him. And have you any, faid he, for my brother? (meaning Mr. Latimer.) Yea, fir, that I have, fays his brother. Then give it unto him, faid he, betime, left you come too late. So his brother went and carried fome gunpowder to Mr. Latimer.

In the mean time Dr. Ridley fpake unto my lord Williams, and faid, My lord, I muft be a fuitour unto your lordfhip in the behalf of divers poor men, and efpecially in the caufe of my poor fifter: I have made a fupplication to the queen's majesty in their behalf. I befeech your lordfhip, for Chrift's fake, to be a mean to her grace for them. My brother here hath the fupplication, and will refort to your lordfhip to certify you hereof. There is nothing in all the world that troubleth my confcience, (I praife God) this only excepted. Whilft I was in the fee of London, divers poor men took leafes of me, and agreed with me for the fame. Now I hear fay the bifhop that now occupieth the fame room, will not allow my grants to them made, but contrary to all law and confcience, hath taken from them their livings, and will not fuffer them to enjoy the fame. I befeech you, my lord, be a means for them: you fhall do a good deed, and God will reward you.

Then they brought a lighted faggot, and laid it at Dr. Ridley's feet. Thereupon Mr. Latimer faid, Be of good comfort, Mr. Ridley, and play the man, we fhall this day light fuch a candle by God's grace in England, as I truft never fhall be put out. When Dr. Ridley faw the fire flaming up towards him, he cried with a wonderful loud voice, Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my fpirit: Lord, receive my fpirit; and after repeated this often, Lord, Lord, receive my fpirit. Mr. Latimer cried as vehemently on the other fide, O Father of heaven receive my soul: who received the flame as it were embracing of it. After he had stroked his face with his hands, and as it were bathed them a little in the fire, he soon died, (as it appeareth) with very little or no pain. And thus much concerning this old and faithful servant of God, Bp. Latimer, for whose laborious travels, fruitful life, and constant death, the whole realm hath cause to give thanks to Almighty God.

But Dr. Ridley, by the ill making of the fire, the faggots being green, and built too high about the goss, so that the fire being kept down by the green wood, burned fiercely beneath, which put him to such exquisite pain, that he desired them for God's sake to let the fire come unto him; which his brother-in-law heard, but not well understood, intending to rid him out of his pain, (for which cause he gave attendance) as one in such sorrow, not well advised what he did, heaped faggots upon him, so that he clean covered him, which made the fire more vehement beneath, that it burned clean all his nether parts, before it touched the upper, and that made him leap up and down under the faggots, and often desire them to let the fire come to him, saying, I cannot burn. Which indeed plainly appeared: for after his legs were consumed by reason of his struggling through the pain, (whereof he had no release, but only the comfort he had from God) he shewed that side towards us clean, flint and all untouched with flame. Yet in all his torment he forgot not to call upon God still, having in his mouth, Lord have mercy upon me, intermingling his cry, Let the fire come unto me, I cannot burn. In which pains he laboured till one of the standers by, with his bill, pulled off the faggots above, and where he saw the fire flame up, he wrested himself to that side. And when the fire touched the gunpowder, he was seen to stir no more, but burned on the other side, falling down at Mr. Latimer's feet: which some said, happened by reason that the chain loosed, others said, that he fell over the chain, by reason of the poise of his body, and the weakness of the nether limbs.

Some said that before he was like to fall from the stake, he desired them to hold him to it with their bills. However, surely it moved hundreds to tears in beholding the horrible sight. For I think there were none that had not clean banished all humanity and mercy which would not have lamented to behold the fury of the fire so to rage upon their bodies. Signs there were of sorrow on every side. Some took it grievously to see their deaths, whose lives they held full dear. Some pitied their persons, that thought their souls had no need thereof. His brother moved many men, seeing his miserable case, seeing him (I say) compelled to such infelicity, that he thought then to do him best service when he hastened his end. Some cried out of the luck, to see his endeavour, who most dearly loved him, and sought his release, turn to his greater vexation, and increase of pain. But who so considered their preferments in time past, the places of honour that they sometimes occupied in this commonwealth, the favour they were in with their princes, and the opinion of learning they had, could not chuse but grieve with tears, to see so great dignity, honour, and estimation, so necessary members some time accounted, so many godly virtues, the study of so many years, such excellent learning, to be put into the fire, and consumed in one moment. Well, dead they are, and the reward of this world they have already. What reward remaineth for them in heaven, the day of God's glory, when he cometh with his saints, shall shortly declare.

A L E T T E R

Written by Dr. RIDLEY, being his last FAREWEL, to all his true and faithful FRIENDS in GOD, with a sharp ADMONITION withal to the PAPISTS.

AT the name of Jesus let every knee bow, both of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, and let every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is the Lord, unto the glory of God the Father, Amen.

As a man intending to take a far journey, and to depart from his familiar friends, commonly and naturally hath a desire to bid his friends farewell before his departure; so likewise now I, looking daily when I should be called to depart hence from you, (O all ye my dearly beloved brethren and sisters in our Saviour Christ that dwell here in this world) having a like mind towards you all, to bid you all, my dear brethren and sisters (I say in Christ) that dwell upon the earth, after such manner as I can, farewell.

Farewel, my dear brother George Shipside, whom I have ever found faithful, trusty, and loving in all states and conditions, and now in the time of my cross over all others to me most friendly and steadfast, and that which pleased me best over all other things, in God's cause ever hearty.

Farewel, my dear sister Alice his wife, I am glad to hear of thee, that thou dost take Christ's cross, which is laid now (blessed be God) both on thy back and mind in good part. Thank thou God that hath given thee a godly and loving husband: see thou honour him as thou obey him, according to God's law. Honour thy mother-in-law, his mother, and love all those that pertain unto him, being ready to do them good as it shall like thy power. As for thy children, I doubt not of thy husband, but that he who hath given him an heart to love and fear God, and in God them that pertain unto him, shall also make him friendly and beneficial unto his children, even as if they had been begotten of his body.

Farewel, my dearly beloved brother, John Ridley, the Waltoun, and you my gentle and loving sister Elizabeth: who besides the natural league of amity and your tender love, which you were said ever to bear towards me above the rest of your brethren, doth bind me to love. My mind was to have acknowledged your loving affection, and to have acquitted with deeds and not with words alone. Your daughter Elizabeth I bid farewell, whom I love for the meek and gentle spirit that God hath given her, which is a precious thing in the sight of God.

Farewel, my beloved sister dwelling at Unthorpe with all your children, nephews and nieces. Since the departing of my brother Hugh, my mind was to have been unto them instead of their father, but the Lord God must and will be their father, if they would love and fear him, and live according to his law.

Farewel, my well beloved and worshipful cousins Nicholas Ridley, of Willimountswike, and your wife and I thank you for all your kindness both shewed unto me, and also to all your own kinsfolk and mine. Go you, as God hath set you in our stock and kindred (not for any respect of your person, but of his abundance of grace and goodness) to be as it were the bell-weather in order and conduct the rest, and hath also endued you with his manifold gifts of grace both heavenly and worldly above others; so I pray you, good cousin, (in my trust and hope is in you) continue and increase the maintenance of the truth, honesty, righteousness and all true godliness, and to the uttermost of your power to withstand falsehood, untruth, unrighteousness and all ungodliness which is forbidden and condemned by the word and laws of God.

Farewel, my young cousin, Ralph Whitfield. Of your time was very short with me. My mind was to have done you good, and yet you caught in that little time a loss, but I trust it shall be recompensed as it please Almighty God.

Farewel all my whole kindred and countrymen farewell in Christ altogether. The Lord, who is the searcher of secrets, knoweth that according to my heart's desire, my hope was of late that I should have come among you, and to have brought with me abundance of Christ's blessed gospel, according to the duty of my office and ministry, whereunto among you I was chosen, named and appointed by the mouth of that late peerless prince, king Edward, and so denounced openly in court, by his privy council.

I warn you all, my beloved kinsfolk and countrymen that you be not amazed or astonished at the kind of my departure or dissolution; for I assure you I think it great greatest honour that ever I was called to in all my life: and therefore I heartily thank my Lord God for it, that hath pleased him to call me of his great mercy unto his high honour, to suffer death willingly for his cause and for his sake; unto which honour he hath called the holy prophets, and dearly beloved apostles, and his blessed chosen martyrs. For know you that I doubt not more, that the causes for which I am put to death are God's causes, and the causes of the truth, than I doubt at the gospel which John wrote is the gospel of Christ, that Paul's epistles are the very word of God. And I have a heart willing to abide, and stand in God's cause, and in Christ's quarrel even unto death, I assure thee, (O man) it is an inestimable and an honourable gift of God, given only to the true elect, and dearly beloved children of God and inheritors of the kingdom of heaven. For the holy apostle and also martyr in Christ's cause, St. Peter, saith, If ye suffer rebuke in the name of Christ, that is, in Christ's cause, and for his truth's sake, then are ye happy and blessed, for the glory of the spirit of God resteth upon you. If for rebuke's sake suffered in Christ's name, a man is pronounced, by the mouth of that apostle, blessed and happy, how much more happy and blessed is he that hath the grace to suffer death also? Wherefore all you that be my true lovers and friends, rejoice, and rejoice with me again, and tender with me hearty thanks to God our heavenly Father, that for his Son's sake my Saviour and Redeemer Christ, he hath vouchsafed to call me, being else without his gracious goodness, in myself but a sinful and vile wretch, to call me, I say, unto this high dignity of his true prophets, of his faithful apostles, and of his holy elect and chosen martyrs, that is, to die, and not to spend this temporal life in the defence and maintenance of his eternal and everlasting truth.

You know that be my countrymen dwelling upon the borders, where (alas) the true man suffereth oftentimes much wrong at the thief's hand, if it chance a man to be slain by a thief (as it often doth there) which went out with his neighbour to help him to recover his goods again, that the more cruelly he be slain, and the more steadfastly he stuck by his neighbour in the fight against the faith of the thief, the more favour and friendship shall all his posterity have for the slain man's sake, of all them that be true, as long as the memory of this fact, and his posterity doth endure: even so you that be my kinsfolk and countrymen, know ye (howsoever the blind, ignorant, wicked world hereafter shall rail upon my death, which thing they cannot do worse than their fathers did, of the death of Christ our Saviour, of his holy prophets, apostles, and martyrs:) know ye, I say, that both before God, and all them that be godly, and that truly know and follow the laws of God, ye have, and shall have by God's grace, ever cause to rejoice, and to thank God highly, and to think good of it, and in God rejoice with me your flesh and blood, whom God of his goodness hath vouchsafed to associate unto the blessed company of his holy martyrs in heaven: and I doubt not in the infinite goodness of my Lord God, nor in the faithful fellowship of his elect and chosen people, but at both their hands in my cause, ye shall rather find the more favour and grace: for the Lord saith, that he will be both to them and their's that love him, the more loving again in a thousand generations: the Lord is so full of mercy to them, I say, and their's who do love him indeed. And Christ saith again, that no man can shew more love than to give his life for his friend.

Now also know ye, all my true lovers in God, my kinsfolk and countrymen, that the cause for which I am put to death, is even after the same sort and condition, but touching more near God's cause, and more weighty matters, but in the general kind all one: for both is God's cause, both is in the maintenance of right, and both for the common-wealth, and both for the weal also of the christian brother, although yet there is in these two no small difference, both concerning the enemies, the goods stolen, and the manner of the fight. For know ye all, that like as there when the poor man is robbed by the thief of his goods truly gotten (whereupon he and his household should live) he is greatly wronged, and the thief in stealing and robbing with violence the poor man's goods, doth offend God, doth transgress his law, and is injurious both to the poor man, and to the common-wealth; so I say, know ye that even here in the cause of my death, it is with the church of England, I mean the congregation of the true chosen children of God in this realm of England, which I acknowledge not only to be my neighbours, but rather the congregation of my spiritual brethren and sisters in Christ, yea, members of one body, wherein by God's grace I am and have been grafted in Christ. This church of England hath of late, of the infinite goodness and abundant grace of Almighty God, great substance, great riches of heavenly treasure, great plenty of God's true sincere word, the true and wholesome administration of Christ's holy sacraments, the whole profession of Christ's religion truly and plainly set forth in baptism, the plain declaration and understanding of the same, taught in the holy catechism, you have been learned of all true christians.

The church had also a true and sincere form and manner of the Lord's supper, wherein, according to Jesus Christ's own ordinance and holy institution, Christ's commandments were executed and done. For upon the bread and wine set upon the Lord's table, thanks were given, the commemoration of the Lord's death was had; the bread in remembrance of Christ's body torn upon the cross, was broken, and the cup in the remembrance of Christ's blood shed, was distributed, and both communicated unto all that were present and would receive them, and also they were exhorted of the minister so to do.

All was done openly in the vulgar tongue, so that every thing might be most easily heard, and plainly understood by all the people, to God's high glory, and the edification of the whole church. This church had of late the whole divine services, all common and public prayers ordained to be said and heard in the common congregation, not only framed and fashioned to the true vein of holy scripture, but also set forth according to the commandment of the Lord, and St. Paul's doctrine, for the people's edification, in their vulgar tongue.

It had also holy and wholesome homilies in commendation of the principal virtues, which are commended in scripture; and likewise other homilies against the most pernicious and capital vices that used (alas) to reign in this realm of England. This church had in matters of controversy, articles so penned and framed after the holy scriptures, and grounded upon the true understanding of God's word, that in short time if they had been universally received, they should have been able to have set in Christ's true religion, and to have expelled many false errors and heresies, wherewith this church, alas, was almost overgone.

But alas, of late into this spiritual possession of the heavenly treasure of these godly riches, are entered in thieves, that have robbed and spoiled all this treasure away. I may well complain of these things, and cry out upon them with the prophet, saying, "O Lord God, the Gentiles, heathen nations, are come into thy heritage: they have defiled thy holy temple, and made Jerusalem a heap of stones, that is, they have broken and beaten down to the ground thy holy city." This heathenish generation, these thieves of Samaria, these Sabæi and Chaldæi, these robbers have rushed out of their dens, and have robbed the church of England of all the aforesaid holy treasure of God; they have carried it away and overthrown it, and instead of God's holy word, the true and right administration of Christ's holy sacraments, as of baptism and others, they mixt their ministry with man's foolish fancies, and many wicked and ungodly traditions.

Instead of the Lord's holy table, they give the people with much solemn disguising a thing which they call their mass, but in deed and in truth, it is a very masking and mockery of the true supper of the Lord; or rather rather I may call it a crafty juggling, whereby these false thieves and jugglers have bewitched the minds of the simple people, that they have brought them from the true worship of God unto pernicious idolatry, and make them to believe that to be Christ our Lord and Saviour, which indeed is neither God nor man, nor hath any life in itself, but in substances is the creature of bread and wine, and in use of the Lord's table is the sacrament of Christ's body and blood: and for this holy use, for which the Lord hath ordained them in his table, to represent unto us his blessed body torn upon the cross for us, and his blood there shed, it pleased him to call them his body and blood: which understanding Christ declareth to be his true meaning, when he saith, Do this in remembrance of me. And again, St. Paul likewise doth set out the same more plainly, speaking of the same sacrament, after the words of consecration, saying, As often as ye shall eat of this bread and drink of this cup, ye shall set forth (he meaneth with the same) the Lord's death until his coming again. And here again these thieves have also robbed the people of the Lord's cup, contrary to the plain words of Christ written in his gospel.

Now for the common public prayers which were in the vulgar tongue, these thieves have brought in again a strange tongue, whereof the people understand not one word. Wherein what do they else, but rob the people of their divine service, wherein they ought to pray together with the minister? And to pray in a strange tongue, what is it but (as St. Paul calleth it) barbarousness, childishness, unprofitable folly, yea, and plain madness.

For the godly articles of unity in religion, and for the wholesome homilies, what do these thieves place in the stead of them, but the pope's laws and decrees, lying legends, feigned fables, and miracles to delude and abuse the simplicity of the rude people? Thus this robbery and theft is not only committed, nay, sacrilege, and wicked spoil of heavenly things, but also in the stead of the same, is brought in and placed the abominable desolation of the tyrant Antiochus, of proud Sennacherib, of the shameless faced king, and of the Babylonian beast. Unto this robbery, this theft and sacrilege, for that I cannot consent, nor (God willing) ever shall so long as the breath is in my body, because it is blasphemy against God, high treason against Christ our heavenly King, Lord, Master, and our only Saviour and Redeemer, it is plainly contrary to God's word, and to Christ's gospel; it is the subversion of all true godliness, and against the salvation of mine own soul, and of all my brethren and sisters, whom Christ my Saviour hath so dearly bought, with no less price than with the effusion and shedding forth of his most precious blood. Therefore all you my true lovers in God, kinsfolk and countrymen, for this cause, I say, know ye that I am put to death, which by God's grace I shall willingly take, with hearty thanks to God therefore, in certain hope without any doubting, to receive at God's hands again, of his mercy and grace, everlasting life.

Although the cause of the true man slain of the thief, helping his neighbour to recover his goods again, and the cause for which I am to be put to death, in a generality is both one (as I said before); yet know ye that there is no small difference. These thieves against whom I do stand, are much worse than the robbers and thieves of the borders. The goods which they steal are much more precious, and their kinds of fight are far different. These thieves are worse (I say) for they are cruel, more wicked, more false, more deceitful, and crafty: for those will but kill the body, but these will kill both body and soul. Those, for the general theft and robbery, be called, and are indeed, thieves and robbers; but these for their spiritual kind of robbery, are called Sacrilegi, as you would say, Church-robbers. They are more wicked: for those go about to spoil men of worldly things, worldly riches, gold and silver, and worldly substance; these go about in the ways of the devil their spiritual father, to steal from the universal church, and particularly from every man, all heavenly treasure, true faith, true charity, and hope of salvation in the blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ, yea, to spoil us of our Saviour Jesus Christ, of his gospel, of his heavenly Spirit, and of the heavenly heritage of the kingdom of heaven, so dearly purchased unto us, with the death of our Master and Saviour Christ. These are the goods and godly substance whereupon the Christian before God must live, and without which he cannot live these goods, I say, these thieves, the church-robbers go about to spoil us of. Which goods, as to the man of God they excel and surpass all worldly treasure; to withstand, even unto death, such thieves as go about to spoil both us and the whole church of such goods, is most high and honourable service done to God.

These church-robbers be also much more false, crafty and deceitful, than the thieves upon the borders; for these have not the craft so to commend their theft, that they dare avouch it, and therefore as acknowledging themselves to be evil, they steal commonly in the night; they dare not appear in judgments and sessions, where justice is executed, and when they are taken and brought thither, they never hang any man, but they be often times hanged for their faults. But these church-robbers can so cloak and colour their spiritual robbery, that they can make people to believe falsehood to be truth, and truth falsehood; good to be evil, and evil good; light to be darkness, and darkness light; superstition to be true religion, and idolatry to be the true worship of God; and that which is in substance a creature of bread and wine, to be no other substance but only the substance of Christ the living Lord, both God and man. And with this their falsehood and craft they can so juggle and bewitch the understanding of the simple, that they dare avouch it openly in court and in town, and fear neither hanging nor heading, as the poor thieves of the borders do; but stout and strong like Nembroth, dare condemn to be burned in flaming fire, quick and alive, whosoever will go about to bewray their falsehood.

The kind of fight against these church-robbers is also of another sort and kind, than that is which is against the thieves of the borders. For there the true men go forth against them with spear and lance, with bow and bill, and all such kind of bodily weapons as the true men have: but here as the enemies be of another nature, so the watchmen of Christ's flock, the warriors that fight in the Lord's war, must be armed, and fight with another kind of weapons and armour. For here the enemies of God, the soldiers of Antichrist, although the battle is set forth against the church by mortal men, being flesh and blood, and nevertheless members of their father the devil, yet for that their grand master is the power of darkness, their members are spiritual wickedness, wicked spirits, spirits of errors, of heresies, of all deceit and ungodliness, spirits of idolatry, superstition and hypocrisy, which are called by St. Paul, principalities and powers, lords of the world, rulers of the darkness of this world, and spiritual subtilties concerning heavenly things; therefore our weapons must be fit and meet to fight against such, not carnal nor bodily weapons, as spear and lance, but spiritual and heavenly: we must fight against such with the armour of God, not intending to kill their bodies, but their errors, their false craft and heresies, their idolatry, superstition, and hypocrisy, and to save (as much as lieth in us) both their bodies and their souls.

And therefore, as St. Paul teacheth us, "We fight not against flesh and blood," that is, we fight not with bodily weapons to kill the man, but with the weapons of God to put to flight his wicked errors and vice, and to save both body and soul. Our weapons therefore are faith, hope, charity, righteousness, truth, patience, prayer unto God; and our sword wherewith we smite our enemies, beat and batter and bear down all falsehood, is the Word of God. With these weapons, under the banner of the cross of Christ, we do fight, ever having our eye upon our grand master and captain, Christ; and then we reckon ourselves to triumph and to win the crown of everlasting bliss, when enduring in this battle without any shrinking or yielding to the enemies, after the example of our grand captain Christ, our master, after the example of his holy prophets, apostles, and martyrs, when (I say) we are slain in our mortal bodies by enemies, and are most cruelly and without all mercy ordered down like a flock of sheep. And the more I am, the more painful, the more vile and spiteful the death is whereunto we be put, the more glorious God, the more blessed and happy we reckon (without doubts) our martyrdom to be.

And thus much, dear lovers and friends in God, my countrymen and kinsfolk, I have spoke for your comfort, lest at my death ye might be abashed, or think evil: whereas ye have rather cause to rejoice (if I love me indeed) that it hath pleased God to call me to greater honour and dignity, than ever I did enjoy before, either in Rochester, or in the see of London, or ever should have had in the see of Durham, whereunto I was last of all elected and named: yea, I think it greater honour before God indeed to die in his service (whereof I nothing doubt) than is any earthly or temporal promotion or honour that can be given to a man in this world. And who is he that knoweth the will of God, to be Christ's quarrel, and of his people, to be the common weal of all the elect and children of God, of all the inheritors of the kingdom of heaven; who is he (I say) that knoweth this more truly by God's word, and the testimony of his own conscience (as I through the infinite goodness of God, of myself, but by his grace acknowledge myself to be) who is he, I say, that knoweth this and both loveth and feareth God in deed and in truth, loveth and becometh his master Christ, and his blessed gospel; loveth brotherhood, the chosen children of God, and also loveth and longeth for everlasting life: who is he, I say again, that would not or cannot find in his heart in his cause to be content to die? The Lord forbid that such should be that should forsake this grace of God. I trust in my Lord God, the God of mercies, our Father of all comfort through Jesus Christ our Lord, that he which hath put this mind, will, and affection by his Holy Spirit in my heart, to stand against the will of the enemy in his cause, and to chuse rather the loss of all my worldly substance, yea, and of my life too, than to deny his known truth: that he will comfort me, strengthen me, and strengthen me evermore even unto the end, and to the yielding up of my spirit and soul into his holy hands, whereof I most heartily beseech his most sacred Majesty of his infinite goodness and mercy, through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

Now that I have taken leave of my countrymen and kinsfolk, and the Lord doth lend me life, and giveth me leisure, I will bid my other good friends in God of other places also, farewell. And whom first or before, than the university of Cambridge, where I have dwelt longer, found more faithful and hearty friends, received more benefits (the benefits of my natural parents only excepted) than ever I did even in mine own country wherein I was born.

Farewel therefore (Cambridge) my loving mother and tender nurse. If I should not acknowledge thy manifold benefits, yea, if I should not for thy benefits least love thee again, truly I were to be accounted an ungrateful and unkind. What benefits hadst thou ever, that thou usedst to give and bestow upon thy best beloved children, that thou thoughtest too good for me? Thou didst bestow on me all thy school-degrees, the common offices, the chaplainship of the university, the office of the proctorship, and of a common reader; and of thy private advantages and emoluments in colleges, what was it that thou madest me not partner of? First to be a scholar, then to be a fellow, and after my departure from thee, thou calledst me again to a mastership of a right worshipful college. I thank thee, my loving mother, for all thy kindness, and I pray God that his laws, and the sincere gospel of Christ may ever be truly taught and faithfully learned in thee.

Farewel, Pembroke Hall, of late mine own college, my cure, and my charge: what case thou art in now God knoweth, I know not well. Thou wast ever named since I knew thee, which is not thirty years ago, to be studious, well learned, and a greater promoter of gospel, and of God's true word; so I found thee, and blessed be God, so I left thee indeed. Woe is me for thee mine own dear college, if ever thou suffer thyself by any means to be brought from that trade. In thy orchard (the walls, butts, and trees, if they could speak, would bear me witness) I learned without book almost all St. Paul's epistles, yea, and I think all the canonical epistles, save only the Apocalypse. Of which study, although in time a great part did depart from me, yet the sweet smell thereof I trust I shall carry with me into heaven: for the profit thereof I think I have felt in all my life-time ever after, and I think of late (whether they abide now or no, I cannot tell) there were others that did the like. The Lord grant that this zeal and love toward that part of God's word, which is a key and true commentary to all the holy scripture, may ever abide in that college so long as the world shall endure.

From Cambridge I was called into Kent by the archbishop of Canterbury, Thomas Cranmer, that most reverend father, and of him preferred to be vicar of Herne, in East Kent. Wherefore, farewell, Herne, thou worshipful and wealthy parish, the first cure whereunto I was called to preach God's word. Thou hast heard of my mouth oftentimes the word of God preached, not after the popish trade, but after Christ's gospel: O that the fruit had answered to the seed. And yet I must acknowledge me to be thy debtor for the doctrine of the Lord's supper, which at that time I acknowledge God had not revealed unto me: but I bless God, in all that godly virtue and zeal of God's word, which the Lord by preaching of his word did kindle manifestly both in the heart and in the life and works of that godly woman there, lady Phines; the Lord grant that his word took like effect there in many others.

Farewel, thou cathedral church of Canterbury, the metropolitic see, whereof I once was a member. To speak things pleasant unto thee I dare not for danger of conscience, and displeasure of my Lord God, and to say what lieth in my heart were now too much, and I fear were able to do thee now but little good. Nevertheless, for the friendship I have found in some there, and for charity's sake, I wish thee to be washed clean of all worldliness and ungodliness, that thou mayest be found of God after thy name Christ's church, in deed and in truth.

Farewel, Rochester, some time my cathedral see, in whom (to say the truth) I did find much gentleness and obedience; and I trust thou wilt not say the contrary, but I did use it to God's glory, and unto thine own profit in God. O that thou hadst and mightest have continued and gone forward in the trade of God's law wherein I did leave thee; then thy charge and burden should not have been so terrible and dangerous, as I suppose verily it is like to be (alas) in the latter day.

To Westminster other advertisement in God I have not now to say, than I have said before to the cathedral church of Canterbury, and so God give thee of his grace, that thou mayest learn in deed and in truth to please him after his own laws: and thus fare you well.

O London, London, to whom now may I speak in thee, or whom shall I bid farewell? Shall I speak to the prebendaries of St Paul's? Alas, all that loved God's word, and were the true setters-forth thereof, are now, (as I hear say) some burnt and slain, some exiled and banished, and some confined in hard prison, and appointed to be put to the most cruel death for Christ's gospel sake. As for the rest of them, I know they could never brook me well, nor could I ever delight in them.

Shall I speak to the see thereof, wherein of late I was placed almost, and not fully the space of three years? But what may I say to it, being (as I hear say I am) deposed and expelled by judgment as an unjust usurper of that room. O judgment, judgment! Can this be just judgment to condemn the chief minister of God's word, the pastor and bishop of the diocese, and never bring him into judgment that he might have heard what crimes were laid to his charge, nor even suffer him to have any place or time to answer for himself? Thinkest thou hereafter, when true justice shall have place, this judgment can ever be allowed either of God or man? Well, as for the cause or whole matter of my deposition, and the spoil of my goods which thou possessest yet, I refer it unto God, who is a just judge; and I beseech God, if it be his pleasure, that that which is but my personal wrong, be not laid to thy charge in the latter day, this only I can pray for.

O thou now wicked and bloody see, why dost thou set up again many altars of idolatry, which by the word of God were justly taken away? Why dost thou daily delude thy people, masking in thy masses instead of the Lord's holy supper, which ought to be common as well (saith Chrysostom, yea, the Lord himself) to the people as to the priest? How darest thou deny to the people of Christ, contrary to his express commandment in the gospel, his holy cup? Why babblest thou to the people the Common-prayer in a strange tongue, wherein St. Paul commandeth in the Lord's name, that no man should speak before the congregation, except it should be presently declared in their common tongue, that all might be edified? Nay, hearken, thou whorish bawd of Babylon, thou wicked limb of Antichrist, thou bloody wolf, why slayest thou down, and makest havoc of the prophets of God? Why murderest thou so cruelly Christ's poor silly sheep, which will not hear thy voice, because thou art a stranger, and will follow no other but their own pastor Christ's voice? Thinkest thou to escape, or that the Lord will not require their blood at thy hands? Thy God, which is the work of thy hands, and whom thou sayest thou hast power to make, that thy deaf and dumb god, I say, will not indeed, nor can, (although thou art not ashamed to call him thy Maker) make thee to escape the revenging hand of the high and Almighty God. But be thou assured, that the living Lord our Saviour and Redeemer, who sitteth on the right hand of his Father in glory, he seeth all thy wicked ways and cruelty done to his dear members, and he will not forget his holy ones, and his hands (O thou whorish drab) shalt thou never escape. Instead of my farewell to thee, now I say, Fie upon thee, fie upon thee, filthy drab, and all thy false prophets.

Yet (O London) I may not leave thee thus. Although thy episcopal see, now being joined in league with the seat of Satan, thus hath now both handled me and the saints of God, yet I do not doubt, but in that great city there be many private mourners, who do daily mourn for that mischief, who never did nor shall consent to that wickedness, but do detest and abhor it as the ways of Satan. But these privy mourners here I will pass by, and bid them farewell with their fellows hereafter, when place and occasion shall more conveniently require. Among the worshipful of the city, and especially which were in office of mayoralty, yea, and in other cities also (whom now to name is not necessary) in the time of my ministry, which was from the latter part of sir Rowland Hill's year, unto sir George Barnes's year, and a great part thereof, I do acknowledge that I found no small humanity and gentleness, as I thought: but to (say the truth) that I do esteem above all other for true christian kindness, which is shewed in God's cause, and done for his sake. Wherefore, O Dobs, Dobs, alderman and knight, thou in thy year didst win my heart for evermore, for that honourable act, that most blessed work of God, of the erection and setting up of Christ's holy hospitals, and truly religious houses, which by thee and through thee were begun. For thou, like a man of God, when the matter was moved for the relief of Christ's poor silly members to be holpen from extreme misery, hunger, and famine, thy heart, I say, was moved with pity, and as Christ's high honourable officer in that cause, yea, and not only in thine own person thou didst set forth Christ's cause, but to further the matter, thou broughtest me into the council-chamber of the city before the aldermen alone, whom thou hadst assembled there together to hear me speak what I could say, as an advocate by office and duty, in the poor men's cause. The Lord wrought with thee, and gave thee the consent of thy brethren; whereby the matter was brought to the common council, and so to the whole body of the city; by whom, with an uniform consent, it was committed to be drawn, ordered, and devised by a certain number of the most witty citizens and politic, ended also with godliness, and with ready hearts to set forward such a noble act, as could be chose in all the whole city; and, like true and faithful ministers, both to the city, and their master Christ, so ordered, devised, and brought forth the matter, that thousands of poor members of Christ, which else for extreme hunger and misery should have famished and perished, shall be relieved, holpen, and brought up, and shall have cause to bless the aldermen of that time, the common-council, and the whole body of the city; but especially the O Dobs, and those chosen men, by whom this honourable work of God was begun and wrought, and that long throughout all ages, as that godly work shall endure; which I pray Almighty God may be ever to the world's end, Amen.

And thou, O sir George Barnes, the truth is to be confessed to God's glory, and to the good example of others, thou wast in thy year not only a furtherer and continuer of that which before thee by thy predecessor was well begun, but also didst labour so to have perfected the work, that it should have been an absolute thing and perfect spectacle of true charity and godliness unto all Christendom. Thine endeavour was to have set up an house of occupations, both that all kind of people being able to work, should not have lacked, where they might profitably they might have been occupied to their relief, and to the profit and commodity of the commonwealth of the city, and also to have retired thither the poor babes brought up in the hospitals, when they had come to a certain age and strength, and also those which in the hospitals aforesaid had been cured of the diseases. And to have brought this to pass, thou didst obtain, notwithstanding great diligence and labour, both of thyself and thy brethren, and of that godly king Edward, the christian and peerless prince's hand, his princely palace of Bridewell, and what other things to the performance of the same, and under what condition it is not unknown. That this thine endeavour had not like success, the fault is not in thee, but in the condition and state of the time, which the Lord of his infinite mercy vouchsafe to amend when it shall be his gracious will and pleasure.

Farewel now all you citizens that be of God, of what state and condition soever you be. Undoubtedly in London you have heard God's word truly preached. My heart desire and daily prayer shall be for you, as for whom for my time, I know to my Lord God I am accountable, that you never swerve, neither for loss of life, nor worldly goods, from God's holy word, and yield unto Antichrist: whereupon must needs follow the extreme displeasure of God, and the loss both of your bodies and souls, into perpetual damnation evermore.

Now that I have gone through the places where I have dwelt any space in the time of my pilgrimage here upon earth, remembering that for the space of king Edward's reign, which was the time of mine office in the sees of London and Rochester, I was a member of the high house of parliament; therefore seeing my God hath given me leisure, and the remembrance thereof, I will bid the lords of temporality farewell. They shall have their just cause, by God's grace, to take in ill part what I intend to say. As for the spiritual prelacy that now is, I have nothing to say to them, except I should repeat again a great part of what I have said before now already to the see of London. To you therefore, my lords of the temporality, will I speak, and this would I have you first understand, that when I wrote this, I looked daily when I should be called to the change of this life, and thought this my writing should not come to your knowledge before the time of the dissolution of my body and soul should be expired; and therefore know ye, that I had before mine eyes only the fear of God, and christian charity towards you, which moved me to write; for you hereafter I look not in this world, either for pleasure or displeasure. If my talk shall do you ever so much pleasure or profit, you cannot promote me, nor if I displease you, can you hurt me or harm me, for I shall be out of your reach. Now therefore, if you fear God, and can be content to hear the talk of him that teacheth nothing at your hands, but to serve God, and to do you good, hearken to what I say. I say unto you, as Paul saith to the Galatians, I wonder what hath befallen you, that you so suddenly are fallen from Christ Antichrist, from Christ's gospel to man's traditions, in the Lord that bought you, unto the bishop of Rome. I warn you of your peril; be not deceived, except you will be found willing consenters unto your death. For if you think thus, We are laymen, this is a matter of religion, we follow as we are taught and lead; if our teachers and governors teach us and lead us amiss, the fault is in them, they shall bear the blame. My lords, this is true, (I grant you) that both false teachers and corrupt governor shall be punished for the death of their subject, whom they have falsely taught, and corruptly led, yea, and his blood shall be required at their hands. But nevertheless shall the subject die the death himself also; that is, he shall also be punished for his own sin; for if the blind lead the blind, they will both fall into the ditch. Shall the synagogue and senate of the Jews (think you) which forsook Christ, and consented to his death, therefore be excused, because Annas and Caiaphas, with the scribes and pharisees, and their clerics, did teach them amiss? Yea, and also Pilate the governor, and the emperor's lieutenant, by his tyranny, without cause put him to death. Forsooth no, my lords, For notwithstanding that corrupt doctrine, or Pilate's washing of his hands, neither shall excuse that synagogue, or Pilate; but at the Lord's hand, for the effusion of that innocent blood, all shall drink of the dead-cup. You are witty, and understand what I mean, therefore I will pass over this, and return to tell you how you are fallen from Christ to his adversary the bishop of Rome.

And lest, my lords, you may peradventure think, thus only to call the bishop of Rome Christ's adversary, (to speak in plain terms) to call him Antichrist, that is done in mine anguish, and that I do but rage, and a desperate man do not care what I say, or upon whom I rail; therefore that your lordships may perceive my mind, and thereby understand that I speak the words of truth and sobriety, (as St. Paul said unto Festus) be it known unto your lordships, (the living Lord beareth me witness, before whom I speak) I do think many a good man, many martyrs and saints of God have sat and taught in that place Christ's gospel truly, which therefore justly may be called Apostolici, that is, true disciples of the apostles, and also that church and congregation of christians to be a right apostolic church: yea, and at certain hundred years after the same was first erected and built upon Christ, by the true apostolical doctrine taught by the mouths of the apostles themselves. If you will know how long that was, and how many hundred years, to be curious in pointing the precise number of the years, I will not be too bold, but thus I say, So long as so many hundred years as that see did truly preach and teach that gospel, that religion, exercised that power, and ordered every thing by those laws and rules which that see received of the apostles, and (as Tertullian saith) the apostles of Christ, and Christ of God: so long, I say, that see might well have been called Peter and Paul's chair, and the bishop thereof Apostolicus, or true disciple and successor of the apostles, and minister of Christ.

But since the time that that see hath degenerated from the trade of truth and true religion, which it received of the apostles at the beginning, and hath preached another gospel, hath set up another religion, hath exercised another power, and hath taken upon it to order and rule the church of Christ by other strange laws, canons, and rules, than ever it received of the apostles of Christ, which things it doth at this day, and hath continued so long, (alas) too long a time; since the time, I say, that the estate and condition of that see hath thus been changed, which it ought of duty and of right to have the names changed both of the see and of the sitter therein. For I understand, my lords, it was neither for the privilege of the place or person thereof, that that see and bishops thereof were called apostolic; but for the true trade of Christ's religion, which was taught and maintained in that see at the first, and of those godly men. And therefore as truly and justly as that see then, for that true trade of religion, and consanguinity of doctrine with the religion and doctrine of Christ's apostles, was called apostolic; so as truly and as justly for the contrariety of religion, and diversity of doctrine from Christ and his apostles, that see and bishop thereof, at this day both ought to be called, and are indeed antichristian.

The see is the see of Satan, and the bishop the same, that maintaineth the abominations thereof, is Antichrist himself indeed. And for the same causes this see at this day is the same which St. John calleth in his Revelation Babylon, or the whore of Babylon, and the spiritual Sodom and Egypt, the mother of fornication and of the abominations upon the earth. And with this whore do spiritually meddle, and lie with her, and commit most stinking and abominable adultery before God, all those kings and princes, yea, and all nations of the earth which do consent to her abominations, and use or practise the same; that is (of the innumerable multitude of them to rehearse some for example's sake) her dispensations, her pardons and pilgrimages, her invocation of saints, her worshipping of images, her false counterfeit religion in her monkery and friarage, and her traditions, whereby God's laws are defiled; as her massing and false ministering of God's word and the sacraments of Christ, clean contrary to Christ's word and the apostle's doctrine, whereof in particular I have touched something before in my talk had with the see of London, and in other treatises more at large; wherein (if it shall please God to bring the same to light) it shall appear, I trust by God's grace, plainly to the man of God, and to him whose rule in judgment of religion is God's word, that that religion, that rule and order, that doctrine and faith which this whore of Babylon, and the beast whereupon she doth sit, maintaineth at this day with all violence of fire and sword, with spoil and banishment (according to Daniel's prophecy), and finally with all falshood, deceit, hypocrisy, and all kind of ungodliness, are as clean contrary to God's word, as darkness is unto light, or light unto darkness, white to black, or black to white, or as Belial to Christ, or Christ to Antichrist himself.

I know, my lords, and foresaw when I wrote this, that so many of you as should see this my writing, not being before endued with the Spirit of grace and the light of God's word, so many (I say) would at these my words lord-like stamp and spurn, and spit thereat. But sober yourselves with patience, and be still, and know ye, that in my writing of this, my mind was none other, but in God (as the living God doth bear me witness) both to do you profit and pleasure. And otherwise, as for your displeasure, by that time this shall come to your knowledge, I trust by God's grace to be in the hands and protection of the Almighty, my heavenly Father and the living Lord, which is (as St. John saith) the greatest of all, and then I shall not need, I suppose, to fear what any lord, no nor what any king or prince can do unto me.

My lords, if in times past you have been contented to hear me sometimes in matters of religion before the prince in the pulpit, and in the parliament-house, and have not seemed to have despised what I have said (when as else if you had perceived just occasion, you might then have suspected me in my talk, though it had been reasonable, either desire of worldly gain, or fear of displeasure) how then have your lordships more cause to hearken to my word, and to hear me patiently, seeing now you cannot justly think of me being in this case appointed to die, and looking daily when I shall be called to come before the eternal judge, otherwise but that I only study to serve my Lord God, and to say that thing which I am persuaded assuredly by God's word shall and doth please him, and profit all them to whom God shall give grace to hear and believe what I do say? And I do say even what I have said heretofore both of the see of Rome and of the bishop thereof, I mean after this their present state at this day, wherein if ye will not believe the ministers of God, and true preachers of his word, verily I denounce unto you in the word of the Lord, except you do repent betime, it shall turn to your confusion, and to your smart on the bitter day. Forget not what I say, my lords, for God's sake forget not, but remember it upon your bed. For I tell you moreover, as I know I must be accountable for this my talk, and of my speaking thus, to the eternal judge (who will judge nothing amiss), so shall you be accountable of your duty in hearing, and you shall be charged, if you will not hearken to God's word, for not obeying the truth. Alas, my lords, how chanceth this, that this matter is now anew again to be persuaded unto you? Who would have thought of late, but your lordships had been persuaded indeed sufficiently, or that you could ever have agreed so uniformly with one consent to the abolishment of the usurpation of the bishop of Rome? If that matter were then but a matter of policy wherein the prince must be obeyed; how is it now made a matter wherein (as your clergy faith now, and so faith the pope's law indeed) standeth the unity of the catholic church, and a matter of necessity of our salvation? Hath the time, being so short since the death of the two last kings, Henry the eighth, and Edward his son, altered the nature of the matter? If it has not, but was of the same nature and danger before God then as it is now, and be now (as it is said by the pope's laws, and the instructions set forth in English to the curates of the diocese of York) indeed a matter of necessity to salvation: how then chanced it that you were all (O my lords) so light, and so little passed upon the catholic faith, and the unity thereof, without which no man can be saved, as for your prince's pleasure, who were but mortal men, to forsake the unity of your catholic faith, that is, to forsake Christ and his gospel? And furthermore, if it were both then, and now is so necessary to salvation, how chanced it also that ye, all the whole body of the parliament agreeing with you, did not only abolish and expel the bishop of Rome, but also abjure him in your own persons, and did decree in your acts great oaths to be taken both of the spirituality and temporality, whosoever should enter into any weighty and chargeable office in the common wealth? But on the other side, if the law and decree which maketh the supremacy of the see and bishop of Rome over the universal church of Christ, be a thing of necessity required unto salvation by an Antichristian law (as it is indeed) and such instructions as are given to the diocese of York, be indeed a setting forth of the power of the beast of Babylon, by the craft and falshood of his false prophets (as of truth, compared to God's word, and truly judged by the same, it shall plainly appear that they be) then my lords never think other, but the day shall come when you shall be charged with this your undoing of that, that once you had well done, and with this your perjury and breach of your oath, which oath was done in judgment, justice, and truth, according to God's law. The whore of Babylon may well for a time dally with you, and make you so drunken with the wine of her filthy flews and whoredom (as with her dispensations and promises of pardon for punishment and crime) that for drunkenness and blindness ye may think yourselves safe. But be you assured, when the living Lord shall try the matter by the fire, and judge it according to his word, when all her abominations shall appear what they be, then you, my lords, repent if you will be happy, and love your own soul's health; repent, I say, or else without all doubt you shall never escape the hands of the living Lord, for the guilt of your perjury, and breach of your oath. As you have banqueted and lain by the whore in the fornication of her whorish dispensations, pardons, idolatry, and such like abominations; so shall you drink with her (except ye repent betime) of the cup of the Lord's indignation and everlasting wrath, which is prepared for the beast, his false prophets, and all their partakers. For he that is partner with them in their whoredom and abominations, must also be partner with them in their plagues, and in the latter day shall be thrown with them into the lake burning with brimstone and unquenchable fire. Thus fare you well, my lords all. I pray God give you understanding of his blessed will and pleasure, and make you to believe and embrace the truth. Amen.

NICHOLAS RIDLEY

Another FAREWEL to the PRISONERS in the Cause of CHRIST'S GOSPEL, and to all them who for the same Cause are banished from their own COUNTRY, charging rather to leave all worldly Goods than their Master CHRIST.

FAREWEL, my dearly beloved brethren in Christ both you my fellow-prisoners, and you also that be exiled and banished out of your countries, because ye will rather forsake all worldly advantages, than the gospel of Christ.

Farewel all you together in Christ; farewel and merry, for you know that the trial of your faith bringeth forth patience, and patience shall make us perfect whole, and sound on every side, and such, after trial (ye know) shall receive the crown of life, according to the promise of the Lord made to his dearly beloved. Let us therefore be patient unto the coming of the Lord. As the husbandman abideth patiently the former and latter rain for the increase of his crop, so let us be patient, and pluck up our hearts, for the coming of the Lord approacheth apace. Let us, my dear brethren, take example of patience in tribulation of the prophets who likewise spake God's word truly in his name. Let Job be to us an example of patience, and the cross which the Lord suffered, which is full of mercy and grace. We know, my brethren, by God's word, that our faith is much more precious than any corruptible gold, and yet that is tried by the fire: even so our faith is therefore tried likewise in tribulations, that it may be found when the Lord shall appear, laudable, glorious, and honourable. For if we for Christ's cause do suffer, that is grateful before God; for thereunto are we called: that is our state and vocation, wherewith let us be content. Christ, we know, suffered for us afflictions, leaving us an example that we should follow his footsteps: for he committed no sin, nor was there any guile found in his mouth: when he was railed upon, and all to be reviled, he railed not again: when he was evil intreated he did not threaten, but committed the punishment thereof to him that judgeth aright.

Let us ever have in fresh remembrance those wonderful comfortable sentences spoken by the mouth of our Saviour Christ; blessed are they which suffer persecution for righteousness' sake, for their's is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when men revile you, persecute you, and speak evil against you for my sake: rejoice and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven; for so did they persecute the prophets that were before you. Christ our master hath told us beforehand, that the brother should put the brother to death, and the father the son, and the children should rise against their parents and kill them, and that Christ's true apostles should be hated of all men for his name's sake; but he that shall abide patiently unto the end, shall be saved.

Let us then endure in all troubles patiently, after the example of our master Christ, and be contented therewith, for he suffered, being our Master and Lord: how doth it then become us to suffer? For the disciple is not above his Master, nor the servant above his Lord. It may suffice the disciple to be as his master, and the servant to be as his lord. If they have called the Father of the family, the Master of the household, Beelzebub, how much more shall they call them so of his household? Fear them not (saith our Saviour) for all hidden things shall be made plain; there is now nothing secret, but shall be shewed in light. Of Christ's words let us neither be ashamed nor afraid to speak them; for so Christ commandeth us, saying, What I tell you privily, speak openly abroad, and what I tell you in your ear, preach upon the house top. And fear not them which kill the body, for the soul they cannot kill; but fear him which can cast both body and soul into hell-fire.

Know ye that our heavenly Father hath ever a gracious eye and respect toward you, and a fatherly providence for you, so that without his knowledge and per-nothing can do you harm. Let us therefore all our care upon him, he shall provide that which is best for us. For if two of small sparrows, which both are sold for a mite, one of them lighteth on the ground without your Father, and all the hairs of our head are numbered, fear not them (saith our master Christ) for you are more worth than many sparrows. And let us not stick to confess our master Christ for fear of danger, whatsoever it shall be, remembering the promise that Christ maketh, saying, whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall I confess before my Father which is in heaven: but whosoever shall deny me, him shall I likewise deny before my Father which is in heaven. Christ came not to give us a carnal amity, and a worldly peace, or to knit us unto the world in ease and peace, but rather to separate and divide from the world, and to join them unto himself: in whose cause we must, if we will be his, forsake father and mother, and stick unto him. If we forsake him or shrink from him for trouble or death sake, which he calleth his cross; he will none of us, we cannot be his. If for his cause we shall lose our temporal goods here, we shall find them again, and enjoy them for evermore: but if, in this cause, we will not be contented to leave nor lose them here, then shall we lose them so, that we shall never find them again, but in everlasting death. What though our troubles here are painful for a time, and the sting of death bitter and unpleasant: we know that they shall not last, in comparison of eternity, no not the twinkling of an eye, and that every patiently taken in Christ's cause, shall procure and bring us unmeasurable heaps of heavenly glory, unto which these temporal pains of death and troubles compared, are not to be esteemed, but to be rejoiced upon. Consider not, saith St. Peter, as though it were any strange matter that ye are tried by the fire, he meaneth tribulation, which thing, saith he, is done to prove us; nay, rather in that ye are partners of Christ's afflictions, rejoice that in his glorious revelation ye may glory with merry hearts. If ye suffer rebukes in Christ's name, happy are ye, for the glory and Spirit of God resteth upon you. Of them God is reviled and dishonoured, but of you he is glorified.

Let no man be ashamed of that which he suffereth as a Christian, and in Christ's cause; for now is the time of judgment and correction must begin at the house of God: and if it begin first at us, what shall be the end of those, which believe not the gospel? And the righteous shall be hardly saved, the wicked and the ungodly, where shall he appear? Wherefore they which will live according to the will of God, let them lay down and commit their souls to him by well doing, as obedient and faithful makers. This, as I said, may seem strange to us, for we know that all the whole congregation of Christ's congregation in this world is served with the like, and by the same is made perfect. For the fervent love that the apostles had unto their master Christ, and for the great advantages and increase of all good things which they felt by their faith to insue of afflictions in Christ's cause, and also for the heaps of heavenly joys which the same do get unto the godly, which shall endure in heaven for evermore; for these causes I say the apostles did joy of their afflictions, and rejoiced in that they were had and accounted worthy to suffer contumelies and rebukes for Christ's name. And St. Paul, as he gloryeth in the grace and favour of God, that he was brought and stood in by faith; so he gloryeth in his afflictions for the heavenly and spiritual goods which he numbered to rise upon them: yea, he was so far in love with what the carnal man loatheth, that is, with Christ's cross, that he judged himself to know nothing else but Christ crucified: he gloryeth, he saith, in nothing else but in Christ's cross, and he blesteth all those as the only true Israelites, and God's people of God, with peace and mercy, which shall follow that rule, and after no other.

O Lord, what a wonderful spirit was that, that made Paul, in setting forth of himself against the vanity of Satan's false apostles, and in his claim there, that he, in Christ's cause, did excel and surpass them all? What wonderful spirit was that, I say, that made him to reckon up all his troubles, his labours, his beatings, his whippings and scourgings, his shipwrecks, his dangers and perils by water and by land, his famine, hunger, nakedness, and cold, with many more, and the daily care of all the congregations of Christ, among whom every man's pain did pierce his heart, and every man's grief was grievous unto him? O Lord, is this Paul's primacy, whereof he thought so much good that he did excel others? Is not this Paul's saying unto Timothy his own scholar? and doth it not pertain to whosoever will be Christ's true soldiers? Bear thou, saith he, affliction like a true soldier of Jesus Christ. This is true; if we die with him (he meaneth Christ) we shall live with him; if we suffer with him, we shall reign with him; if we deny him, he shall deny us; if we be faithless, he remaineth faithful, he cannot deny himself. This, Paul would have known to every body; for there is no other way to heaven but Christ and his way; and all that will live godly in Christ, shall (saith St. Paul) suffer persecution. By this way went to heaven the patriarchs, the prophets, Christ our master, his apostles, his martyrs, and all the godly since the beginning. And as it hath been of old, that he which was born after the flesh, persecuted him who was born after the spirit, for so it was in Isaac's time; so said St. Paul, it was in his time also. And whether it be so now or no, let the spiritual man, the self-same man I mean, that is endued with the Spirit of Almighty God, let him be judge. Of the cross of the patriarchs, as ye may read in their stories, if ye read the book of Genesis, ye shall perceive. Of others, St. Paul in a few words comprehendeth much matter, speaking in a generality of the wonderful afflictions, death, and torments which the men of God in God's cause, and for the truth's sake, willingly and gladly did suffer. After much particular rehearsal of many, he saith, Others were racked and despised, and would not be delivered, that they might obtain a better resurrection. Others again were tried with mockings and scourgings, and moreover with bonds and imprisonments; they were stoned, hewn asunder, tempted, fell, and were slain upon the edge of the sword; some wandered to and fro in sheep skins, in goat skins, forsaken, oppressed, afflicted, such godly men as the world was unworthy of, wandering in wildernesses, in mountains, in caves, and in dens, and all these were commended for their faith. And yet they abide for us the servants of God, and for those their brethren which are to be slain as they were for the word of God's sake, that none be shut out, but that we may all go together to meet our master Christ in the air at his coming, and so be in bliss with him in body and soul for evermore.

Therefore seeing we have so much occasion to suffer, and to take afflictions for Christ's name's sake patiently, so many advantages thereby, so weighty causes, so many good examples, so great necessity, so pure promises of eternal life and heavenly joys of him that cannot lie: let us throw away whatever might hinder us, all burden of sin, and all kind of carnality, and patiently and constantly let us run for the best game in this race that is set before us, ever having our eyes upon Jesus Christ, the captain and perfecter of our faith, who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, not minding the shame and ignominy thereof, and is set now at the right hand of the throne of God. Consider this, that he suffered such strife of sinners against himself, that ye should not give over nor faint in your minds. As yet, brethren, we have not withstood unto death fighting against sin. Let us never forget, dear brethren, for Christ's sake, that fatherly exhortation of the wise man that speaketh unto us, as unto his children, the godly wisdom of God, saying thus; My son, despise not the correction of the Lord, nor fall from him when thou art rebuked of him; for whom the Lord loveth, him doth he correct, and scourgeth every child whom he receiveth. What child is he whom the father doth not chasten? If ye be free from chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and no children. Seeing then, when as we have had carnal parents which chastened us, we revered them, shall not we much more be subject unto our spiritual Father

Father that we might live? And they for a little time have taught us after their own mind, but this Father teacheth us to our advantage, to give unto us his holiness. All chastisement for the present time appeareth not pleasant but painful; but afterwards it rendereth the fruit of righteousness on them which are exercised in it. Wherefore let us be of good cheer, good brethren, and let us pluck up our feeble members that were fallen or begun to faint, heart, hands, knees, and all the rest, and let us walk upright and straight, that no limping nor halting bring us out of the way. Let us not look upon the things that be present, but with the eyes of our faith let us steadfastly behold the things that be everlasting in heaven, and so chuse rather in respect of that which is to come, with the chosen members of Christ to bear Christ's cross, than for this short life-time to enjoy all the riches, honours, and pleasures of the broad world. Why should we Christians fear death? Can death deprive us of Christ which is all our comfort, our joy and our life? Nay forsooth. But contrary, death shall deliver us from this mortal body, which loadeth and beareth down the spirit, that it cannot so well perceive heavenly things; in which so long as we dwell, we are absent from God.

Wherefore understanding our state in that we be christians, that if our mortal body, which is our earthly house, were destroyed, we have a building, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, therefore we are of good cheer, and know that when we are in the body, we are absent from God; for we walk by faith, and not by sight. Nevertheless we are bold, and had rather be absent from the body, and present with God. Wherefore we strive, whether we be present at home, or absent abroad, that we may always please him: and who that hath true faith in our Saviour Christ, whereby he knoweth somewhat truly what Christ our Saviour is, that he is the eternal Son of God, Life, Light, the wisdom of the Father, all goodness, all righteousness, and whatsoever is good that heart can desire, yea infinite plenty of all these, above what man's heart can either conceive or think (for in him dwelleth the fulness of the Godhead corporally), and also that he is given us of the Father, and made of God to be our wisdom, our righteousness, our holiness, and our redemption: who (I say) is he that believeth this indeed, that would not gladly be with his master Christ? Paul for this knowledge coveted to have been loosed from the body, and to have been with Christ, for he counted it much better for himself, and had rather be loosed than to live. Therefore these words of Christ to the thief on the cross, that asked of him mercy, were full of comfort and solace: This day thou shalt be with me in paradise. To die in the defence of Christ's gospel, it is our bounden duty to Christ, and also to our neighbour. To Christ, because he died for us, and rose again that he might be Lord over all. And seeing he died for us, we also, faith St. John, should hazard, yea give our life for our brethren, and this kind of giving and losing, is getting and winning indeed: for he that giveth or loseth his life thus, getteth and winnerth it for evermore. Blessed are they therefore that die in the Lord, and if they die in the Lord's cause, they are most happy of all. Let us not then fear death, which can do us no harm, otherwise than for a moment to make the flesh to smart: but that our faith, which is fastened and fixed upon the word of God, telleth us that we shall be anon after death in peace, in the hands of God, in joy, in solace, and that from death we shall go straight unto life. For St. John faith, He that liveth, and believeth in me, shall never die. And in another place, he shall depart from death unto life. And therefore this death of the christian is not to be called death, but rather a gate or entrance into everlasting life. Therefore Paul calleth it but a dissolution and change, and both Peter and Paul, a putting off this tabernacle or dwelling house: meaning thereby the mortal body, as wherein the soul or spirit doth dwell here in this world for a small time. Yea, this my death may be called, to the christian, an end of all miseries. For so long as we live here, we must pass through many tribulations before we can enter into the kingdom of heaven. And now, after that death hath shot his bolt, all the christian man's enemies have done what they could after that they have no more to do. What could they do or harm poor Lazarus that lay at the rich man's door? his former penury and poverty? his misery, beggary, and horrible sores and sickness? No; as soon as death had struck him with his dart, so soon came the angel and carried him straight up into Abraham's bosom. What lost he by death, who from misery and pain was conducted, by the ministry of angels, into a place of joy and felicity?

Farewel, dear brethren, farewel; let us comfort our hearts in all troubles, and in death, with God's word: for heaven and earth shall perish, but the word of God shall endureth for ever.

Farewel, Christ's dearly beloved spouse, here wandering in this world in a strange land, encompassed about with deadly enemies, who see thy destruction.

Farewel, farewel, O ye the whole universal congregation of the chosen of God here living upon earth, the true church militant of Christ, the true mystical body of Christ, the very household and family of God, and the sacred temple of the Holy Ghost, farewel.

Farewel, O thou little flock of the high heavenly pastors of Christ, for to you it hath pleased the heavenly Father to give an everlasting and eternal kingdom. Farewel.

Farewel, thou spiritual house of God, thou holy royal priesthood, thou chosen generation, thou holy nation, thou won spouse. Farewel, farewel.

BISHOP RIDLEY'S Lamentation for the Change of Religion in ENGLAND; also a Comparison between the Doctrine of the GOSPEL, and Romish Religion, with wholesome Instructions to all CHRISTIANS, how to behave themselves in Time of Trial.

A LAS, what misery is thy church brought unto! O Lord, at this day! Where of late the word of the Lord was truly preached, was read and heard in every town, in every village, yea, and almost in every honest man's house, alas, now it is exiled and banished out of the whole realm. Of late who was not taken for a lover of God's word, for a reader, for a ready hearer, and for a learner of the same! And now, alas, who dare bear any open countenance towards it, but such as are content in Christ's cause, and for his word's sake stand to the danger and loss of all they have!

Of late there were to be found, of every age, of every degree and kind of people, some that gave their diligence to learn (as they could) out of God's word, the articles of the christian faith, the commandments of God, and the Lord's prayer. The babes and young children were taught these things by their parents, their masters, and weekly by their curates in every church: and the aged folk, which had been brought up in blindness, and in ignorance of those things which every christian is bound to know, when otherwise they could not, yet they learned the same by often hearing their children and servants repeat the same: but now (alas and alas again) the false prophets of Antichrist, which are past all shame, do openly preach in pulpits unto the people of God, that the catechism is to be accounted hereby: whereby their old blindness is brought home again: for the aged are afraid of the higher powers, and the youth are abashed and ashamed, even of that which they have learned, even though it be God's word, and dare no more meddle.

Of late in every congregation throughout all England, prayer and petition was made unto God to be delivered from the tyranny of the bishop of Rome, and all his detestable enormities, from all false doctrine and heresy; and now alas, Satan hath persuaded England by his falsehood and craft, to revoke her old godly prayer, to recant the same, and draw down the fearful wrath and indignation of God upon her own pate.

Of late by strict laws and ordinances, with the consent of the nobles and commonalty, and full agreement and counsel of the prelates and clergy, the beast of Babylon was banished hence, with laws, I say, and with oaths, and all means that then could be devised for so godly a purpose: but now, (alas) all these laws are trodden under ot; the nobles, the commonalty, the prelates and are quite changed, and all those oaths, though were made in judgment, justice, and truth, and the ever so good, do no more hold than a bond of or a barley straw, and a public perjury no more eth them, than a shadow upon a wall.

late it was agreed in England of all hands, accord-to St. Paul's doctrine, and Christ's commandment, nothing ought to be done in the church, in the pubingregation, but in that tongue which the congren could understand, that all might be edified there-whether it were common-prayer, administration of raments, or any other thing belonging to the pub-ministry of God's holy and wholesome word: but, all is turned upside down, Paul's doctrine is put Christ's commandment is not regarded. For ng is heard commonly in the church but a strange ue, that the people do not understand.

late all men and women were taught after Christ's ine, to pray in that tongue which they could un-and, that they might pray with heart that which should speak with their tongue: now, alas, the arned people are brought into that blindness again, hink that they pray, when they speak with their ue they cannot tell what, nor whereof their hearts othing mindful at all, for that it cannot understand it thereof.

late the Lord's supper was duly administered, and ht to be made common to all that are true christians thanksgiving and setting forth of the Lord's death passion until his returning again, to judge both quick dead: but, now alas, the Lord's table is quite over-wn, and that which ought to be common to all y, is made private to few ungodly, without any oi thanksgiving, or any setting forth of the Lord's h at all, that the people are able to understand.

late all that were endued with the light and grace nderstanding God's holy mysteries, did bless God, had brought them out of that horrible blindness ignorance, whereby in times past being seduced by n's subtilties, they believed that the sacrament was the sacrament, but the thing itself whereof it is a ament, that the creature was the creator, and that thing which had neither life nor sense, (alas, such the horrible blindness) was the Lord himself, which de the eye to see, and hath given all senses and un-standing unto man: but now, alas, England is reed again like a dog to her own vomit and spewing, is in worse case than ever she was: for it had been er never to have known the truth, than to forsake truth once received and known: and not only that is turned into darkness, and God's grace is received an, but also laws of death are made by the high at of parliament, masterfully to maintain by sword, and all kind of violence, that heinous idolatry, erein that adoration is given unto the lifeless and no creature, which is only due unto the everliving d: yea, they say they can, and do make of bread n man and God, by their transubstantiation. O ked men, and Satan's own brood!

late was the Lord's cup at his table distributed ording to his own commandment, by his express ds in the gospel, as well to the laity as to the clergy, ch order Christ's church observed so many hundred rs after, as all the ancient ecclesiastical writers do ify, without contradiction of any one of them, that be shewed unto this day: but now, alas, not only Lord's commandment is broken, his cup denied to servants, to whom he commandeth it should be tributed, but also with the same is set up a new phemous kind of sacrifice to satisfy and pay the e of sins both of the quick and the dead, to the great intolerable reproach of Christ our Saviour's death passion, which was and is the one only sufficient everlasting available sacrifice, satisfactory for all elect of God, from Adam the first, to the last that ll be born in the world.

late the commandment of God, "Thou shalt not ke to thyself any graven image, nor any similitude likeness of any thing in heaven above, or in earth beneath, or in the water under the earth, thou shalt not bow down to them nor worship them:" this commandment of God, I say, was graven almost every where in churches, was learned by every body both old and young; whereupon images that provoked the simple and ignorant people unto idolatry, as the wise man saith, were taken out of the churches, and strictly forbidden that none should any where either bow down to them, or worship them: but now, alas, God's holy word is blotted and razed out of churches, and stocks and stones are set up in the place thereof. God commanded his word so to be ordered, that it might be had in continual remembrance at all times, and in every place: and on the other side, he forbid images and idols so to be either made or set in any place, where any should bow or worship them: but now (alas) that which God commanded is not minded, and that which he forbiddeth, is powerfully maintained by falsehood and craft, and wickedly upheld.

Of late all ministers that were admitted to the public office and ministry of God's holy word, in their admission made a solemn profession before the congregation, that they should teach the people nothing as doctrine necessary to eternal salvation, but that which is God's own holy word, or may be thereon grounded without any doubt; whereby vanished and melted away of themselves many vain, yea, wicked traditions of man, as wax before the fire: but now at one brunt they are revived, and are in full hope also to return again in as great strength as ever they have been. And now can any man look for any other thing, but when you have received the head, you must also receive the whole body, or else how can the head abide? The head, under Satan, of all mischief, is Antichrist and his brood, the same is he which is the Babylonical beast. The beast is he, whereupon the whore sitteth. The whore is that city, saith John in plain words, which hath empire over the kings of the earth. This whore hath a golden cup of abomi-nations in her hand, whereof she maketh to drink the kings of the earth, and of the wine of this harlot have all nations drank, yea and kings of the earth have lain by this whore, and merchants of the earth, by virtue of her pleasant merchandize, have been made rich.

Now what city is there in all the whole world, that when John wrote, ruled over the kings of the earth; or what city can be read of in any time, that of the city itself challenged the empire over the kings of the earth, but only the city of Rome, and that since the usurpation of that see hath grown to her full strength? And is it not read that the old and ancient writers understand Peter's former epistle to be written at Rome, and it to be called of him in the same epistle in plain terms, Babylon? By the abominations thereof I understand all the whole trade of the Romish religion, under the name and title of Christ, which is contrary to the only rule of true religion, that is, God's word. What word of God hath that devilish drab for the maintenance of her manifold abominations, and to set to sale such merchandize, wherewith (alas! the madness of man) the wicked harlot hath almost bewitched the whole world? Did not Peter, the very true apostle of Christ (of whom this stinking strumpet beareth herself so high, but falsely and without all just cause) did not he, I say, give all the world warning of her pelf and trash, of her false doctors and apostles (for this whore will be called the Lord's apostle, whosoever say nay) after this manner in his latter epistle? "There were among the people in times past false prophets as there shall be among you in time to come false preachers, which shall privily bring in pestilent sects, even denying the Lord which hath bought them and redeemed them, procuring to themselves swift damnation, and many shall follow their damnable ways, by whom the way of truth shall be railed upon, and through covetousness by counterfeit tales or sermons, they shall make merchandize upon you," &c. And doth not John likewise in his Revelation, after he hath reckoned up a great rabblement of this whore's mystical merchandize, at the last (as though he would knit up all in plain words, without any mist at all, setting out the whore's merchandize) reckon up amongst

amongst the rest, and concludeth, saying, And the souls of men too? Whereupon, I pray you, else rose this true proverb in Latin, Omnia Romæ venalia; that is, All things for money are set to sale at Rome?

But you would know which be these merchandizes which I said this whore setteth forth to sell, for which all her false prophets, with all their jugglings and crafty glosses, cannot bring one jot of God's word. Surely, they be not only all these abominations which are come into the church of Engand already (whereof I have spoke somewhat before) but also an innumerable rabblement of abominations and wicked abuses, which now must needs follow; as popish pardons, pilgrimages, Romish purgatory, Romish masses, dispensations, and immunities from all godly discipline, laws and good order, pluralities, unions, with a thousand more. Now shall come in the flattering friars and the false pardoners, and play their old pranks and knavery as they were wont to do. Now shall you have (but of the see of Rome only, and that for money) canonizing of such saints as have stood stout in the pope's cause, shrining of relics, and from any kind of wickedness (if you will pay well for it) clear absolution from punishment and crime, for thousands of years; yea, and at every bishop's hand and suffragan, ye shall have hallowing of churches, chapels, altars, super-altars, chalices, and of all the whole household stuff and adornment which shall be used in the church after the Roman guise, for all these things must be esteemed of such high price, that they may not be done but by a consecrated bishop only. O Lord, all these things are such as thy apostles never knew. As for conjuring (they call it hallowing, but it is conjuring indeed) of water and salt, of christening of bells, and such like things, what need I to speak? For every priest that can but read, hath power (they say) not only to do that, but also hath such power over Christ's body, as to make both God and man once at the least every day of a wafer cake.

After the rehearſal of the ſaid abominations, and remembrance of a number of many more, which (the Lord knoweth) it grieveth me to think upon, and were too long to deſcribe; when I conſider on the other ſide the eternal word of God that abideth for ever, and the undefiled law of the Lord which turneth the ſoul from all wickedneſs, and giveth wiſdom unto the innocent babes, I mean that milk that is without all guile, as Peter calleth it, that good word of God, that word of truth that muſt be engraven within the heart, and then is able to ſave men's ſouls; that wholeſome ſeed, not mortal, but immortal, of the eternal and everlaſting God, whereby the man is born anew, and made the child of God, that ſeed of God, whereby the man of God ſo being born, cannot ſin, as John ſaith, (he meaneth ſo long as that ſeed abideth in him) that holy ſcripture which hath not been deviſed by the wit of man, but taught from heaven by the inſpiration of the Holy Ghoſt, which is profitable to teach, to reprove, to correct, to inſtruct, and to give order in all righteouſneſs, that the man of God may be whole and ſound, ready to perform every good work: when, I ſay, I conſider this holy and wholeſome true word that teacheth us truly our bounden duty towards our Lord God in every point, what his bleſſed will and pleaſure is, what his infinite great goodneſs and mercy is, what he hath done for us, how he hath given us his own dearly beloved Son to death for our ſalvation, and by him hath ſent us the revelation of his bleſſed will and pleaſure, what his eternal word willeth us both to believe, and alſo to do; and hath for the ſame purpoſe inſpired the holy apoſtles with the Holy Ghoſt, and ſent them abroad into all the world, and alſo made them and other diſciples of Chriſt inſpired by the ſame Spirit, to write and leave behind them the ſame things that they taught (which as they did proceed of the Spirit of truth, ſo by the confeſſion of all them that ever were endued with the Spirit of God, were ſufficient to the obtaining of eternal ſalvation) and likewiſe when I conſider that all that man doth profeſs in his regeneration, when he is received into the holy catholic church of Chriſt, and is now to be accounted for one of the lively members of Chriſt's own body; all that is grounded upon God's holy word, ſtandeth in the profeſſion of that faith, and obedience to thoſe commandments which are all contained in God's holy word.

And furthermore, when I conſider whom our Saviour Chriſt pronounceth in his goſpel to be bleſſed, and whom Moſes giveth his benedictions in the law, and ways the law, the prophets, the pſalms, and all ſcriptures; both new and old, do declare to be the will of the Lord, what is good for man to obtain and abide in God's favour; which is that faith that juſtifieth before God; and what is that charity that doth paſs and exceed all, which be the properties of heavenly wiſdom, and which is that undefiled religion which is allowed of God; which things Chriſt himſelf calleth the weighty manner of the law, which thing is that which is only available in Chriſt, and what knowledge is that that St. Paul eſteemed ſo much, that he counted all elſe vain, and what ſhall be the manner of extreme judgment of the latter day, who ſhall judge, and by what he ſhall judge, and what ſhall be required at our hands on that fearful day, how all things muſt be tried by the ſword, and that only ſhall ſtand for ever which Chriſt's word ſhall allow, which ſhall be the judge of all fleſh, and give ſentence upon all fleſh; and every living ſoul, either of eternal damnation, or of everlaſting ſalvation, and which ſentence there ſhall be no place to appeal, nor ſhall ſerve to elude, nor any power to withſtand, nor to revoke. When (I ſay) I conſider all theſe things, and conſider how they differ from the other, and how they conſe- confer to the ſame again and again all thoſe ways which in ſtandeth the ſubſtance of the Romiſh religion (whereof I ſpoke before) it may be evident and eaſy to perceive that theſe two ways, theſe two religions, the one of Chriſt, the other of the Romiſh ſee, in theſe latter dayes be as far diſtant the one from the other, as light is from darkneſs, good and evil, righteouſneſs and unrighteouſneſs, Chriſt and Belial. He that is hard of belief, let him note and weigh well with himſelf thoſe places of holy ſcripture whereupon this talk is grounded, and by God's grace he may receive ſome light. And unto the contemner I have nothing now to ſay, but to rehearſe the ſaying of the prophet Iſaiah, which Paul ſpoke to the Jews in the end of the Acts of the apoſtles. After he had expounded to them the truth of God's word, and declared to them Chriſt out of the law of Moſes and the prophets, all the day long from morning to night, he ſaid unto them that would not believe, "Woe ſpake the Holy Ghoſt unto our fathers, ſaying, Go ye unto this people and tell them, ye ſhall hear with your ears, and not underſtand, and ſeeing you ſhall behold, and not ſee the thing: for the heart of this people is waxed groſs and dull, and with their ears they are hard of hearing, and they have ſhut together their eyes, that they ſhould not ſee, nor hear with their ears, nor underſtand with their hearts, leſt they might return, and I ſhould heal them, ſaith the Lord God."

Alas, England, alas, that this heavy plague of God ſhould fall upon thee. Alas, my dearly beloved country, what thing is it now that may do thee good? Undoubtedly thy plague is ſo great, that it is utterly incurable, but by the bottomleſs mercy and infinite power of Almighty God. Alas, my dear country, what haſt thou done that thou haſt provoked the wrath of God, and cauſed him to pour out his vengeance upon thee for thine own deſerts? Canſt thou be content to hear thy faults told thee? Alas, thou haſt heard oft, and wilt never amend. England, thy faults of all degrees, and ſorts of men, of magiſtrates, of the miniſters, and of the common people, were never more plainly told ſince thou bore that name, than thou didſt hear them of late, even before the magiſtrates in king Edward's days; but thou heardſt them only, and didſt amend never a whit. For even of thy greateſt magiſtrates ſome (the king's highneſs then, that innocent, that godly-hearted and peerleſs young chriſtian prince excepted) evermore unkindly and ungently, againſt thoſe that went about moſt buſily and moſt wholeſomely to cure their fore- backs, ſpurned privily, and would not ſpare to ſpeak evil of them, even unto the prince himſelf, and yet would they do the same preachers outwardly bear a jolly countenance and a fair face.

I have heard that Cranmer, and another whom I will name, were both in high displeasure, the one for taking his conscience secretly, but plainly and fully in the duke of Somerset's cause, and both of late, but specially Cranmer, for repugning as they might, against the spoil of the church goods, taken away only by commandment of the higher powers, without any law or order of justice, and without any request or consent to them to which they did belong. As for Latimer, Fisher, Bradford, and Knox, their tongues were so sharp, they were ripped in so deep in their galled backs, to have they were (no doubt) of that filthy matter that was sowed in their hearts, of insatiable covetousness, of carnality and voluptuousness, of intolerable ambition and pride, of ungodly loathsomeness to hear poor men's causes, and to hear God's word, that these men and all others these magistrates could never abide. Others were very godly men, and well learned, that went about by the wholesome plaisters of God's word, howbeit in a more soft manner of handling the matter, but all sped alike. For all that could be done of all hands, their disease did not diminish, but daily did increase, which, no doubt, is no small occasion in that state of the heavy plague of God that is poured upon England at this day. As for the common lawyers, it may be truly said of them, as of the most part of the clergy, of curates, vicars, parsons, prebendaries, doctors of the law, archdeacons, deans, yea, and I may say, of bishops also, I fear, for the most part, (although I doubt not but God had, and hath ever, whom he in every state knew and knoweth to be his) but for the most part, I say, they were never persuaded in their hearts, but from the teeth forward, and for the king's sake, in the truth of God's word, and yet all these did dissemble, and bear a copy of a countenance, as if they had been sound within.

Hypocrisy and dissimulation St. Jerome doth well call a double wickedness; for neither it loveth the truth (which is one great evil) and also falsely it pretendeth to deceive the simple for another thing. This hypocrisy and dissimulation with God, in matters of religion, no doubt, hath wholly also provoked the anger of God. And as for the common people, although there were many good, where they well and diligently taught; yet (God knoweth) a great number received God's true word and high benefits with unthankful hearts. For it was great pity and a lamentable thing to have seen in many places the people so loathsomely and irreligiously to come to the holy communion, and to receive it accordingly, and to the common prayers, and other divine service, which were according to the true vein of God's holy word, and in all points so godly and wholesomely set forth, in comparison of that blind zeal, and undiscerned devotion which they had aforesaid to those things, whereof they understood never one whit, nor could be edified by them any thing at all.

And again, as for our alms-deeds, which are taught in God's word, whereby we are certain that God is pleased with them, and doth and will require such at our hands, which are a part of true religion, as St. James saith, and such as he saith himself he setteth more by than by sacrifice; to provide for the fatherless, infants and orphans, for the lame, aged, and impotent poor needy folk, and to make public provision that the poor that might labour, should have wherewith to labour upon, and so be kept from shameful beggary and stealing in these works: I say, how wayward were many, in comparison (I mean) of that great prodigality whereby in times past they spared not to spend upon flattering flatters, false pardoners, painting and gilding of stocks and stones, to be set up and honoured in churches, plainly against God's word? And yet because no place was to be defrauded of their just commendation, London, I must confess, for such godly works in sir Richard Dobs, knight, then lord mayor, his year being marvellous well: the Lord grant the same may so likewise persevere, continue, yea and increase, to the comfort and relief of the needy and helpless, that was so godly begun, Amen.

All these things do administer more matter of mourning and bewailing the miserable state that now is: for by this it may be perceived, how England hath deserved this just plague of God. And also it is greatly to be feared, that those good things, whatsoever they were that had their beginning in the time when God's word was so freely preached, now with the exile and banishment of the same, will depart again.

But to return again to the consideration of this miserable state of Christ's church in England, and to leave father and more exquisite searching of the causes thereof unto God's secret and unsearchable judgments, let us see what is best now to be done for Christ's little flock. This is one maxim and principle in Christ's law; He that denieth Christ before men, him shall Christ deny before his Father and all his angels in heaven. And therefore every one that looketh to have by Christ our Saviour everlasting life, let him prepare himself so, that he deny not his master Christ, or else he is but a cast-away, and a wretch, howsoever he be counted or taken here in the world.

Now then seeing the doctrine of Antichrist is returned again into this realm, and the higher powers (alas) are so deceived and bewitched, that they are persuaded it is the truth, and Christ's true doctrine to be error and heresy, and the old laws of Antichrist are allowed to return with the power of their father again: what can be hereafter looked for, by reason, to the man of God, and true christian, abiding in this realm, but extreme violence of death, or else to deny his Master? I grant the hearts of princes are in God's hands, and whithersoever he will he can make them bow: and also that christian kings in old time used a more gentle kind of punishment, even to them which were heretics indeed; as degradation, and deposition out of their rooms and offices, exile and banishment out of their dominions and countries: and also (as it is read) the true bishops of Christ's church were sometime intercessors for the heretics unto princes, that they would not kill them, as is read of St. Augustine. But as yet Antichrist's kingdom was not so erected at that time, nor is now accustomed so to order them that will not fall down and worship the beast and his image (but even as all the world knoweth) after the same manner that both John and Daniel hath prophesied before, that is, by violence of death; and Daniel declareth farther, that the kind of death accustomed should be by sword, fire, and imprisonment.

Therefore, if thou, O man of God, dost purpose to abide in this realm, prepare and arm thyself to die: for both by Antichrist's accustomed laws, and these prophesies, there is no appearance or likelihood of any other thing, except thou wilt deny thy master Christ, which is the loss at the last both of body and soul unto everlasting death. Therefore my good brother or sister in Christ, whatsoever thou be, to thee that canst and mayst so do, that counsel that I think is the best safeguard for thee, both for thy body, and most surely for thy soul's health, is that which I shall shew thee hereafter. But first I warn thee to understand me to speak to him or her, which be not in captivity, or called already to confess Christ, but are at liberty abroad.

My counsel, I say, therefore is this, to fly from the plague, and get thee hence. I consider not only the subtilities of Satan, and how he is able to deceive by his false persuasions (if it were possible) even the chosen of God, and also the great frailty, which is oftentimes more in a man than he doth know in himself, which in the time of temptation then will utter itself: I do not only consider these things, I say, but that our master Christ, whose life was and is a perfect rule of the christian man's life, that he himself avoided oftentimes the fury and madness of the Jews, by departing from the country or place.

Paul likewise, when he was sought in Damascus, and the gates of the city was laid in wait for him, he was conveyed by night, being let down in a basket out at a window over the wall: and Elias the prophet fled the persecution of wicked Jezabel: and Christ our Saviour saith in the gospel, "When they persecute you in one city, flee unto another:" and so did many good, great learned, and virtuous men of God, who were great and flout champions nevertheless, and stout counsellors and maintainers of Christ and his truth, in due time and place. Of such was the great clerk Athanasius. But this is so plain to be lawful by God's word, and examples of holy men, that I need not to stand in it.

Having this for my ground, I say to thee, O man of God, this seemeth to me to be the most sure way for thy safeguard, to depart and flee far from the plague, and that swiftly also: for truly before God, I think, that the abomination that Daniel prophesied of so long before, is now set up in the holy place. For all the doctrine of Antichrist, his laws, rites, and religion contrary to Christ, and so to the true serving and worshipping of God, I understand to be that abomination: therefore now is the time in England for those words of Christ, "Then they that be in Judea, let them flee into the mountains." Then (saith he) mark this Christ's (Then) for truly I am persuaded, and I trust, by the Spirit of God, that this (Then) is commanded; "Then (saith Christ) they that be in Jewry, let them fly unto the mountains, and he that is on the house top, let him not come down to take away anything out of his house, and he that is abroad in the field, let him not return to take his cloaths. Woe be to the great-bellied women, and to them that give suck; but pray (saith Christ) that your flight be not in winter, or on the sabbath-day."

These words of Christ are mystical, and therefore had need of interpretation. I understand all those to be in Jewry spiritually, which truly confess one true living God, and the whole truth of his word, after the doctrine of the gospel of Christ. Such as they whom Christ here biddeth, in the time of the reign of Antichrist's abominations, to fly unto the mountains; which signifieth places of safeguard, and all such things which are able to defend from the plague. That he biddeth him that is on the house top, not to come down, and him that is in the field, not to return to take with him his cloaths; he meaneth that they should speed them to get them away betime, lest in their tarrying and trifling about working provision, they may be trapped in the snare ere ever they be aware, and caught by the back, and for gain of small worldly things, endanger and cast themselves into great perils of more weighty matters. And where he saith, Woe be to the great-bellied women, and to them that give suck; women great with child, and nigh to their lying down, and to be brought to bed, and not able to travel; and also those women which are brought to bed, and now give their babes suck: by these therefore Christ spiritually understandeth all such to be in extreme danger, which this word (Woe) signifieth: all such, I say, as are so hindered by any manner of means that they no ways be able to fly from the plague. And where Christ saith, Pray you that your flight be not in the winter, nor on the sabbath day: in winter, the common course of the year teacheth us, that the ways be foul, and therefore it is a hard thing then to take a far journey, for many incommodities and dangers of the ways in that time of the year; and on the sabbath-day it was not lawful to journey, but a little way. Now Christ therefore meaning that we should have need, both to speed our journey quickly, which cannot be done in the winter, for the badness of the ways, and also to go far, which cannot be done on the sabbath-day: he biddeth us therefore pray that our flight be not in the winter, nor on the sabbath-day; that is, to pray that we fly in time, and also far enough from the danger of the plague. Now, the causes why we should fly, follow in the same of St. Matthew's gospel, which I now pass over; thou mayst read them there.

And in the eighteenth chapter of the Revelation, the angel is said to have cried mightily with a loud voice, "Flee, my people out of Babylon, lest you be infected with her faults, and so be made partners of her plagues: for her offences and sins are grown so great, that they swell, and are come unto the heavens." Certainly the time doth approach, and the Lord's day is at hand. Hear, I beseech you, also holy Paul, that blessed apostle, he plainly forbiddeth us, "To join or couple ourselves with the unfaithful: for what fellowship can there be, saith he, of righteousness with unrighteousness, what company hath light with darkness, or what agreement hath Christ with Belial? or what part can the true have with the unfaithful? or how doth the temple of God agree with images or idols? For you are the temple of the living God: as God hath said, I will walk and dwell in them, I will be their God, and they shall be my people: wherefore depart from amongst them, and get you from them, saith the Lord, and touch no unclean thing: and I will receive you, and be to you in the father of your father, and you shall be unto me as my sons and daughters, saith the Almighty God.

This counsel to depart the realm, I do not marvel doth seem to divers (even of them, I mean, that bear your to Godward) diversly. Many (I trust) that learned shall think the counsel good. Others there peradventure, that will think it rather a thing to be tolerable, and that it may be indeed by God's word fully done, rather than to be counselled to be done, they will peradventure say, we should counsel a man ways to do that which is best of all, and of most perfection: but boldly in Christ's cause to spend a man's life, is best of all, and of most perfection, and to fly seems to smell of cowardice. In many things, that which is best for one at sometimes, is not best for all at all times, and it is not most perfection, nor meet for a man to covet to run before he can go. I will not here make a discourse in this matter, what might be here objected, and what might be answered again; I leave that to the witty and eloquent men of the world.

This is my mind, which I would thou shouldst have. O man of God, as I would wish, and I do pray to the mighty God it may be, that every true christian, either brother or sister (after they be called, and brought into the wrestling place, to strive in Christ's cause for the game, that is, to confess the truth of the gospel, and of the christian faith, in hope of everlasting life) should shrink nor relent one inch, nor give back, whatsoever shall befall, but to stand to their tackle, and stick by it even unto death, as they will Christ shall stick by them at the latter day; so likewise I dare not wish nor counsel any, either brother or sister, of their own accord, to start up into the stage, or to cast themselves, either before, and farther in danger than time and need shall require: for undoubtedly when God seeth his time, and his pleasure is, that his glory shall be set forth, and his church edified by thy death and confession, means shall be found by his fatherly universal providence, that thou without thine own presumptuous provocation, shalt be lawfully called, to do thy feat, and to play thy part. The miserable end that one Quintus came unto, may be a warning, and a fearful example for all men to beware of presumption, and rashness in such things (as Eusebius writteth in his ecclesiastical history, lib. 4. cap. 15.) forever.

But a third sort of men there be, who also will be counted favourers of God's word, and are (I fear) in number far more, and worse to be persuaded to that which is the godly mean. I mean of such as will peradventure say or think, that my former counsel, which was to fly the infection of the antichristian doctrine by departing out of the realm, is more than needeth, and other ways and means may be found, both to abide, and also to be clear out of danger of the aforesaid plague. If that could be found, both to abide, and also to be clear out of danger of the aforesaid plague, truly agreeable to God's word, I would be as glad to hear it, God is my witness as any other man. Yes, peradventure, will some say, thus it may be: thou mayst keep thyself, thy faith, and thy religion close to thyself, and inwardly and privily worship God in spirit and truth, and outwardly see thou be no open meddler, nor talker, nor transgressor of common order: so mayst thou be suffered in the commonwealth, and yet use thy religion without offence of thy conscience. In other countries somewhere this peradventure might be used, but in England what shall be, God knoweth: but it was never yet, so far as ever I have known or heard. And also how can it be, but either thou must transgress the common order, and the Romish laws and customs, which have been used in England; in times past of popery, and now (it is certain) they return again: I say, thou must either be a breaker of these rites, laws, and customs, and so bewray thyself, or else, if thou be indeed a man of God, thou shalt find thy conscience; for in observing of them thou shalt be compelled to break God's law, which is the law of conscience to the man of God. For how canst thou resort every holy-day to the church, and bear a worship the creature instead of the Creator, as thou must do, and peradventure confess it too with thy mouth, and to sprinkle thyself with the conjured water. Thou must be contributor also to the charges of all superstitions, as of books of Antichrist's service, of lights, of the rood-loft, of the sepulchre, for setting up and hanging images (nay, indeed of idols), and thou must give a face to worship them also, or else thou must be by the back. Thou must serve the turn, to give holy loaves as they call them, which is nothing else but a mockery of the Lord's holy table. Thou must be contributor to the charges of all the disguised apparel, the popish sacrificing priest, like, unto Aaron, must give his part in. Yea, when the pardoner goeth about, the flattering friar to beg for the maintenance of superstition, except thou do as thy neighbours do, look thou long to live at rest. If any of thy family die, if thou wilt not pay money for ringing and singing, for requiem, masses, dirige, and commendations, and such like trumpery of the antichristian religion, thinkest thou that thou shalt be reckoned for a catholic man, or for Cæsar's friend? An hundred things more may be reckoned, and many of more weight, and of more evident superstition and idolatry, than some of these which I have now rehearsed, which, God knoweth, be ill enough: but these are enough to declare, and to set before thine eyes, the thing that I intend, that is, if thou abide and wilt dwell in England, thou must either do these, and many other more contrary to God's word, which forbiddeth not only the thing which is evil, but also saith, Abstain from all things that have any appearance of evil: or else if thou wilt not do them, how thou canst live in England in rest, safe from the stake, truly I cannot tell.

But peradventure (as man is ready to find, and invent some colour to cloak his conscience, to do that thing which his heart desireth) thou wilt say, though at any time I shall be forced to do any of these things, and such-like, yet will I have no confidence in them, but outwardly with my body; I will keep my heart unto God, and will not do that of my own mind willingly either, but to avoid another inconvenience: I trust therefore God will hold me excused, for he shall have my heart: what can I do more?

O my friend, beware for God's sake, and know that the subtilties of Satan are very deep. He that is not able to keep God's word to perceive them is heavily laden. Pray therefore with David; Lord, let me not have a mind to invent excuses to cloak my sin: examine, my dear friend, these wily ways with the word of God, and if they do agree, thou mayest use them: if not, know, though they may seem ever so fine and goodly, yet indeed they are of Satan's brood. God's word is certain, that forbiddeth to worship the creature for the Creator, for that is heinous idolatry, and against the first commandment of God; and it is also against the second commandment the first table to bow down, or to worship unto any images of God, or of any other thing; and God's word requireth not only the belief of the heart, but also the confession of the mouth: and to bear part of the charges, the maintenance of things ungodly; what is that, but thy so doing, a consent to the thing done? Now consider the doers, God's word accounteth to be guilty both. And it is not lawful, by St. Paul's doctrine, which was inspired by the Spirit of God, to do that thereof the thing which is good may come.

Thy heart, thou sayest, God shall have, and yet wilt thou offer thy body to do the thing that God doth abhor. Beware, O man; take heed what thou sayest; man may be deceived, but no man may deceive God, for he is all-wise, and is truly, the searcher of the heart. Now to give God thy heart, is to give him thy whole heart, to love him, to dread him, and to trust in him above all other things. "He that hath my commandments," saith Christ, and observeth and keepeth them, it is he that loveth me:" and to dread God above all others, is rather willingly to incur the danger and peril of all fearful things, than wittingly to do that thing which is contrary to his blessed will and commandment; and to trust in him above all things, is assuredly to trust to his promise of his reward, and of his tuition, and of his goodness and mercy, and to prefer that above all things in the world, seem they ever so strong, so wise, or so good. Now, how canst thou say truly, that God hath thy heart after this manner of sort, when thy deeds do declare far another thing? Thy body, O man, is God's, and all the parts thereof, even as thy soul is: he made them both, and Christ with his blood redeemed them both for he hath bought them both dearly: and darest thou suffer any part of either of them to do service to Satan? Surely in so doing thou committest sacrilege, and dost rob God; thou defilest the living temple of the living God, if thou suffer thy body to do Satan service. "Do you not know saith St. Paul, that your body is a lively temple of God?" And may a man then take and use any part thereof but in the service of God? No, surely, it is not lawful so to do for the man of God, neither with hand, tongue, nor feet, nor any part of the whole body.

Doth not Paul command that to the Romans, which pertaineth to every christian soul? "As you have in times past, saith he, given your members to do service unto uncleanness and wickedness, from one wickedness to another; so now give your members to do service unto righteousness, that you may be sanctified." And I pray thee, good brother, what dost thou think it is to bear the mark of the beast in the forehead, and in the hand, that St. John speaketh of? I know we ought warily to speak of God's mysteries, which he shewed by the spirit of prophesying to his servant John, yet to read them with reverence; and to pray for the same so much as God knoweth is necessary for our time to know, I think it necessary and good. Wherefore what I suppose is to bear the beast's mark, I will tell thee and commit the judgment of mine interpretation, as in all other things, to the spiritual man. I suppose he beareth the beast of Babylon's mark in his forehead, which is not ashamed of the beast's ways, but will profess them openly to set forth his master the beast of Abaddon. And likewise he beareth his mark in his hand, that will and doth practise the works of the beast with his power and hand. And likewise I will not forbear to tell thee, what I think to be signed in the forehead for the servant of God is, whereof John also speaketh, reckoning up many thousands so to have been signed of every tribe. I suppose he is signed in the forehead for the servant of God, whom God hath appointed of his infinite goodness, and hath given him grace and strength stoutly to confess him, and his truth before the world. And to have grace and strength to confess Christ, and the doctrine of the cross, and to lament and mourn for the abomination of Antichrist, I suppose is to be signed with Tau, whereof Ezekiel the prophet doth speak. Thus, I suppose, these prophecies are spiritually to be understood: and to look for other corporal marks, to be seen in men's foreheads, or in their hands, is nothing else but to look that there should come some brute beast out of Babylon, or some elephant, leopard, lion, or camel, or some other such monstrous beast with ten horns, that should do all the wonderful things spoken in John: and yet of a beast speaketh John, but I understand him so to be called, not for that he shall be any such brute beast, but for that he is and shall be the child of perdition, which for his cruelty and beastly manners is well called a beast.

The carnal Jews knew there was a promise made, that Elias should come before Christ the Messiah, the anointed of God, to prepare his ways: they knew also there was a promise of Messiah, that he should come, and be a king, and reign in the house of David for evermore: but they understood all so grossly, and so carnally, that they neither knew Elias, nor Messiah, when they came; for they looked for Elias to come down from heaven in his own person, and for Messiah to come and reign in worldly pomp, power, riches, and glory, whereas the prophecies of both were spiritually to have been understood:

of Elias, that he should not come in person, but in spirit; that is, one that should be endowed with the spirit and gifts of grace of Elias, which was indeed John Baptist, as Christ himself did declare to his apostles: and of Messiah's reign, all the prophets were to be understood of the reign of his spiritual kingdom over the house of Jacob, and the true Israelites for evermore. And so by that their gross and carnal understanding, they mistook both Elias and the true Messiah, and when they came, knew neither of them. So likewise, I fear, nay, it is certain, the world that wanteth the light of the Spirit of God (for the world is notable to receive him, (saith John) neither doth, nor shall know the beast, nor his marks, though he rage cruelly, and live ever so beastly, and though his marked men be in number like the sand of the sea. The Lord therefore vouchsafe to open the eyes of the blind with the light of grace, that they may see and perceive, and understand the words of God, after the mind of his Spirit. Amen.

Here remain two objections, which may seem weighty, and which may peradventure move many not to follow the former counsel. The former reason is, A man will say, O sir, it is no small matter you speak of, to depart from a man's own native country into a strange realm. Many men have so great hindrances, as how is it possible that they can, or may do so? Some have lands and possessions, which they cannot carry with them: some have, father, mother, wife, children, and kinsfolk, from whom to depart is as hard a thing (and all one almost) as to suffer death, and to go to a strange country that thou knowest not, neither the manner of the people, nor how thou mayst away either with the people, or with the country: or what a hard thing it is to live among a strange people, whose language thou dost not understand, &c.

I grant here thou mayst heap a number of worldly disadvantages, which are surely very likely to ensue the departure out of a man's native country, I mean out of the whole realm, into a strange land: but what of all these, and a thousand more of the like sort? I will set unto them one saying of our Saviour Christ, which unto the faithful child of God, and to the true christian, is able to countervail all these, yea, and to weigh them down. Christ our Saviour saith in Luke, "If any come to me, and do not hate his father and mother, [he meaneth, and will not in his cause forsake his father and mother] his wife, children, and brethren, yea and his life too, he cannot be my disciple: and whosoever doth not bear my cross, and come after me, he cannot be my disciple." And, in the same place, he declareth by the two parables, one of a builder, and the other of a king that is a warrior, that every man that will not, in Christ's cause, forsake all that ever he hath, he cannot be his disciple. Look the places who will; the matter is so plainly set forth, that no glosses, nor cloaking of conscience to the man of God, can serve to the contrary. Many places there be for the same purpose for the embracing of Christ's cross, when Christ and his cause layeth it upon our back; but this is so plain, that I need here rehearse no more.

This latter reason and objection, whereof I spake before, is of more force, and includeth a necessity, which, after the common saying, hath no law, and therefore it is more hard to shape for it a good answer. This may be objected of some; Alas, sir, I grant all these things do grieve me, and because I understand they do not agree with God's word, which is the rule of my conscience, I loath either to look on them, or to hear them. But, sir, alas, I am an impotent man, an aged man, a sick man, a lame man; or I have so many small infants, and a lame wife, who all live by my labour, and by my provision: if I leave them, they will starve, and I am not able to carry them with me, such is my state. Alas, sir, what shall I do? And these causes may chance to some men of God, whereby either it shall be for them utterly impossible to depart the country, or else in departing they shall be enforced to forsake such in extreme necessity, of whom both God and nature have committed unto them the care.

Alas! what counsel is here to be given? O lamentable state! O sorrowful heart! that neither can depart and without extreme danger and peril is not able to tarry still. And these are they whom our Saviour Christ saw before should be, and called them in his prophecy the latter time, great bellied, or travailing women, and women that give, after they be brought to bed, suck their babes. Of the state of such as are not able to resist the infection of the pestiferous plague of Antichrist's abominations, Christ lamenting, and not cursing, saith, "Woe be to the great bellied and travailing women, and women that give suck in those days." For the alas, my heart mourneth the more, the less I am able to give any comfortable counsel, but this; that always, they look for everlasting life, they abide still in the confession of his truth, whatsoever shall befall, and for the rest, to put their trust now wholly in God, who is able to save them against all appearance; and commonly in extremities, when all worldly comfort faileth, and danger is at highest, then unto him he is wont, after his accustomed mercy, to be most ready to put to his helping hand. God suffered Daniel to be cast into the den of lions, and the three children into the hot burning furnace, and yet he saved them all. Paul was plucked out of the mouth of the lion (as he saith of himself) and in Asia he was brought into such trouble, that he looked for nothing less than present death, and yet that raised the dead to life again, brought him out of his troubles and taught him and all others that be in trouble for Christ's cause, not to trust to themselves, but in Almighty God.

Of God's gracious aid in extreme perils towards them that put their trust in him, all scripture is full both old and new. What dangers were the patriarchs often times brought into, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, but of all others Joseph, and how mercifully were they delivered again? In what perils was Moses when he was fain to fly for the safeguard of his life? And when he was sent again to deliver the Israelites from their servile bondage? Not before they were brought into extreme misery. And when did the Lord mightily deliver his people from the sword of Pharaoh? Not before they were brought into such straits, that they were so encompassed on every side, the main sea on one side, and the main host on the other, that they could look for no other, (yea, what did they indeed else look for?) but either to have been drowned in the sea, or else to have fallen on the edge of Pharaoh's sword. Those judgments which wrought most wonderful things in the delivery of the people, were given when the people was brought to most misery before, as Orhniel, Ehud, Samgar, Gideon, Jephtha, Samson. And so was Saul endued with strength and boldness from above, against the Ammonites, Philistines, and Amalekites, for the defence of the people of God. David likewise felt God's help most sensibly ever in his extremest persecutions. What shall I speak of the prophets of God, whom God suffered so oft to be brought into extreme perils, and so mightily delivered them again; as Elias, Jeremiah, Daniel, and Jonah, and many others, whom it were too long to rehearse and set out at large? And did the Lord use his servants otherwise in the new law after Christ's incarnation? Read the Acts of the apostles, and you shall see no. Were not the apostles cast into prison, and brought out by the mighty hand of God? Did not the angel deliver Peter out of the strong prison, and bring him out by the iron gates of the city, and set him free? And when, I pray you? Even the same night before Herod appointed to have brought him to judgment to have slain him, as he had a little before killed James the brother of John. Paul and Silas, after they had been sore scourged, and were put into the inner prison, and there laid fast in the stocks. I pray you, what appearance was there that the magistrates should be glad to come the next day themselves to them, to desire them to be content, and to depart in peace? Who provided for Paul, that he should be safely conducted out of all danger, and brought to Felix the emperor's deputy, who as both the high-priest, the pharisees, and rulers of the Jews conspired to inquire judgment of death against him, he being fast in prison, and also more than forty ad sworn each one to another, that they would eat nor drink till they had killed Paul? A thing so foolish, that no reason could have invented, or man have looked for: God provided Paul his own prison, a young man that disappointed that conspiracy, and all their former conjuration. The manner of this thing came to pass, thou mayst read in Acts. I will not be tedious unto thee with the rest thereof.

Now to descend from the apostles to the martyrs that followed next in Christ's church, and in them likewise to see how gracious our good God ever hath been to them wonderfully with them who in his cause have been in extreme perils, it were matter enough to write a long volume. I will here name but one man and one woman, Arthanatius the great clerk and godly man, stoutly standing in Christ's cause against the Arians, and that woman Blandina, standing so constantly in all extremities, in the simple confession of Christ. If thou have examples of more, look and thou shalt have them, and an hundred more, in Eusebius's ecclesiastical history, and in Tripartita Historia.

But for all these examples, both of holy scripture, and of other histories, I fear me the weak man of God, burdened with the frailty and infirmity of the flesh, have now and then such thoughts and qualms (as I call them) to run over his heart, and to think thus: these things which are rehearsed out of the scripture believe to be true, and the rest truly I do think well, I can believe them also to be true; but all these we need grant were special miracles of God, which in our days are ceased, we see; and to require them of God's hands, were it not to tempt God?

Well, beloved brother, I grant such were great wonderful works of God, and we have not seen many such miracles in our time, either for that our sight is not clear, or else because we have not the like faith of them for whose cause God wrought such things, or because, after that he had set forth the truth of his doctrine by such miracles then sufficiently, the time of so many miracles to be done was expired. Which of these is the most special cause of all other, or whether there be any other, God knoweth; I leave that to God. But know thou this, I well beloved in God, that God's hand is as strong as ever it was, he may do what his gracious pleasure is, and he is as good and gracious as ever he was. Man change his garment doth; but God our heavenly Father even the same now that he was, and shall be for evermore.

The world without doubt (this I do believe, and therefore I say) draweth towards an end, and in all ages God hath had his own manner, after his secret and unsearchable wisdom, to use his elect, sometimes to deliver them, and keep them safe, and sometimes to suffer them to drink of Christ's cup, that is, to feel the smart, and to feel of the whip. And though the flesh smarteth at the one, and seeketh ease in the other, is glad of the one, and sore vexed in the other; yet the Lord is all one towards them in both, and loveth them no less when he suffereth them to be beaten, yea, and to be put to bodily death, than when he worketh wonders for their marvellous delivery. Now, he doth rather more for them, when in anguish of the torments he standeth by them, and strengtheneth them in their faith, to suffer in the confession of the truth and his faith, the bitter pangs of death, than when he openeth the prison door and letteth them go loose: for here he doth but respite them to another time, and leaveth them in danger to fall in like peril again; and there he maketh them perfect, to be without danger, pain or peril, after that for evermore. But this his love towards them, howsoever the world doth judge of it, is all one, both when he delivereth, and when he suffereth them to be put to death. He loved as well Peter and Paul, when (after they had, according to his blessed will, pleasure and providence, finished their courses, and done their services appointed them by him here in preaching of his gospel) the one was beheaded, and the other was hanged and crucified by the cruel tyrant Nero, as the ecclesiastical history saith, as when he sent the angel to bring Peter out of prison, and for Paul's delivery he made all the doors of the prison to fly wide open, and the foundation of the same, like an earthquake, to tremble and shake.

Thinkest thou, O thou man of God, that Christ our Saviour had less affection to the first martyr St. Stephen, because he suffered his enemies even at the first conflict to stone him to death? No surely; nor James, John's brother, who was one of the three that Paul called primates or principals amongst the apostles of Christ. He loved him never a whit the worse than he did the other, although he suffered Herod the tyrant's sword to cut off his head. Nay, doth not Daniel say, speaking of the cruelty of Antichrist's time, And the learned (he meaneth truly learned in God's law) shall reach many, and shall fall upon the sword, and in the flame, (that is, shall be burned in the flaming fire) and in captivity (that is, shall be in prison, and be spoiled and robbed of their goods for a long season). And afterwards in the same place of Daniel it followeth, And of the learned there be, which shall fall or be overthrown, that they may be known, tried, chosen, and made fresh and lusty. If that then was foreseen to be done to the godly learned, and for such gracious causes, let every one to whom any such thing by the will of God doth chance, be merry in God and rejoice, for it is to God's glory, and to his own everlasting wealth. Wherefore well is he that ever he was born, for whom thus graciously God hath provided, having grace of God, and strength of the Holy Ghost to stand stedfastly in the height of the storm. Happy is he that ever he was born, whom God his heavenly Father hath vouchsafed to appoint to glorify him, and to edify his church by the effusion of his blood.

To die in Christ's cause is an high honour, to which no man certainly shall or can aspire, but to whom God vouchsafeth that dignity: for no man is allowed to presume to take upon himself any office of honour, but he who is thereunto called of God. Therefore John saith well, speaking of them who have obtained the victory by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of his testimony, that they loved not their lives, even unto death.

And our Saviour Christ saith, "He that shall lose his life for my cause shall find it." And this manner of speech pertaineth not to one kind of christians (as the world doth wickedly dream), but to all that do truly pertain unto Christ. For when Christ had called unto him the multitude together with his disciples, he said unto them (mark that he said not this to the disciples and apostles only, but he said it to all), Whosoever will follow me, let him forsake and deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me: for whosoever will save his life shall lose it (he meaneth, whosoever will, to save his life, forsake or leave him and his truth), and whosoever shall lose his life for my cause and the gospel's sake, shall save it. For what shall it profit a man if he shall win the whole world, and lose his own soul, his own life? or what shall a man give to recompense that loss of his own life, and of his own soul? Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and my words (that is, to confess me and my gospel) before this sinful and adulterous generation, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father, with the holy angels. Know thou, O man of God, that all things are ordained for thy behoof, and to the furtherance of thee, towards thy salvation. All things, saith Paul, worketh with the good to goodness, even the enemies of God, and such kind of punishments whereby they go about to destroy them, shall be forced by God's power, might, and fatherly providence, to do them service.

It is not as the wicked thinketh, that poverty, adversity, sickness, tribulation, yea painful death of the godly, be tokens that God doth not love them; but even clean the contrary, as all the whole course of scripture doth evidently declare: for then he would never have suffered his most dearly beloved, the patriarchs, to have had such troubles, his prophets, his apostles, his martyrs, and chief champions and maintainers of his truth and gospel, so cruelly by the wicked to have been murdered and slain. Of whom some were racked, as the apostle saith, and would not be delivered, that they might receive a better resurrection. Some were tried by mockings and scourgings, yea, moreover by bonds and imprisonment: they were stoned, they were sawn asunder, they were tempted, they were slain with the sword, they wandered up and down in sheep-skins and goat-skins, being forsaken, afflicted, and tormented, such men as the world was not worthy to have, wandering in wildernesses, in mountains, in dens and caves of the earth. All these were approved by the testimony of faith, and received the promise, because God provided better for us, that without us they should not be consummated. They tarry for us now undoubtedly, longing for the day: but they are commanded to have patience yet (saith the Lord) a little while, until the number of their fellow-servants be fulfilled, and of their brethren which are not yet slain, as they were.

Now (thou, O man of God) for our Lord's sake, let us not for the love of this life, tarry then too long, and be occasion of delay of that glorious consummation, in hope of expectation whereof they departed in the Lord, and which also the living indued with God's Spirit, ought so earnestly to desire and to groan for with all the creatures of God. Let us all, with John the servant of God, cry in our hearts unto our Saviour Christ, Come, Lord Jesus, come. For then when Christ, who is our life, shall be made manifest, and appear in glory, then shall the children of God appear what they be, even like unto Christ: for this our weak body shall be transfigured, and made like unto Christ's glorious body, and that by the power whereby he is able to subdue all things unto himself. Then that which is now corruptible, shall be made incorruptible: that which now is vile, shall be made glorious: that which is now weak, shall rise then mighty and strong: that which is gross and carnal, shall be made fine and spiritual: for then we shall see and have the unspeakable joy and fruition of the glorious Majesty of our Lord, even as he is.

Who, or what then shall hinder us to jeopard, yea, to spend this life which we have here in Christ's cause? O therefore, thou man of God, thou that art laden, and so hindered like unto a pregnant woman, that thou canst not fly the plague, yet if thou lust after such things as I have spoken of, stand fast, whatsoever shall beset, in thy master's cause; and take this thy hindrance to fly, for a calling of God to fight in thy master Christ's cause. Of this be thou certain, they can do nothing unto thee, which thy Father is not aware of, or hath not foreseen before: they can do no more than it shall please him to suffer them to do for the furtherance of his glory, edifying of his church, and thine own salvation. Let them then do what they shall, seeing to thee, O man of God, all things shall be forced to serve, and to work with thee unto the best before God. O be not afraid, and remember the end.

All this which I have spoke for the comfort of the lamentable case of the man whom Christ called great bellied woman, I mean to be spoke likewise to the captive and prisoner in God's cause: for such I count to be as it were already summoned and pressed to fight under the banner of the cross of Christ, and as it were soldiers allowed and taken up for the Lord's wars, to do their Lord and master good and honourable service, and to stick to him, as men of trusty service in his cause, even unto death, and to think their life lost in his cause, is to win it in eternal glory for evermore.

Therefore, now to conclude and make an end of this treatise, I say unto all that love God our heavenly Father, that love Christ Jesus our Redeemer and Saviour; that love to follow the ways of the Holy Ghost, which is the comforter and sanctifier; unto all that love Christ's spouse and body, the true catholic church of Christ, yea, that love life and their own soul's health; I say unto all these, hearken, my dear brethren and sisters, all you that be of God, of all sorts, ages, dignities, or degrees; hearken to the words of our Saviour Jesus Christ, spoken to his apostles, and meant to all his in St. Matthew's gospel, Fear not them which kill the body, for they cannot kill the soul; but fear him more which may destroy and cast both body and soul into hell-fire. Are not two small sparrows sold for a farthing, and one of them shall not fall or light upon the ground without your Father? All the hairs of your head are numbered. Fear them not, you are much more valuable than are the little sparrows. Every one that confesseth me before men, him shall I likewise confess before my Father which is in heaven. But whosoever shall deny me before men, I shall deny him likewise before my Father which is in heaven.

The Lord grant us therefore of his heavenly grace and strength, that here we may so confess him in this world amongst this adulterous and sinful generation, that he may confess us again at the latter day before his Father which is in heaven, to our glory and to our lasting comfort, joy, and salvation.

To our heavenly Father, to our Saviour and Redeemer Jesus Christ, and to the Holy Ghost, be all honour now and for ever. Amen.

NICHOLAS RIDLEY

The History of STEPHEN GARDINER, Bishop of WINCHESTER.

THE next month after the burning of Dr. Ridley and Mr. Latimer, which was the month of November, Stephen Gardiner, bishop, and chancellor, a man hated of God and all good men, ended his wicked life. This viper's bird crept out of the town of Ipswich in Suffolk, was brought up most part of his youth in Cambridge; his wit, capacity, memory, and other endowments of nature, were not to be complained of, if he had well used, and rightly applied the same; whereas there was no great want of God's part in him, if he had not rather himself wanted to the goodness of his gifts. Through this promptness, activity, and towardness of his, he profited not a little in such studies as he gave his head unto, as first in the civil law, then in languages, and such other like, especially in those arts and faculties which had any prospect to dignity and preferment to be hoped for. Besides other ornaments or help of nature, memory chiefly seemed in him very beneficial, rather than diligence of study.

To these gifts or qualities were joined again his great or greater vices, which not so much followed him, as overtook him, and made him burdensome to the whole realm. He was of a proud stomach, and high-minded, in his own opinion and conceit flattering himself too much; in wit, crafty and subtle; towards his superiors, flattering and fair spoken; to his inferiors, fierce; against his equals, stout and envious, especially if in judgment and sentence they any thing withstood him, as appeared between the good lord Cromwel and him, in the reign of king Henry the Eighth. Who, although he would give no place to men, yet notwithstanding I wish he would have given place to truth, according as he seemed not altogether ignorant of the truth. What his knowledge was therein is evident, partly by his book De vera Obedientia, as also by his sermon before king Edward; also by his answers to the council the same time, and moreover by his own words it may be gathered in sundry places, as more plainly may appear by that which hereafter followeth.

Upon his estimation and fame he stood too much, more than was proper for a man of his coat and calling, whose profession was to be crucified unto the world, which thing made him so stiff in maintaining that which he once begun to take upon him.

What his learning was in the civil and canon law I have not to say: what it was in other liberal arts and sciences, this I suppose, that neither his continuance in study, nor diligence of reading was such (by reason of his too much intermeddling in prince's matter) as could truly well merit unto him the title of a deep learned man. But what learning or cunning soever it was he had, so it fared in him, as it doth in butchers, which use to blow up their flesh: even so he with boldness and stoutness, and especially with authority, made those gifts that he had, to appear much greater than they really were. Whereunto use peradventure, and experience abroad he no little helps, rather than either quickness of or happiness of education. And as touching divinity, he was so variable, wavering with time, that no constant censure can be given to make of him. If his doings and writings wereording to his conscience, no man can rightly say whether he was a right protestant or papist. If he wrote otherwise than he thought, for fear, or to bear with, then was he a deep dissembler before God and, to say and unsay, to write and unwrite, to swear and forswear as he did. For first in the beginning of queen Anne Bullen's time, who was so forward or so in the matter of the king's divorce as Stephen Gardiner, who was first sent to Rome, and then to the emperor, with Edward Fox, as chief agent in the behalf of the Anne? By whom also he was preferred to the bishopric of Winchester, and Edward Bonner was preferred to the bishopric of London. Again, at the bidding of the pope, who so ready to swear, or so content to write against the pope as he, not only by sermons, but also by his book De Obedientia may be seen? In which book, lest any should think him otherwise than by his own consent, he declared, how not rashly nor on a sudden, but on a long deliberation and advertisement in himself of the matter, he at length uttered his judgment: moreover, so he uttered his judgment in writing in the usurped supremacy of the pope, that coming to Louvain afterward, he was there accounted a person to communicate and a schismatic, inasmuch that he was permitted in their church to say mass; and moreover, in their public sermons they openly cried out against him. Whereof read hereafter.

and thus long continued he firm and forward, so that about Winchester during all the reign of queen Anne? After her decease, that time by little and little carried him on, till at length the emulation of the lord Cromwell's, and especially (as it seemeth) for his so much pouring of Bonner (whom Winchester at that time in case could abide) made him an utter enemy both against him, and also his religion: till again in king Edward's days, he began a little to rebate from certain points of popery, and somewhat to smell of the gospel, both by his sermon before king Edward, as also by subscribing to certain articles, may appear; and this was an half turn of Stephen Gardiner from popery to the gospel, and (no doubt) he would have been turned, had not the unlucky decay of the duke of Somerset clean turned him away from true divinity, to plain popery; wherein he continued a cruel persecutor to his dying day.

and thus much concerning the trade and profession of Stephen Gardiner's popish divinity. In which his popish trade, whether he followed more true judgment, of his time, or rather the spirit of ambition and vanity, it is doubtful to say, and so much the more doubtful, because in his doings and writings a man may see not only contrary to himself, but also in some points contrary to other papists. And furthermore, where he agreeth with them, he seemeth therein not so much to follow his own sense, as the mind and meaning of the pope; out of whose book the greatest part of Winchester's divinity seemeth to be borrowed.

and therefore as in the true knowledge of God's holy word and scripture he appeareth nobody; so in his pen and style of writing no less far is he from commendation, as he is from all plainness and perspicuity. In whose style and perplexed kind of writing, although peradventure some sense may be found with some searching, shall no reader find any sweetness in his reading.

What moved him to be so sturdy against Mr. Cheek, for Thomas Smith, for the Greek pronunciation, as may think what they please; I speak but what I know, that so he did, for that he saw it a thing rather newly begun, than truly impugned. Such was the disposition of that man (as it seemeth) that of purpose he ever affected to seem to be a patron of old customs, though they were ever so rotten with age. Amongst other matters, this one I cannot but marvel at in my mind, when I see how proudly he braggeth, and vainly vaunteth himself (as well in his letters to the lord protector, and others of king Edward's council, as also in his long matter articulated and exhibited before the archbishop of Canterbury, and other the king's commissioners) of the high favour he had of the noble king of famous memory, king Henry the Eighth, when indeed nothing was less true; neither did the king less favour any of his council, than him, affirming very often, that he greatly suspected the said bishop to be a secret maintainer of the bishop of Rome's usurped authority, and a stout disturber and hinderer of his proceedings in reformation of religion. And therefore he did so much dislike him, that he did not only mind (if it had pleased God to grant his highness longer life) to have used the extremity of the law against him, upon very fore and just matter of old committed by him (and yet not taken away by any pardon), thereupon often commanding the lord Paget, then his secretary, to keep safe certain writings which he had against him; but also commanded that he should be put clean out of his last will and testament, not suffering him either to be one of his executors, or in any case to be of his son's council, no, although he were earnestly intreated to the contrary by sundry of the lords, and others of his highness's council, saying, he was a wilful, troublesome, and headstrong man, and not meet to be about his son, or to have any thing to do by his will. Now, amongst other causes that moved the king thus to suspect his fidelity towards his godly proceedings in religion, I find this to be one. It pleased his majesty, after his abolishing the bishop of Rome's usurped authority (amongst other embassages to foreign princes), to send the said bishop of Winchester, and sir Henry Knevet, knight, as joint ambassadors to the emperor, being then at a diet or council at Ratibon, appointing also sir Henry Barkley, sir William Blunt, knights, and Andrew Bainton, esquire, (their highnesses servants) to give their attendance upon the said sir Henry Knevet, for the more honouring of his embassy. It happened also at that time, that sir Henry Knevet entertained in his service (as steward of his household) one William Wolfe, who had in the same capacity before served sir Thomas Wyat, knight, the king's former ambassador there, and by that means had good acquaintance in those parts, as well in the emperor's court, as elsewhere. This Wolfe, towards the latter end of the diet or council, happened to walk (as often he did) towards the emperor's palace to hear some news, where he met with one Ludovico, an Italian merchant, one of his old acquaintance. Who, supposing the said Wolfe to have attended upon the bishop of Winchester, (not knowing of any other joint ambassador) required Wolfe, for old acquaintance, to do him a pleasure; whereunto he willingly granted. Whereupon Ludovico shewed him, that the pope's legate, or ambassador to the emperor (which was cardinal Contarene) departing the day before towards Rome, and having no leisure to end his business himself, had put the said Ludovico in trust for the accomplishing of them: and amongst all other things he had especially charged him, that he should repair to the ambassador of England, and require of him an answer to the pope's letters, which the legate did of late send unto him, addressed to him from Rome, and that upon the receipt thereof he should send them after with all speed; and therefore if his lord ambassador would write by that courier, he prayed Wolfe to tell him that it was time to write, for the courier went away within a day or two. At this tale Wolfe being abashed, and yet partly guessing which ambassador he meant, thought it not meet to tell him whose servant he was, but by other soothing talk found that he meant the bishop of Winchester. And to the end that Ludovico should suspect nothing, he answered him, that he being not the ambassador's secretary, could say little therein; however he would not fail to put his secretary in remembrance of it: which thing Ludovico

Ludovico also desired him to do, for that he had no other acquaintance with the ambassador, and so for that time they departed. This matter seeming to Wolfe of some importance, he immediately revealed it to sir Henry Knevet, his master: who weighing also the greatness of the case, and what disadvantage it were upon one man's bare report to attempt aught, in a place and time whereby such a person was to be touched, charged Wolfe well to advise himself, that no hatred, displeasure, or other passion, did move him to disclose this, but truth only. Wolfe replied, That he weighed well the weightiness of the cause, meet, as to his own respect, to be passed over in silence, for avoiding of his private displeasure, if the duty of allegiance bound him not otherwise. But sir, (says he) if you think not my hearing thereof, one to one, to be sufficient, I warrant you to devise means that some other of your servants shall hear the like words from Ludovico's own mouth as well as I. Upon which sir Henry Knevet devised which of his servants he might use to that purpose, and at last rested upon Mr. Thomas Chalenor, his secretary, because he had the Italian tongue. Not making him privy to any matter, but desired Wolfe to take him abroad with him as of his own private motion, for they were very familiar friends. Whereupon the next morning, being Sunday, Wolfe came to Chalenor's chamber, and prayed him familiarly to take a walk with him abroad to the Piazza, or Market-stead, which he readily did, not knowing of any special cause why. When they came to the Piazza, over against the emperor's palace, (near whereunto also the pope's legate had lodged) and had there walked a while together, there came thither the said Ludovico, and espying Wolfe, saluted him very friendly, and entered into talk about the Exchange, and sundry other matters, Chalenor being still with them. At last upon an occasion, they entered into a little talk about the former letters that the ambassador of England had received from Rome by the pope's legate, of which Ludovico had in charge to receive an answer, affirming that the post departed the next day, and therefore prayed Wolfe to put the ambassador's secretary in remembrance of them. Whereunto Wolfe answered, That he would willingly do it; but he did not well know which ambassador he meant, for that there were two; one, the bishop of Winchester, and the other, a gentleman of the king's privy chamber. To whom Ludovico replied, That he meant not the gentleman of the privy chamber, but the bishop. By which talk, and much such like, (as upon the former day) Mr. Chalenor being moved, (and not knowing yet of his master's and Wolfe's purpose) after the departure of Ludovico from them, said unto Wolfe, that Ludovico had had but homely talk with him, not to be passed over lightly, and therefore he would tell his master of it. To whom Wolfe answered, Do as you will, if you think any matter therein. And therefore at his return home, he told sir Henry Knevet what speech he had heard at Ludovico's mouth.

Sir Henry Knevet being thus further ascertained of the matter, opened the whole to sir John Barkley, sir William Blunt, and to Mr. William Bainton, who all agreed yet to make a further trial thereof. And therefore devised that Wolfe should procure Ludovick to bring certain velvets, and other silks, unto sir Henry Knevet's lodging, as well for himself as for the other gentlemen, which that afternoon he did accomplish, and brought Ludovick unto sir Henry, where also were the other gentlemen. After they had awhile viewed the silks, and had some talk about the price, Wolfe took occasion again to ask Ludovick, if sir Henry was the ambassador of whom he was to demand an answer of the letters sent by the pope's legate? To whom the merchant answered, No, it was not his feigniory, but it was a bishop, terming him Reverendissimo, whereby they easily perceived whom he meant. Sir Henry Knevet hereupon somewhat dissembling the matter, entered into further talk about it, whereby Ludovick opened as much in effect to them, as he had done before to Wolfe; but yet at last perceiving that as well sir Henry, as also the other gentlemen, beheld him somewhat angrily, he broke off his talk. Wherewith sir Henry Knevet, making as though he had noted nothing, did lovingly dismiss him, praying him, that when he had received the bishop's letters, he would also repair to him for a packet to an English gentleman of his acquaintance at Milan; who he promised to do, and so departed again. When Henry had thus made sufficient trial of this matter, forthwith wrote his letters unto the king's majesty, signifying unto him the whole at large, as he had learned. In meanwhile Ludovick the next morning repaired to bishop of Winchester's lodging, to demand an answer of those letters the legate had sent unto him: but how used himself, or whether he uttered the discourse he had with sir Henry Knevet, and with Wolfe, whom he supposed at first to be the bishop's man, is not certainly known. But the bishop perceiving, that by mistaking one for another, (and in supposing Wolfe to be the bishop's servant) Ludovick had uttered all his message from the legate unto Wolfe, and that thereby his practice was come to light; in great haste and rage he caused Ludovick to be stayed in his own house, while in the meantime himself went to Gravela, one of the emperor's council, and so practised with him, that Ludovick was secretly committed to prison, in the custody of one of the emperor's marshals, and so as he could no more talk with, all the time of their abode there. And then sending in great haste to sir Henry Knevet, to come and speak with him, (which he did) he fell in a very hot speech with him, saying, that he had perceived his dith, and that a knave was suborned to be his destruction; with many such like words. Sir Henry told him again how he understood it: and prayed him, that Ludovick might be brought face to face, to be examined in both their presences. Which the bishop would in no case agree unto, affirming, that he had also declared the case to Gravela, being indifferent (as he thought) to them both, that he would not meddle with Ludovick nor speak with him: but that the emperor's council should examine him, and try what he was for him. To whom sir Henry Knevet again very earnestly objected, That he marvelled that the bishop in matters touching the king's majesty, their master, would use the aid means of Gravela, a foreign prince's minister, to make him privy of their question. But say and do what he could, he would never come to the speech of Ludovick any more ever after. Whereupon there arose great long controversies between them, (both writing unto the king about that matter) until at last the king's majesty perceiving his affairs otherwise to slack thereby, wrote to them both, that they should lay all those things unto foot, and join together in his service as before; which they did accordingly. But howsoever this matter was salved herewith the king's majesty, as either by the death of sir Henry Knevet, (which I think was not long after) or by other friends the bishop had hereat home, I know not; yet Wolfe, who within two months after died of a long cough of the lungs, upon his death-bed did again affirm the premises to be most true; and therefore in the presence of sir Henry Knevet, and divers of his servants, he protested, that he had not invented, sought or procured this at Ludovick's hands, for any malice or displeasure borne to the bishop, but only for discharge of his faith and duty unto the king's majesty, desiring that the same his protestation might be inserted in the end of his last will and testament, which was then presently done, and thereunto he set his hand.

Now, whether this was the matter that the king's majesty so often Mr. Secretary Paget (being after lord keeper) kept safe as fore matter against the bishop, I know not; but yet it appears by some depositions of the nobles and others, in the process had against him in king Edward's days, that the king's majesty, Henry VIII. kept this matter ever in his mind: for in every general pardon that he granted by parliament after this practice, he did still except all treasons committed beyond the seas; meaning thereby, as it was supposed, that the bishop should not take any benefit by any general pardon, if at any time his majesty would call him to account: and therefore all things well weighed, he had small cause to vaunt of his great favour he had with king Henry, his master. Howbeit, it seemeth that he was brought into this fool's paradise by lord Paget; himself reporteth in his depositions) in his messages the king to the said bishop, deluded him, telling much otherwise than the king spoke, and concealing the kings hard speeches against him, which thing is up this vain-glorious boaster not a little. I refer to his judge, to whom he shall stand or fall. As touching his death and manner thereof, I would they were present thereat, would testify to us what they think we have all to think, that his death happened purposely, that England hath a mighty cause to thank to the Lord for it: not so much for the great things done in times past in perverting his princes, in going in the six articles, in murdering God's saints, in denying Christ's sincere religion, &c. but also and especially for that he had thought to have brought to pass in England also the lady Elizabeth. For whatsoever death that she was in, it did (no doubt) proceed from the bloody bishop, who was the cause thereof. It is certain which we have heard, that her highness being in the Tower, a writ came down from certain council for her execution, it is not out of controversy that Winchester was the framer of that engine, who (doubt) in that one day, had brought this whole into woful ruin, had not the Lord's most gracious counsel, through Mr. Bridges then the lieutenant, being in haste to the queen, certified her of the matter, prevented his bloody devices. For which thanks to the same, our Lord and Saviour, in the congregation of all English churches, Amen.

Things uncertain, I must speak uncertainly, for I have no fuller information, or else peradventure there is some in the realm can say more than I have here expressed. For as Bonner, Story, Thornton, Harpsfield, and others, were occupied in putting the poor souls of God's saints to death; so this bishop for his part, spent all his devices, and had spent all his powder filling the root, and in casting such a platform, he himself in words at his death is said to confess) to his popery upon, as he thought should have stood ever. But (as I said before) of things uncertain, I speak uncertainly. Wherefore as touching the manner of his death, how rich he died, what words he spoke, what little repentance he shewed, whether he died with his tongue swollen, and out of his mouth, as did Thomas Arundel, archbishop of Canterbury, or whether he sunk before he died, as cardinal Wolsey did, whether he died in despair, as Latomus and others say, &c. All this I refer to their reports of whom I will not write, or leave it to the knowledge of them who can tell better.

Notwithstanding, here by the way, touching the death of the aforesaid bishop, I thought not to overlook a certain here-say, which not long since came to my information of a certain worthy and creditable gentleman, and another gentleman of the same name and kindred, which Mrs. Mundy, the wife of Mr. Mundy, some time secretary to the old lord Thomas, duke of Norfolk, a present witness of this that his testimony, thus openly reported in the house of a worshipful citizen, bearing yet office in this city, words and effect as followeth. The same day as bishops Ridley and Latimer suffered at Oxford, being about the 19th day of November, there came into the house of Stephen Gardiner the old duke of Norfolk, with the aforesaid Mr. Mundy, his secretary, above-named, reporter hereof. The old aged duke, there waiting for his dinner, the bishop being not yet disposed to dine, deferred the time till three or four o'clock in the afternoon. At length about four o'clock cometh his servant posting from Oxford, bringing intelligence to the bishop what he had heard and what of whom the said bishop diligently inquiring the truth of the matter, and hearing by his man that fire most certainly was set unto them, cometh out rejoicing to the duke. Now, said he, let us go to dinner. Whereupon being sat down, meat immediately was brought, and the bishop began merrily to eat. But what followeth? The bloody tyrant had not eaten a few bits, but a sudden stroke of God's terrible hand fell upon him of such sort, as immediately he was taken from the table.

ble, and so brought to his bed, where he continued the space of fifteen days in such intolerable anguish and torments, that all that mean while during the fifteen days, he could not void by urine or otherwise, any thing that he received: whereby his body being miserably inflamed within, (who had inflamed so many good martyrs before) was brought to a wretched end. And therefore, no doubt, as most likely it is, came the thrusting out of his tongue from his mouth, so swollen and black, with the inflammation of his body. A spectacle worthy to be noted and beheld of all such bloody and burning persecutors.

But to proceed farther in the sequel of our story: I could name the man (but I abstain from names), who being then present, and a great doer about the said Winchester, reported to us concerning the said bishop, that when Dr. Day, bishop of Chichester, came to him, and began to comfort him with words of God's promise, and with the free justification in the blood of Christ our Saviour, repeating the scriptures to him; Winchester hearing that, What, my lord, (quoth he) will you open the gap now? then farewell all together. To me, and such others in my case, you may speak it, but open this window to the people, then farewell altogether.

Moreover, what Dr. Bonner then saw in him, or what he heard of him, and what words passed between them about the time of this extremity, betwixt him and him be it. If Bonner did there behold any thing which might turn to his good example, I exhort him to take it, and to beware in time, as I pray God he may. Here I could bring in the frivolous epitaph that was made on his death, devised by a papist for a popish bishop, but I omit it, and instead thereof I have here inserted certain things gathered out of his sermons, words, and writings, wherein may appear what an earnest and vehement enemy he was to the pope, if he would have been constant in himself; and how inconstantly he varied from himself; and also how he, standing upon the singularity of his own wit, varied from other papists in certain points. In gathering whereof, although there be some pains, and tediousness also in reading; yet I thought not to omit the same, upon certain considerations, namely, for that so many yet to this day there be, who stick so much to Gardiner's wit, learning, and religion, taking him for such a substantial pillar of the pope's church. To the intent therefore, that such as hitherto have been deceived by him, may no longer be abused, therein, if they will either credit his own works, words, sermons, writings, disputations; or else will be judged by his own witnesses of his own party produced, we have here collected such manifest probations, which may notoriously declare how effectually first he withstood the pope's supremacy: and likewise afterward may declare the manifest contrariety and repugnancy of the said Gardiner, first with other writers, and lastly with himself: first beginning with his sermon preached before king Edward. The sum and effect of which sermon, briefly collected by Mr. Udal, hereunder followeth.

The Sum and Effect of Bp. GARDINER's SERMON, preached before KING EDWARD, Anno 1550.

MOST honourable audience, I purpose, by the grace of God, to declare some part of the gospel that is accustomed to be read in the church at this day. And because that without the special grace of God, neither can I speak any thing to your edifying, nor ye receive the same accordingly, I shall desire you all that we may jointly pray all together for the assistance of his grace. In which prayer I commend to Almighty God your most excellent majesty, our sovereign lord king of England, France, and Ireland, and of the church of England and Ireland, next and immediately under God here on earth, the supreme head; queen Catharine dowager, my lady Mary's grace, my lady Elizabeth's grace, your majesty's most dear sisters; my lord protector's grace, with all others of your most honourable council, the spirituality and temporality; and I shall desire you to commend unto God with your prayer, the souls departed unto God in Christ's faith, and amongst these,

These, most especially, our late sovereign lord king Henry VIII. your majesty's most noble father. For these and for grace necessary, I shall desire you to say a Pater Noster and so forth.

The GOSPEL beginneth, Matthew xvi. 13, 14, 15, 16.

When Jesus was come into the parts of Cesarea, a city that Philipus builded, he asked his disciples, and said, Whom do men say that the Son of Man is? They said, Some that thou art John the Baptist, some that thou art Elias, some that thou art Jeremiah, or some one of the prophets. He said to them, But whom do ye say that I am? Then answered Simon Peter, and said, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God, &c.

I Cannot have time, I think, to speak of the gospel thoroughly, for other matters that I have here now to say, but I shall note unto you such things as I may; and first, of the diversity of opinions concerning Christ, which were among the people variable: but among this, that is, the disciples of Christ's school, there was no variety, they agreed all together in one truth, and among them there was no variety. For when Peter had, for all the rest, and in the name of all the rest, made his answer, that Christ was the Son of God, they all confessed with one consent, that he had spoken the truth. Yet these opinions of Christ that the people had of him, though they were sundry, yet they were honourable and not slanderous: for to say that Christ was Elias, and John the Baptist, was honourable: for some thought him so to be, because he did frankly, sharply, and openly rebuke vice. They that called him Jeremiah, had also an honourable opinion of him, and thought him so to be, because of his great learning which they perceived in him, and marvelled where he had it. And they that said he was one of the prophets, had an honourable opinion of him, and favoured him, and thought well of him.

But there was another sort of people that spake evil of him, and slandered him, and railed on him, saying that he was a glutton, and a drinker of wine; that he had a devil in him; that he was a deceiver of the people; that he was a carpenter's son, as though he were the worse for his father's craft. But of those he asked no question: for among these none agreed with the other. Wherein ye shall note, that man of his own power and strength can do nothing: no, nothing that is good can he do of his own invention or device, but erreth and faileth; when he is left to his own invention, he erreth in his imagination. So proud is man, and so stout of his own courage, that he deviseth nothing well, whensoever he is left to himself without God; and then never do any such agree in any truth, and wander and err in all that they do. As men of law, if they be asked their opinion in any point touching the law, ye shall not have two of them agree in opinion: if there be two or three of them asked their opinion in any matter, if they should answer all one thing, they fear lest they should be supposed and thought to have no learning. Therefore be they ever so many of them, they will not agree in their answers, but devise each man a sundry answer in any thing that they are asked.

The philosophers that were not of Christ's school erred every one in their vain opinions, and no one of them agreeth with the other.

Yea, men of simplicity, though they meant well, yet being out of Christ's school, they varied and agreed not in their opinions of Christ, though they thought well of him. Some said he was John, some Elias, some Jeremiah, but none made the right answer. He that answered here, was Simon the son of Jonas, and he said, Thou art Christ the son of the living God.

Here ye may note the properties that were in Peter. He was called Simon, which is obedience, and Jonas is a dove; so that in him, that is of Christ's school, must be these two properties, obedience and simplicity. He must be humble and innocent as a dove, that will be of Christ's school. Pride is a hindrance of Christ's school; for as the wise man saith, God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble and meek. And according to the same doth Christ in the gospel say, Oh

Father, I confess unto thee, that is, I laud and magnify thee, for that thou hast hidden these things from the wise, and hast opened them unto the little ones. Whereupon saith St. Augustine, that the gifts of learning and knowledge of sciences are no hindrance to Christ's school, but a furtherance thereunto, if they be well applied and used as they ought to be: but he that is proud, and feedeth himself, with his own conceit and opinion of himself, and abuseth the gifts of God applying his learning and knowledge to the satisfaction and following of his own fantasy, is no right disciple of Christ, but falleth into error. When they said and affirmed themselves to be wise, they were made fools.

The philosophers had every one a sect of his own, and had many gay sentences for the commendation of their opinions, and every man thought his own opinion to be best: but because they applied all to their own pride and glory, and not to the honour of God, nor humbled themselves as they ought to have done, but followed their own fantasy, they erred and fell out of the way, and were not of Christ's school: and all that have gone out of Christ's school, pride hath brought them out of it; as such as have not entered, have kept themselves out of it with pride likewise: therefore all such as will be scholars of Christ's school and discipline, must be humble and meek, otherwise, when they said and affirmed themselves to be wise, they were made fools.

He that cannot learn this lesson of Peter, and humbly confess with him, that Christ is the Son of the living God, is no scholar of Christ's school, be he otherwise ever so well learned, ever so well read in other sciences. But now concerning the answer of Peter, Matthew saith in this place, saith he answered, "Thou art Christ the Son of the living God." And St. Luke saith, he answered, "Thou art the Christ of God." And St. Mark saith, he answered, "Thou art the Christ." But in all that is no variety: for to say, Christ the Son of the living God, and to say, The Christ of God, and to say, Thou art Christ, is in effect all one, and no diversity in it, for Christ alone is the whole; and he that confesseth thoroughly Christ, is thoroughly a christian man, and doth thereby confess him to be the Lord and Saviour of the world. But now we must consider what Christ is; he was sent to be our Messiah, our Saviour: he was sent to be our bishop, and also our sacrifice: he was sent from the Trinity to be our Mediator between God and us, and to reconcile us to the favour of God the Father: he was the bishop that offered for our sins, and the sacrifice that was offered: and as he is our bishop, so he is our mean to pacify God for us, for that was the office of a bishop to sacrifice for the sins of the people, and to make intercession for the people; and as he was our sacrifice, so was he our reconciliation to God again.

But we must confess and believe him thoroughly I say for as he was our bishop then, so it is he that still keepeth us in favour with God: and like as his sacrifice that was made was sufficient to deliver us from our sins, and to bring us in favour with God; so to continue us in the same favour of God, he ordained a perpetual remembrance of himself, he ordained himself for a memory of himself at his last supper, when he instituted the sacrament of the altar, not for another redemption as though the world needed a new redemption from sin, but that we might thoroughly remember his most holy passion, he instituted the sacrament by his most holy word, saying, "This is my body," which word is sufficient to prove the sacrament, and maketh sufficiently for the substance thereof. And this daily sacrifice he instituted to be continued among christian men, not for need of another redemption or satisfaction for the sins of the world, for that was sufficiently performed by the sacrifice of his body and blood done upon the cross; neither that he is now our bishop for need of any further sacrifice to be made for sin to continue us in the remembrance of his passion suffered for us, to make us strong in believing the fruit of his passion, to make us diligent in thanksgiving for the benefit of his passion, to establish our faith, and to make it strong in acknowledging the efficacy of his death and passion suffered for us. And this is the true understanding of the mass, not for another redemption.

emption, but that we may be strong in believing the merits of Christ's death and blood-shedding for us on the cross. And this it is that we must believe of Christ, and believe it thoroughly: and therefore by our patience, as Peter made his confession, so will I make confession; wherein, by your majesty's leave and licence, I will plainly declare what I think of the state of the church of England at this day, how I like it, and what I think of it.

Where I said of the mass, that it was a sacrifice ordained to make us the more strong in the faith and remembrance of Christ's passion, and for commending unto God the souls of such as be dead in Christ, (for these things are the special causes why the mass was instituted) the parliament very well ordained mass to be so; and because we should be the more strong in the faith and devotion towards God, it was very well done by the parliament, for moving the people more and more to devotion, to ordain that the sacrament should be received in both kinds. Therefore I say, that the order of parliament for receiving the sacrament of the mass in both kinds, was well made.

I say also, that the proclamation which was made, that no man should irreverently speak of the sacrament, otherwise speak of it than the scripture teacheth them, was well made. For this proclamation stoppeth the mouths of all such as will irreverently speak of the sacrament: for in scripture there is nothing to be found that maketh any thing against the sacrament, but all cometh with it. Wherefore if they were the children of obedience, they would not use any irreverent talk against the sacrament, nor blaspheme the holy sacrament. For no word of the scripture maketh any thing against it.

But here it may be said unto me, Why, sir, is this your opinion? It is good you speak plainly in this matter, without any colouring or covert speaking. The act for dissolving and suppressing of the chauntries seemeth to be against the mass, how like you that act? What say you of it? or what would you say of it, if you were he? I will speak what I think of it, I will use no colourable or covert words, I will not use a devised speech for a time, and afterwards go from it again. If chauntries were abused by applying the mass for the satisfaction of sin, or to bring men to heaven, or to take away sin, or to make wicked men just, I like the mass well, and they might well be dissolved, for the mass was not instituted for any such purpose: yet nevertheless in them that were in them, (I speak as in the cause of the poor) it were well done that they were provided of wages. The act doth graciously provide for them by taking away their lives, and I doubt not but that your majesty, and the lords of your most honourable council, have taken order that they should be well looked unto, yet how they shall be used at the hands of other officers, God knoweth, full hardly, I fear. But as for the chauntries themselves, if there were any such abuse in them concerning the mass, it is no matter if they be taken away.

King Henry VIII. a noble and wise prince, not without great pain maintained the mass, and yet in his doctrine it was confessed that masses of Scala Coeli were not to be used, or allowed, because they did pervert the right use and institution of the mass. For when he added unto the mass an opinion of satisfaction, or of new redemption, then do they put it to another use than it was ordained for. I that allow mass so well, I that allow praying for the dead, (as indeed the law is of christian charity to be prayed for) yet can I be with the realm in that matter of putting down chauntries.

But yet you would say unto me, There be fewer benefices, by putting away the chauntries. So there were when the abbeyes were dissolved; so there be when we have many churches in one. But this is no injury or prejudice to the mass; it consisteth not in the number, but in the multitude, but in the thing itself, so that the mass is not diminished by taking away the chauntries which were reserved by the abbeyes. But yet I would have it considered for the persons that are in them. I speak of the benefices, not of men's livings.

I have now declared what I think of the act of parliament made for the receiving of the sacrament of the body and blood of our Saviour Christ in both kinds. You have my mind and opinion concerning a proclamation that came forth for the same act, and I have shewed my mind therein, even as plainly as I think, and I have ever been agreeable to this point; I have oftentimes reasoned in it, I have spoken and also written in it, both beyond the seas, and here; my books be abroad, which I cannot now unwrite again. I was ever of this opinion that it might be received in both kinds, and it was a constitution provincial, scarce two hundred years ago, made by Peckham, then archbishop of Canterbury, that it should be received in both kinds, or at leastwise in the great churches, for in the smaller churches it was not thought to be so expedient. Thus I have ever thought of this matter, I have never been of other mind, nor have I changed my conscience, but I have obeyed and followed the order of the realm, and I pray you to obey orders as I have obeyed, that we may all be children of obedience.

Now will I return to the text. When Simon had answered, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God: then Christ said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona, for flesh and blood hath not opened that unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven; and I say unto thee, that thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Blessed art thou (saith he) for flesh and blood hath not opened that unto thee. For otherwise in John, Andrew told of Christ, and said, I have found the Messiah, which is Christ. But that is not enough. He that shall confess Christ must have an inward teaching, and must be spiritually taught by the Father of heaven, for Andrew's confession was nothing but a carnal confession, and such a one as any other might have made by natural reason: but the confession of Peter was above the reason of man; for Christ was there a very man, and Peter's eyes told him that he was a man and nothing else; but he was inwardly taught by the Father of heaven, and had a secret knowledge given him from heaven, not by flesh and blood, that is to say, by man's reason, but inwardly by the Father of heaven: and seeing this was the reason, it is a marvellous thing that reason should be used to deny faith, which is not within the precinct of carnal men, and such as use gross reason.

But Peter had another reason inwardly taught him, and because he understood his lesson, Christ gave him a new name: for Petra is a stone, a new name of a christian man, for upon this confession of thy faith, here I will build my church, that is, I will establish all those which I intend to gather unto thee, and the devils shall not prevail against it: for he that with a good heart and sure faith confesseth this, he is sure from all evil: this world nor Satan can do him no harm.

But now for a farther declaration, it is a marvellous thing, that upon these words the bishop of Rome should found his supremacy: for whether it be Super Petram, or Petrum, all is one matter, it maketh nothing at all for the purpose of a foundation of any such supremacy. For otherwise (when Peter spake carnally to Christ, as in the same chapter a little following) Satan was his name, where Christ said, Get behind me, Satan: so that the name of Peter is no foundation for the supremacy, but as it is said in scripture, Ye are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, that is, by participation (for godly participation giveth names of things), he might be called the head of the church, as the head of the river is called the head, because he was the first that made this confession of Christ, which is not an argument for dignity, but for the quality that was in the man. For the first man is not evermore the best. The head-man of a quest, is not always the best man in the quest, but is chosen to be the head-man for some other quality that is in him. Virtue may allure men, so that the inferior person in dignity may be the better in place, as the king sometimes chuseth a mean man to be of his council, of whom he hath a good opinion, yet is the king the king still. And in some case the king of England might send to Rome, and if the bishop of Rome were were a man of such wisdom, virtue, and learning, that he were able in matters of controversy concerning religion, to set an unity in the church of England; the king might well enough send to him for his counsel and help, and yet should not in so doing give the bishop of Rome any superiority over the king. For if a king be sick, he will have the best physician; if he has war, he will have the best captain; and yet these are not the superiors, but the inferiors.

A schoolmaster is a subject, a physician is a subject, a captain is a subject, counsellors are subjects, yet do these order and direct the king. Wherefore, leaving the bishop of Rome, this I say to declare what opinion I am of. I do not now speak what I could say. I have spoken beyond the seas, I have written, my books be abroad. But this is not the place here, I say that this place maketh nothing for the bishop of Rome, but for Christ only, for other foundation can no man lay, than what is laid, which is Jesus Christ.

But now to go forth declaring my mind; in my time had come many alterations. First, a great alteration it was to renounce the bishop of Rome's authority, and I was one that stood in it. A great alteration it was, that abbeyes were dissolved. A great alteration it was that images were pulled down: and to all these I condescended, and yet I have been accounted a maintainer of superstition, and have been called a master of the ceremonies, and of outward things; and I have been noted to take that religion which consisteth in outward things, as though he were a right christian that fulfilled the outward ceremonies, whereof I, promised to declare my conscience, and so will I, and how I have esteemed ceremonies, and that I have never been of other opinion than I am concerning ceremonies, and my opinion I have gathered of Augustine and Jerome, ancient fathers and doctors of the church.

Ceremonies serve to move men to serve God, and as long as they be used for that purpose, they may be well used in the church: but when man maketh himself servant to them, and not them to serve him, then be our ceremonies brought to an abuse. If by overmuch familiarity of them men abuse them, they do evil. For we must not serve creatures but God. We had monkery, nunnery, and friery, of a wonderous number, much variety of garments, variety of devices in dwelling, many fundry orders and fashions in moving the body. These things were first ordained to admonish them of their duty to God, to labour for the necessity of the poor; and to spare from their own bellies to the poor; and therefore was their fare ordained and prepared. And because they abused these things, and set them in an higher place than they ought to do, not taking admonition thereby the better to serve God, but esteeming perfection to consist in them, they were dissolved, and their garments were taken away.

But one thing king Henry would not take away, that was the vow of chastity. The vow of obedience he converted to himself, the vow of chastity he willeth still to remain with them.

We had many images whereto pilgrimages were done, and many tombs that men were used to visit, by reason whereof they fell into a fancy of idolatry and superstition, above the things that they might have been taken for; and because that they had not the use they were ordained for, they were left. When men put the images in a higher place than they served for, then were they taken clean away: give a child a gay book to learn upon, and then if he gaze upon the gorgeousness of his book, and learn not his lesson, according to the intent that that book was given for, the book is taken away from him. So the images, when men had them in higher place and estimation than they were first set up in the church for, then they might be taken away: and I never was of other mind, nor ever had other opinion of them. Divers things there be in the church which be in the liberty of the ruler to order as he seeth cause; and he that is ruler may either let them stand, or else may cause them to be taken away.

There be two manner of reformations. We have had of both sorts. There be things in the church, which if they be abused, may not be taken away. As for baptism, if it be abused, there may not another thing be put in the place of it, but the thing must be reformed, and brought to the right use again. All preaching, if it be abused, may not be taken away, but must be reformed, and brought to the right use: be there be other things used in the church, in which the rulers have liberty either to reform them or to take them away. And because it was an easier way to take them away, than to bring them to the right use that they were ordained for, they were all clean taken away, and so the might be. Yea, sir, will you say, but you have maintained and defended them, and have preached against such persons as despised them. It is truth, I have preached against the despisers of them, and have said that images might be suffered and used in the church as lay-men's books, yet I never otherwise desired them, but to be used for such purpose as they were first set up in the church for; but now that men be so wanton, they are clean taken away, wherein our religion is no more touched, than when books were taken away for abusing of them.

There was an order taken for books not to be used wherein some might have said, the books are good, as I know how to use them, I may therefore use them as much as I please. I will therefore use them though they are forbidden: but if thou hast any charity, thou oughtest to be contented rather to have them clean taken away, than to declare thyself to have another opinion than thou oughtest to have.

As touching ceremonies, I esteem them all as things indifferent, where he saith, That the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, &c. So are ceremonies. Nevertheless we have time, place, and number, as a certain number of psalms to be said at certain times, which may be done without superstition; but these things must serve us, and not we serve them. Yet if an order be set in them by such as have power, we must follow it, and we must obey the rulers that appoint such time, place, and number to be kept. You may not say, if the time will serve me, then I will come an hour after. No, sir, you must keep this time, and this hour, because it is so appointed by the rulers, not for the things, but for the order that is set. I have been ever of this opinion.

We had palms and candles taken away, which thing may indifferently have either of the two reformations above said. When they were in place, they should have put men in remembrance of their duty and devotion towards God, but because they were abused, they were and might be taken away. But the religion of Christ is not in these exercises, and therefore in taking away of them the religion of Christ is nothing touched nor hindered. But men must in such things be conformable not for the ceremony, but for obedience sake. St. Paul saith, that we should rebuke every brother that walketh inordinately. I have told you mine opinion, and my conscience telleth me that I have spoken plainly; that you may know what I am, and that you may not be deceived in me, nor be slandered in me, nor make any further search to know my heart.

I like well the communion, because it provoketh me more and more to devotion. I like well the proclamation, because it stoppeth the mouths of all such as irreverently speak or rail against the sacrament. I like well the rest of the king's majesty's proceedings concerning the sacrament. I have now told you what I like. But shall I speak nothing of what I mislike? you will then say I speak not plainly. I will therefore shew you my conscience plainly.

I mislike those preachers who preach by the king's license, and those readers which by the king's permission and sufferance do read open lectures, do openly and blasphemously talk against the mass, and against the sacrament. And to whom may I liken such readers and preachers? I may liken them unto posts, for the proverb saith, That posts do bear truth in their letters, and lies in their mouths; and so do they, and to speak against the sacrament, it is the most marvellous matter that ever I saw or heard of. I would wish therefore there were a stay and an order in this behalf, and there might be but one order and rule. And let man out of his own head begin matters, nor go before the king. They call it going before the king, and make themselves kings. Well, what misliketh me, that priests, and men that vowed chastity, should openly marry, and avow it openly: this is a thing that since the beginning of the church hath not been seen at any time, that men that have been committed to any ecclesiastical administration should marry. We read of married priests, that is to say, of married men chosen to be priests and ministers in the church. In epiphanius we read, that some such for necessity were winked at. But that men being priests already should marry, was never yet seen in Christ's church from the beginning of the apostles time. I have written in and studied for it; and the very same places that are used to maintain the marriage of priests, being diligently read, shall plainly confound them that maintain your priests to marry, or at the farthest within three lines after.

Thus have I shewed my opinion in order, proceeding from the inferiors, and in order proceeding from the superiors. And thus I have (as I trust) plainly declared myself, without any covering or counterfeiting. And I beseech your most excellent majesty to esteem me as I am, and not to be slandered in me; I have told you the plain truth as it is, and I have cleared my conscience unto you. I have not played the flatterer with you, to carry truth in my letters, and lies in my mouth: for I would not for all the world make a lie in my place; but I have disclosed the plain truth as it is in my mind. And thus I commit your most excellent majesty, and all your most honourable counsellors, with the rest of the devout audience here present, unto God. To whom be all honour, praise, and glory, world without end.

Thus having comprised the sum and chief purpose of this sermon, with other such matters above-mentioned, wherein may appear the double-faced doings of this bishop in matters of religion: now for the more fortification of that which hath been said, if any shall deny the foresaid sermon, or any part thereof to be true, we will adjoin certain chief notes, collected as well out of the testimonies and positions of his own friends and servants, and others which were sworn truly to declare their knowledge in his behalf, as also out of his own writings and works agreeing with the same.

The POPE's SUPREMACY denied by BISHOP GARDINER.

FIRST, as touching the confession and judgment of Stephen Gardiner, against the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, read in his book De vera Obedientia.

Item, The said bishop Gardiner in his sermons and teachings, as where he expoundeth the place [Thou art Peter] nothing at all to make for the authority of the Romish bishop, marvelled how the pope could usurp so much to take up that place to build upon, when Christ had taken it up before to build his church.

Item, The confession of Peter was the confession of all the apostles, like as the blessing given to Peter pertained as well to all the apostles as to Peter.

Item, That the place, Feed my sheep, was not special to Peter alone, but general to all the apostles. Also that the Greek church did never receive the said bishop of Rome for their universal head.

Item, That the church was built upon Christ's faith, and not upon Peter's.

And though Peter was called the prince of the apostles, there was nothing else but like as it is in an inquest, where the foreman, or headman is not so called, because he is best or chiefest of that company, but because he speaketh first.

The said bishop, in his book De vera Obedientia, did not only write against the pope's supremacy, but also did defend the same at Louvain. And moreover in his sermons did alledge and preach the same.

Item, For the space of fourteen years together, he preached against the pope's supremacy in divers sermons, and especially in one sermon before king Henry,

CEREMONIES, IMAGES, CHAUNTIES, &c. discountenanced by BISHOP GARDINER.

Item, For ceremonies and images which were abused to be taken away by public authority, he did well allow it, as a child to have his book taken from him when he abuseth it, or delighteth only in the golden cover.

Item, The dissolving of monasteries and religious houses, he allowed and granted, that they were justly suppressed.

Friars he never liked in all his life.

Monks he counted but belly-gods.

The going about of St. Nicholas, St. Catharine, and St. Clement, he affirmeth to be children's toys.

The taking away or transposing of Chantry Obits, he referreth to the arbitrement of the politic rulers, granting that if they did dissolve them, it might well be done.

Item, He wisheth them to be committed to a better use, and that monasteries were justly taken away.

The observing of days, hours, number, time, and place, if they be orderly and publicly commanded by the rulers, it is but to set the church in an outward and public order; but if a man inwardly and privately be addicted to the same, thinking his prayer otherwise not available, but by observing thereof, it is an error.

The communion set out by king Edward he liked well.

The book of common service he was content both to keep himself, and cause it to be kept by others.

For the homilies, he exhorted the people in his preaching to come to the church to hear them.

In sum, to all injunctions, statutes, and proclamations set forth by the king and superior powers, he yielded and granted.

Now, reader, compare these writings, preachings, and sayings of this bishop in the days of king Henry and king Edward, with his doing in queen Mary's time, and thou shalt see how variable he was, how inconstant and contrary to himself, how perjured and false, and far differing from that which he was reported to be, in a certain English book set out in queen Mary's time, which saith that there were three only in England, whose conscience had never been stained in religion: of whom he falsely saith, the foresaid bishop of Winchester was one.

Although bishop Gardiner in granting to these points of religion, (as just related) and other some again denying, could not therefore deserve the name and fame of a perfect christian; yet notwithstanding, if he had continued in his judgment still, and been constant in himself, he might have won more commendation both with God and men. But as soon as the time began to alter, he likewise altering with the time, was so far changed from what he seemed, that neither he agreed with other papists, nor yet with himself, as Dr. Ridley in certain treatises hath well noted of him: wherein, as in a glass, may be seen the manifest contrariety and repugnance in him, not only from the truth of God's blessed word, but also how the said bishop standing so much in singularity by himself, neither agreeth with other his fellow-writers of his own faction, nor yet fully accordeth with himself in certain cases of the sacrament, as the foresaid Dr. Ridley, in examining his words and works, hath well declared.

Here we see this stout prelate of Winchester, with all his prosperities, doings, and qualifications, as in a certain anatomy proportioned out, whereby we may easily judge what is to be esteemed of him by his fruits, that he neither was a true protestant, nor right papist; neither constant in his error, nor yet stedfast in the truth; false in king Henry's time, a dissembler in king Edward's time, double perjured, and a murderer in queen Mary's time, mutable and inconstant in all times.

To describe and point out the instability of this bishop 47. aforesaid, aforesaid, no more need be added; yet notwithstanding, seeing the matter is not long, it may not be amiss to annex a piece of Driander's letter, written to one Crispin, physician, in Oxford, sent from Antwerp, concerning the doings of this bishop of Winchester. The copy of which here follows.

BEFORE my departure from the city of Paris, I wrote to you by our friend the Englishman, &c.

Now you shall be contented only with the narration of your bishop of Winchester, who (as appertained to the ambassador of so noble a prince) came to Louvain with a great bravery, and was there received at one Jeremy's house, and most honourably entertained, where the faculty of divines, for honour's sake, presented him with wine in the name of the whole university. But our famous doctors, and learned masters, for that they would more deeply search and understand the learning and excellency of the prelate, perused and scanned a certain oration made by him, and now extant, intitled, De vera Obedientia, in which oration he did deny the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, and preferred his lord's and king's authority, before the holy apostolic see, (as they term it) which being read and considered by them, they did not only repent that they had given him such honour, but also recanted that which they had done: and did not so much honour him before, but now they were as earnest and spiteful against him. Richard Lothomus, interpreter of terms, with the favourers of that fraternity, and other champions of the falling church, disputed with him concerning the pope's supremacy. This bishop stoutly defended his said oration. The divines on the contrary side, stiffly maintained their opinions, and divers times openly with exclamations, calling the said bishop an excommunicate person, and a schismatic, to no little reproach and infamy of the English nation. The bishop not long after minding to say mass in St. Peter's church, they did deny unto him, as to an excommunicate person, the ornaments and vestments meet for the same; wherewith he being highly offended, suddenly hastened his journey from thence. The next day after the dean made an elegant oration, wherein he openly disgraced and defamed him. You have heard now a true story, for our doctor was a beholder of the whole tragedy, &c.

And this now being sufficient for Gardiner's story, to leave him to his judge, and to let him go, we shall return and proceed (by God's leave) as the course of those doleful days shall lead us, to prosecute the residue of Christ's martyrs, as now in order followeth.

The MARTYRDOM of JOHN WEBB, GENTLEMAN, GEORGE ROPER, and GREGORY PARKE, at CANTERBURY.

JOHAN WEBB was brought before the bishop of Dover, and Nicholas Harpsfield, or some other deputed in their room, on the 16th of September, and there had propounded unto him such articles as were commonly administered by Bonner to those of his jurisdiction: and being willed for that present to depart, and to deliberate with himself upon the matter, against the next time of his appearance; he made answer, that he would no otherwise say (by God's grace) than he had already said, which was this: As touching the sacrament of Christ's body, said he, I do believe it to be left unto his church (with thanksgiving) in commemoration of his death and passion, until his coming again. So that it is left in remembrance of his body, and not by words of consecration to be made wholly his body, really, substantially, and the same body that was born of the virgin Mary: I utterly deny that.

After this (besides sundry other times) the third day of October, the said John Webb, George Roper, and Gregory Parke, were all brought together before the said judges; who there and then agreeing, and stedfastly allowing the former answer made before by Mr. Webb, were by the bloody prelates adjudged heretics; and therefore about the end of the same month they were brought out of prison together to the place of martyrdom; saying certain psalms mournfully as they were going to the stake.

And being thus brought (as I said) to the stake, and there encompassed about with a chain, were burnt together in one fire at Canterbury, most patiently enduring their torments, and accounting themselves happy and blessed of the Lord that they were made worthy to suffer for Christ's gospel sake.

A short Account of WILLIAM WISEMAN.

THE 13th of December, William Wiseman, a clover worker of London, died in Lollards' Tower, where he was in prison and bonds for the gospel of Christ: for thought, that either through famine, or ill handling of some murdering papists, he was made away. By request whereof the coroner, named John Gibbes, gentleman, with an inquest of twelve men, sat upon him, who, though to outward appearance were said to find nothing in him else but only God's visitation, yet what of privy causes there might be of his death, the Lord knoweth, I have not to say.

After the said William Wiseman was departed (as I said) in the Tower, the papists cast him out into the fields, commanding that no man should bury him, according as their devout manner is to do with all such as die in like sort, whom they account as profane, and worthy of no burial, but to be cast to dogs and birds. And yet notwithstanding this their merciless commandment, some good Tobits there were who buried him in the evening, as commonly they did all the rest thrown out in like manner, whom they were wont privily by night to cover, and many times the archers in the field standing by, and singing psalms together at their burial.

In the same month of December, James Gore also died in prison at Colchester, laid there in bonds for the truth of God's word.

The History of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, who was examined, condemned, and martyred for the Defence of the GOSPEL of CHRIST.

THE troubles of Mr. Philpot have been partly related before, in the beginning of queen Mary's time, in prosecuting the disputation in the convocation-house. He came of a worshipful family, the son of a knight, born in Hampshire, brought up at New College in Oxford, where he studied the civil law about six or seven years, besides other liberal arts, especially languages, and particularly he wonderfully advanced in the Hebrew tongue. In wit he was pregnant and happy of a singular courage, in spirit fervent, in religion zealous, and also well practised and exercised in the same (which is no small matter in a true divine), of nature plain and apert, far from all flattery (as doth evidently appear in all his behaviour), farther from all hypocrisy and deceitful dissimulation. What his learning was, his own examinations, penned with his own hand, can declare.

From Oxford, desirous to see other countries, at occasion served thereunto, he went over into Italy and places thereabouts, where he coming upon a time from Venice to Padua, was in danger through a certain Franciscan friar accompanying him in his journey, who, coming to Padua, sought to accuse him of heresy. At length returning into England, as the time ministered more boldness unto him in the days of king Edward, he had divers conflicts with bishop Gardiner in the city of Winchester.

After that, having an advowson by the said bishop, he was made there archdeacon of Winchester, under Dr. Poinet, who then succeeded Gardiner in that bishopric. Thus he continued during the time of king Edward, to the great profit of those parts thereabouts. When that king was taken away, and Mary his sister came to the place, whose study was wholly bent to alter the religion in the woeful realm of England: first she had a convocation of the prelates and learned men assembled for the accomplishment of her desire. In which convocation, Mr. Philpot being present, according to his room and degree, with a few others, maintained the cause of the gospel manfully against the contrary part (as has been already recited), for which he, notwithstanding the liberty of the house-promised him, he was called to account before bishop Gardiner chancellor, then being his ordinary, by whom he was first examined, although that examination came not to our hands. From thence again he was removed to bishop Bonner, and other commissioners, with whom he had divers conflicts, as may appear by the following examinations.

FIRST EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, before the QUEEN'S COMMISSIONERS, Mr. CHOLMLEY, Mr. ROPER, and Dr. STORY, and one of the SCRIBES of the ARCHES, at Newgate Sessions-Hall, October 2, 1555.

BEFORE I was called into an inner parlour, where the commissioners sat, Dr. Story came out into the where I was, to view me among others that were there; and passing by me, he said, Ha, Mr. Philpot; and returning immediately again, stood against me, holding me, and saying that I was well fed indeed.

Philpot. If I be fat, and in good liking, Mr. Doctor, no marvel, since I have been stalled up in prison, twelve months and a half, in a close corner. I come to know your pleasure wherefore you have done for me.

Story. We hear thou art a suspected person, and heretical opinions, and therefore we have sent for thee.

Philpot. I have been in prison thus long, only on the occasion of disputation made in the convocation-house, and upon suspicion of setting forth the word thereof.

Story. If thou wilt revoke the same, and become a honest man, thou shalt be set at liberty, and do as thou wilt; or else thou shalt be committed to the bishop of London. How sayest thou, wilt thou revoke or no?

Philpot. I have already answered in this behalf to mine ordinary.

Story. If thou answerest thus when thou comest before us anon, thou shalt hear more of our minds; and that he went into the parlour, and I within a little while after was called in.

The Scribe. Sir, what is your name?

Philpot. My name is John Philpot. And so he ended my name.

Story. This man was archdeacon of Winchester, of Pinner's presentment.

Philpot. I was archdeacon indeed, but none of his presentment; but by virtue of a former advowson given me by lord chancellor that now is.

Story. You may be assured that my lord chancellor would not make any such as he is archdeacon.

Roper. Come hither to me, Mr. Philpot. We hear that you are out of the catholic church, and have been a disturber of the same; out of which whoso is, cannot be the child of salvation. Wherefore if you come into the same, you shall be received and find our favour.

Philpot. I am come before your worshipful masters at your appointment, understanding that you are magistrates authorized by the queen's majesty, whom I will do my due obedience unto the uttermost: therefore I desire to know what cause I have offended in, which I am now called before you. And if I cannot be charged with any particular matter done contrary to the laws of this realm, I desire your masterships, that I may have the benefit of a subject, and be delivered out of my wrongful imprisonment, where I have lain a year and a half, without any calling to answer before now, and my living taken from me without law.

Roper. Though we have no particular matter to charge you withal, yet we may by our commission and by the law, drive you to answer to the suspicion of a slander going on you: and besides this, we have statutes to charge you herein withal.

Philpot. If I have offended any statute, charge me therewithal, and if I have incurred the penalty thereof, punish me accordingly. And because you are magistrates and executors of the queen's majesty's laws, by force whereof you do now sit, I desire that if I be found no notorious transgressor of any of them, I may not be burdened with more than I have done.

Cholmley. If the justice do suspect a felon, he may examine him upon suspicion thereof, and commit him to prison though there be no fault done.

Story. I perceive whereabouts this man goeth: he is plain in Cardmaker's case, for he made the same allegations. But they will not serve thee; for thou art an heretic, and holdest against the blessed mass; how sayest thou to that?

Philpot. I am no heretic.

Story. I will prove thee an heretic. Whosoever hath held against the blessed mass is an heretic: but thou hast held against the same, therefore thou art an heretic.

Philpot. That which I spake, and which you are able to charge me withal, was in the convocation, where, by the queen's majesty's will and her whole council, liberty was given to every man of the house to utter his conscience, and to speak his mind freely of such questions in religion, as there were propounded by the prolocutor; for which now I thought not to be molested and imprisoned as I have been, neither now be compelled by you to answer for the same.

Story. Thou shalt go to Lollards' Tower, and be handled there like an heretic as thou art, and answer to the same that thou there didst speak, and be judged by the bishop of London.

Philpot. I have already been convented of this matter before the lord chancellor, mine ordinary, who this long time hath kept me in prison: therefore, if his lordship will take my life away, as he hath done my liberty and living, he may; which I think he cannot do of his conscience, and therefore hath let me lie thus long in prison: wherefore I am content to abide the end of him herein, that is mine ordinary, and do refuse the auditory of the bishop of London, because he is an incompetent judge for me, and not mine ordinary.

Story. But, sir, thou spakest words in the convocation-house, which is in the bishop of London's diocese, and therefore thou shalt be carried to Lollards' Tower, to be judged by him for the words thou spakest in his diocese against the blessed mass.

Philpot. Sir, you know it is against all equity, that I should be twice vexed for one cause, and that by such as by the law have nothing to do with me.

Roper. You cannot deny, but that you spoke against the mass in the convocation-house.

Story. Dost thou deny that which thou spakest there, or no?

Philpot. I cannot deny that I have spoken there, and if by the law you may put me to death for it, I am here ready to suffer whatsoever I shall be judged unto.

The Scribe. This man is fed of vain-glory.

Cholmley. Play the wise gentleman and be conformable, and be not stubborn in your opinion, neither cast yourself away. I would be glad to do you good.

Philpot. I desire you, sir, with the rest here, that I be not charged further at your hands, than the law chargeth me, for what I have done, since there was no law directly against that wherewith I am now charged. And you, Mr. Doctor, (of old acquaintance in Oxford) I trust will shew me some friendship, and not extremity.

Story. I tell thee, if thou wouldst be a good catholic tholic man, I would be thy friend, and spend my gown to do thee good; but I will be no friend to an heretic, as thou art, but will spend both my gown and my coat, but I will burn thee. How sayest thou to the sacrament of the altar?

Philpot. Sir, I am not come now to dispute your mastership, and the time now serveth not thereto, but to answer to that I may be lawfully charged withal.

Story. Well, since thou wilt not revoke that thou hast done, thou shalt be had into Lollard's Tower.

Philpot. Sir, since you will needs shew me this extremity, and charge me with my conscience, I do desire to see your commission, whether you have this authority so to do, and after view thereof, I shall (according to my duty) make you further answer, if you may by virtue thereof burthen me with my conscience.

Roper. Let him see the commission: is it here?

Story. Shall we let every vile person see our commission?

Cholmley. Let him go from whence he came, and on Thursday he shall see our commission.

Story. Let him lie in the Lollard's Tower; for I will sweep the King's-Bench, and all other prisons also, of these heretics; they shall not have that resort as they have had, to scatter their heresies.

Philpot. You have power to transfer my body from place to place at your pleasure; but you have no power over my soul. And I mind not whither you commit me, for I cannot be worse intreated than I am, kept all day in a close chamber: wherefore it is no marvel that my flesh is puffed up, wherewithal Mr. Doctor is offended.

Story. Marshal, take him home with you again, and see that you bring him again on Thursday, and then we shall rid your fingers of him, and afterwards of your other heretics.

Philpot. God hath appointed a day shortly to come, in which he will judge us with righteousness, howsoever you judge of us now.

Roper. Be content to be ruled by Mr. Doctor, and shew yourself a catholic man.

Philpot. Sir, if I should speak otherwise than my conscience is, I should but dissemble with you: and why be you so earnest to have me shew myself a dissembler both to God and you, which I cannot do?

Roper. We do not require you to dissemble with us to be a catholic man.

Philpot. If I do stand in any thing against that, wherein any man is able to burthen me with one jot of the scripture, I shall be content to be counted no catholic man, or an heretic, as you please.

Story. Have we scripture, scripture? and with that he rose up, saying, Who shall be judge, I pray you? This man is like his fellow Woodman, which the other day would have nothing else but scripture. And this is the beginning of the tragedy.

The SECONDE EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, before the QUEEN'S COMMISSIONERS, Mr. CHOLMLEY, Mr. ROPER, Dr. STORY, Dr. COOK, and the SCRIBE, Oct. 24, 1555, at Newgate Sessions-Hall.

AT my coming, a man of Aldgate, of mine acquaintance, said unto me, God have mercy on you, for you are already condemned in this world; for Dr. Story said, that my lord chancellor had commanded to do you away. After a little conversation had between them, Mr. Cholmley called me unto him, saying:

Cholmley. Mr. Philpot, shew yourself a wise man, and be not stubborn in your own opinion, but be conformable to the queen's proceedings, and live, and you shall be well assured of great favour and reputation.

Philpot. I shall do as it becometh a christian man to do.

Story. This man is the rankest heretic that hath been in all my lord chancellor's diocese, and hath done more hurt than any man else there: and therefore his pleasure is, that he should have the law to proceed against him, and I have spoken with my lord herein, and he willeth him to be committed to the bishop of London, and there to recant or else burn. He howled and wept in the convocation-house, and made such ado as never man did, as all the heretics do when they know how to answer. He shall go after his fellows. How sayest thou, wilt thou recant?

Philpot. I know nothing I have done that I ought to recant.

Story. Well, then I pray you let us commit him to the Lollard's Tower, there to remain until he be further examined before the bishop of London; for he is too fine fed in the King's-Bench, and he hath too much favour there; for his keeper said yesterday, that he was the finest fellow, and one of the best learned in England; and with this he rose and went his way.

Cook. This man hath most stoutly maintained heresies since the queen's coming in, above any that I have heard of; therefore it is most meet that he should be adjudged by the bishop of London, for the heresies he hath maintained.

Philpot. I have maintained no heresies.

Cook. No, have you not? Did you not openly speak against the sacrament of the altar in the convocation house? Call you that no heresy? wilt thou recant or not?

Philpot. It was the queen's majesty's pleasure that we should reason thereof, not by my seeking, but by other men's procuring, in the hearing of the council.

Cook. Did the queen give you leave to be an heretic? you may be sure her grace will not do so. Well, you will not dispute that matter with you; my lord of London shall proceed by inquisition upon thee, and if thou wilt not recant, thou shalt be burned.

Philpot. My lord of London is not mine ordinary in this behalf, and I have already answered unto mine ordinary in this matter: and therefore, (as I have said before) you shall do me great wrong, to vex me twice for one matter, since I have sustained this long imprisonment, besides the loss of my living.

Roper. You were a very unmeet man to be an archdeacon.

Philpot. I know I was as meet a man as he that has it now.

Cook. A meet man, quoth he? He troubled Mr. Roper and the whole country.

Philpot. There never was poor archdeacon so handled at your hands as I am, and that without any just cause you be able to lay unto me.

Cook. Thou art no archdeacon.

Philpot. I am archdeacon still, although another be in possession of my living; for I was never deprived by any law.

Cook. No, sir, that needeth not: for a notorious heretic should have no ordinary proceeding about his deprivation; but the bishop may, upon knowledge thereof, proceed to deprivation.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, you know that the common law is otherwise: and besides this, the statutes of the realm be otherwise, which give this benefit to every person, though he be an heretic, to enjoy his living until he be put to death for the same.

Cholmley. No, there thou art deceived.

Philpot. Upon the living I mind not. But the unjust dealing grieveth me, that I should be thus troubled for my conscience, contrary to all law.

Cholmley. Why, will not you agree that the queen's majesty may cause you to be examined of your faith?

Philpot. Ask you Mr. Doctor Cook, and he will tell you that the temporal magistrates have nothing to do with faith, for determination thereof. And St. Ambrose saith, that the things of God are not subject to the power and authority of princes.

Cook. No. May not the temporal power commit you to be examined of your faith to the bishop?

Philpot. Yea, sir. I deny not that; but you will grant that the same may examine any of their own authority.

Cook. Let him be had away.

Philpot. Your mastership promised me the last time as before you, I should see your commission by at authority you do call me, and whether I by the be bound to answer to so much as you demand.

Roper. Let him see the commission.
 The Scribe then exhibited it to Mr. Roper, and was put to open the same.

Cook. Po, what will ye do? he shall not see it.
Philpot. Then you do me wrong, to call me and me, not shewing your authority in this behalf.

Cook. If we do you wrong, complain of us:
 in the mean time thou shalt lie in the Lollards' wer.

Philpot. Sir, I am a poor gentleman; therefore trust to your gentleness that you will not commit me so vile and straight a place, being found no heinous offender.

Cook. Thou art no gentleman.

Philpot. Yes, that I am.

Cook. An heretic is no gentleman: for he is a gentleman that hath gentle conditions.

Philpot. The offence cannot take away the state a gentleman as long as he liveth, although he were traitor: but I mean not to boast of my gentleman-ship, but will put it under my foot, since you do no more esteem it.

Story. What, will you suffer this heretic to prate all the day?

Cook. He saith he is a gentleman.

Story. A gentleman, said he? he is a vile heretic have: for an heretic is no gentleman. Let the keeper the Lollards' Tower come in, and have him away.

Keeper. Here sir.

Story. Take this man with you to the Lollards' tower, or else to the bishop's coal-house.

Philpot. Sir, if I were a dog, you could not appoint me a worse nor more vile place: but I must be content with whatsoever injury you do offer me. God give you more merciful heart; you are very cruel upon one that hath never offended you. I pray you, Mr. Cholmley, shew me some friendship that I may not be carried to so vile a place. And he then called me aside, and said:

Cholmley. I neither understand their doings nor their laws; I cannot tell what they mean. I would I could do you good.

Philpot. I am content to go whither you will have me. There never was a man more cruelly handled than I am at your hands, that without just cause known should thus be treated.

Story. Shall we suffer this heretic thus to reprove us? Have him hence.

Philpot. God forgive you, and give you more merciful hearts, and shew you more mercy in the time of need: "Do quickly that you have in hand."

Story. Do you not hear how he maketh us like Judas?

Philpot. That is after your own understanding.

After this, I with four others were brought to the keeper's house in Pater-noster-row, where we supped, and after supper I was called up to a chamber by the archdeacon of London's servant, and that in his master's name, who offered me a bed for that night. To whom I gave thanks, saying, That it would be a grief to me to lie one night well, and the next night worse: wherefore I will begin (said I) as I am like to continue to take such part as my fellows do. And with that we were brought through Pater-noster-row to my lord of London's coal-house; unto which is joined a little blind house, with a great pair of stocks, appointed both for hand and foot: but thanks be to God we have not played of those organs yet, although some before us have tried them; and there we found a minister of Essex, a married priest, a man of godly zeal, with one other poor man. And this minister at my coming desired to speak with me, and did greatly lament his own infirmity, for that through extremity of imprisonment he was constrained by writing to yield to the bishop of London: whereupon he was once set at liberty, and afterward felt such a hell in his conscience, that he could scarce refrain from destroying himself, and never could be at quiet until he went to the bishop's register, desiring to see his bill again; which as soon as he had received, he tore it in pieces, and after he was as joyful as any man might be. Of which when my lord of London understood, he sent for him, and fell upon him like a lion, and like a manly bishop buffeted him well, so that he made his face black and blue, and pluckt away a great piece of his beard: but now, thanks be to God, he is as joyful under the cross as any of us, and very sorry for his former infirmity. I write this, because I would all men to take heed how they do contrary to their conscience; which is, to fall into the pains of hell.

The MANNER of my being called first before the BISHOP of LONDON, the second Night of mine Imprisonment in his COAL-HOUSE.

THE bishop sent Mr. Johnson his register to me with a mess of meat, and a good pot of drink and bread, saying, That my lord had no knowledge before of my being here, for which he was sorry: therefore he had sent me and my fellows that meat, not knowing whether I would receive the same.

I thanked God for my lord's charity, that it pleased him to remember poor prisoners, desiring Almighty God to increase the same in him, and in all others; and therefore I would not refuse his beneficence, and therewith took the same unto my brethren, praising God for his providence towards his afflicted flock, that he stirred our adversaries up to help the same in their necessity.

Johnson. My lord would know the cause of your being sent hither (for he knoweth nothing thereof), and wondereth that he should be troubled with prisoners that are not of his own diocese.

Philpot. I declared unto him the whole cause.
 After which he said, My lord's will was, that I should have any friendship I would desire, and so departed.

Within a while after, one of my lord's gentlemen came for me; and I was brought into his presence, where he sat at a table with three or four of his chaplains waiting upon him, and his register.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, you are welcome; give me your hand.

With that, because he so gently put forth his hand,
 I to render courtesy for courtesy, kissed my hand and gave him the same.

Bonner. I am right sorry for your trouble, and I promise you that till within these two hours, I knew not of your being here. I pray you tell me what was the cause of your being sent hither: for I promise you I know nothing thereof as yet, neither would I you should think that I was the cause thereof: and I marvel that other men will trouble me with their matters; but I must be obedient to my betters, and I fear men speak otherwise of me than I deserve.

Philpot. I shewed him the sum of the matter; that it was for the disputation in the convocation-house, for which I was against all right molested.

Bonner. I marvel that you should be troubled for that, if there was none other cause but this. But peradventure you have maintained the same since, and some of your friends of late have asked, whether you do stand to the same, and you have said, yea; and for this you might be committed to prison.

Philpot. If it shall please your lordship I am burdened no otherwise than I have told you, by the commissioners who sent me hither, because I would not recant the same.

Bonner. A man may speak in the parliament-house, though it be a place of free speech, so as he may be imprisoned for it, as in case he speak words of high-treason against the king or queen; and so it might be that you spake otherwise than it became you of the church of Christ.

Philpot. I spake nothing which was out of the articles which were called in question, and agreed upon to be disputed by the whole house, and by permission of the queen and council.

Bonner. Why, may we dispute of our faith?

Philpot. That we may.

Bonner. Nay, I think not, by the law.

Philpot. Indeed by the civil law I know it is not lawful, but by God's law we may reason thereof. For St. Peter saith, "Be ye ready to render account unto all men of the hope which is in you, that demand of you the same."

Bonner. Indeed, St. Peter saith so. Why, then I ask of you what your judgment is of the sacrament of the altar.

Philpot. My lord, St. Ambrose saith, that the disputation of faith ought to be in the congregation, in the hearing of the people, and that I am not bound to render account thereof to every man privately, unless it be to edify. But now I cannot shew you my mind, but I must run upon the pikes in danger of my life for it. Wherefore as the said doctor said unto Valentinian the emperor, so say I to your lordship: Take away the law, and I shall reason with you. And yet if I come in open judgment, where I am bound by the law to answer, I trust I shall utter my conscience as freely as any that hath come before you.

Bonner. I perceive you are learned, I would have such as you be about me. But you must come and be of the church, for there is but one church.

Philpot. God forbid I should be out of the church, I am sure I am within the same: for I know as I am taught by the scripture, that there is but one catholic church, one dove, one spouse, one beloved congregation, out of which there is no salvation.

Bonner. How chanceth it then, that you go out of the same, and walk not with us?

Philpot. My lord, I am sure I am within the bounds of the church whereupon she is built, which is the word of God.

Bonner. What age are you of?

Philpot. I am four and forty.

Bonner. You are not now of the same faith your godfather and godmothers promised for you, in which you were baptized.

Philpot. Yes, I thank God I am: for I was baptized into the faith of Christ which I now hold.

Bonner. How can that be? there is but one faith.

Philpot. I am assured of that by St. Paul, saying, "That there is but one God, one faith, and one baptism," of which I am.

Bonner. You were twenty years ago of another faith than you are now.

Philpot. Indeed, my lord, to tell you plain, I was then of no faith, a neuter, a wicked liver, neither hot nor cold.

Bonner. Why, do you not think that we have now the true faith?

Philpot. I desire your lordship to hold me excused for answering at this time. I am sure that God's word was thoroughly with the primitive church, and all the ancient fathers do agree with this faith I am of.

Bonner. Well, I promise you I mean you no more hurt than to mine own person: I will not therefore burthen you with your conscience now; I marvel that you are so merry in prison as you are, singing and rejoicing, as the prophet saith, Rejoicing in your naughtiness. Methinks you do not well herein; you should rather lament and be sorry.

Philpot. My lord, the mirth that we make is but in singing certain psalms, according as we are commanded by St. Paul, willing us to be merry in the Lord, singing together in hymns and psalms: and I trust your lordship cannot be displeased with that.

Bonner. We may say unto you as Christ said in the gospel, "We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced—"

Here my lord stumbled, and could not bring forth the text, and required his chaplains to help, and to put him in remembrance of the text better; but they were mum: and I recited out the text unto him, which made nothing to his purpose, unless he would have us to mourn, because they, if they laugh, sing still sorrowful things unto us, threatening faggots and fire.

Philpot. We are, my lord, in a dark comfortless place, and therefore it behoveth us to be merry, as Solomon saith, sorrowfulness eat up our heart. Therefore I trust your lordship will not be angry for our singing of psalms, since St. Paul saith, "If any man be of an upright mind, let him sing." And we therefore, to testify that we are of an upright mind to God (though we be in misery) do sing.

Bonner. I will trouble you no farther as now. I can do you any good, I shall be glad to do it for you. God be with you, good Mr. Philpot, and give you a good night. Have him to the cellar, and let him drink a cup of wine.

Thus I departed, and by my lord's register I was brought to his cellar door, where I drank a good cup of wine. And my lord's chaplain, Mr. Coulin, followed me, making acquaintance, saying, that I was welcome, and wished that I would not be singular.

Philpot. I am well taught the contrary by Solomon saying, Woe be to him that is alone. After that I was carried to my lord's coal-house again, where I with my six companions do house together in straw as cheerfully (we thank God) as others do in their beds of down. Thus for the third fit.

The FOURTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, in the ARCHDEACON of LONDON's House, in the Month of OCTOBER, before the BISHOPS of LONDON, BATH, WORCESTER, and GLOUCESTER.

BONNER. Mr. Philpot, it hath pleased my lord to take pains here to-day, to dine with my poor archdeacon, and in the dinner-time it chanced us to have communication of you, and you were pitied here by many that knew you at New College, in Oxford. And I also do pity your case, because you seem unto me by the talk I had with you the other night, to be learned: and therefore now I have sent for you to come before them, that it might not be said hereafter, that I had so many learned bishops at my house, and yet would not vouchsafe them to talk with you, and at my request (I thank them) they are content so to do. Now therefore utter your mind freely, and you shall with all favour be satisfied. I am sorry to see you lie in so evil a case as you do, and would fain you should do better, as you may if you please.

Bath. My lords here have not sent for you to fawn upon you, but for charity sake to exhort you to come into the right catholic church.

Worcester. Before he beginneth to speak, it is best that he call upon God for grace, and to pray that it might please God to open his heart, that he may conceive the truth.

Philpot. With that I fell down upon my knees before them, and made my prayer on this manner:

"Almighty God, which art the giver of all wisdom and understanding, I beseech thee of thine infinite goodness and mercy in Jesus Christ, to give me (most vile sinner in thy sight) the spirit of wisdom to speak and make answer in thy cause, that it may be to the satisfaction of the hearers, before whom I stand, and also to my better understanding if I be deceived in any thing."

Bonner. Nay, my lord of Worcester, you did not well to exhort him to make any prayer. For this is the thing they have a singular pride in, that they can often make their vain prayers, in which they glory much. For in this point they are much like to certain arrant heretics, of whom Pliny maketh mention, that did daily sing praise unto God before dawning of the day.

Philpot. My lord, God make me and all you here present such heretics as those were that sung those morning hymns: for they were right christians, with whom the tyrants of the world were offended with their well doing.

Bath. Proceed to what he hath to say. He hath prayed I cannot tell for what.

Bonner. Say on, Mr. Philpot; my lords will gladly hear you.

Philpot.

Philpot. I have, my lords, been these twelve months half in prison without any just cause that I know; my living taken from me without any lawful order, now I am brought (contrary to right) from my own ordinary, into another man's jurisdiction, and not why. Wherefore, if your lordships can find me with any evil done, I stand here before you as one of the same. And if no such thing may be laid to my charge, I desire to be released of my wrongful trouble.

Bonner. There is none here that goeth about to hurt you, but to do you good, if we can. For I perceive you were sent hither to me without my knowledge. Therefore speak your conscience without fear.

Philpot. My lord, I have learned to answer in matters of religion in the congregation, being thereto lawfully called: but now I am not lawfully called, neither is here a just congregation where I ought to answer.

Bonner. Indeed this man told me the last time I was with him, that he was a lawyer, and would not answer his conscience in matters of faith, unless it were in the hearing of the people, where he might speak to his glory.

Philpot. My lord, I said that I was not a lawyer, nor do I arrogate to myself that name, although I was once a novice in the same, where I learned somewhat for mine own defence, when I am called in judgment to answer to any cause, and whereby I have been able not to put myself further in danger than I need, so far as I am a lawyer, and no farther.

B. If you will not answer to my lord's request, you seem to be a wilful man in your opinion.

Philpot. My lord of London is not mine ordinary to whom I am bound to answer in this behalf, as D. Cole (who is a lawyer) can well tell you by the law. And I have not offended my lord of London before he should call me.

Bonner. Yes, I have to lay to your charge, that you have offended in my diocese, by speaking against the blessed sacrament of the altar: and therefore I call you, and proceed against you to punish you by the law.

Philpot. I have not offended in your diocese. For which I spake of the sacrament was in Paul's church convocation-house, which (as I understand) is a church jurisdiction belonging to the dean thereof, and is counted of your lordship's diocese, but not of your diocese.

Bonner. Is not Paul's church in my diocese? Well, it costeth me a good deal of money in the year, to maintain it.

Philpot. That may be, and yet be exempted from your lordship's jurisdiction. And if I had so offended in your diocese, yet I ought by the law to be sent to my ordinary, if I require it, and not to be punished by you, who are not my ordinary. And already (as I have said) I have been convented of mine ordinary for this cause, which you go about to inquire of me.

Bonner. How say you, Mr. D. Cole, may not I proceed against him by the law, for what he hath done in your diocese?

Philpot. I think Mr. Philpot needeth not to stand so with your lordship in that point as he doth, since he seeketh not to hinder him, but to further him: therefore I think it best that he go to the matter that is laid to him of the convocation, and make no longer answer.

Philpot. I would willingly shew my mind of the matter, but I am sure it will be laid against me to my face when I come to judgment.

B. Why then you may speak by protestation.

Philpot. But what shall my protestation avail in a matter of heresy (as you call it), if I speak otherwise than you will have me; since that which I spake in the convocation-house, being a place privileged, cannot now be taken against me?

Bonner. But, Mr. D. Cole, may not I proceed against him for that offence he hath done in my diocese?

Cole. You may call him before you, my lord, if he be found in your diocese.

Philpot. But I have by force been brought out of my own diocese to my lord's, and required to be judged by my own ordinary: and therefore I know Mr. Doctor will not say of his own knowledge, that your lordship ought to proceed against me. And here Mr. Doctor would say nothing.

Worcester. Do you not think to find before my lord here, as good equity in your cause, as before your own ordinary?

Philpot. I cannot blame my lord of London's equity, with whom (I thank his lordship) I have found more gentleness since I came, than of mine own ordinary (I speak it for no flattery) this year and half before, who never would call me to answer, as his lordship hath done now twice. No man is forbid to use his own right due unto him; but I ought not to be forestalled of my right, and therefore I challenge the same for divers other considerations.

Bonner. Now you cannot say hereafter but that you have been gently communed with by my lords here, and yet you will be wilful and obstinate in your error, and in your own opinions, and will not shew any cause why you will not come into the unity of the church with us.

Philpot. My lords, in that I do not declare my mind according to your expectations, is (as I have said) because I cannot speak without present danger of my life. But rather than you should report me by this either obstinate or self-willed without any just ground whereupon I stand; I will open unto you somewhat of my mind, or rather the whole, desiring your lordships, which seem to be the pillars of the church of England, to satisfy me in the same: and I will refer all other causes in which I dissent from you, unto one or two articles, or rather to one, which includeth them both; in which if I can by the scriptures be satisfied at your mouths, I shall as willingly agree to you as to any other, in all points.

Bonner. These heretics come always with their ifs, as this man doth now, saying, if he can be satisfied by the scriptures: so that he will always have this exception, I am not satisfied, although the matter be ever so plainly proved against him. But will you promise to be satisfied, if my lords take some pains about you?

Philpot. I say, my lord, I will be satisfied by the scriptures in that wherein I stand. And I protest here before God and his eternal Son Jesus Christ my Saviour, and the Holy Ghost, and his angels, and you here present who be judges of what I speak, that I do not stand in any opinion of wilfulness or singularity, but only upon my conscience, certainly informed by God's word, from which I dare not go for fear of damnation: and this is the cause of mine earnestness in this behalf.

Bonner. I will trouble my lords no longer, seeing that you will not declare your mind.

Philpot. I am about so to do, if it please your lordship to hear me speak.

Bath. Give me leave, my lord, to hear what he hath to say.

Philpot. My lords, it is not unknown to you, that the chief cause why you do count me, and such as I am, for heretics, is because we be not at unity with your church. You say, that whosoever is out of your church is damned: and we think verily on the other side, that if we depart from the true church, whercon we are grafted in God's word, we should stand in the state of damnation. Wherefore if your lordships can bring any better authority for your church than we can do for our's, and prove by the scriptures that the church of Rome now (of which you are) is the true catholic church, as in all sermons, writings and arguments you do uphold, and that all christian persons ought to be ruled by the same, under pain of damnation, (as you say) and that the same church (as you pretend) hath authority to interpret the scriptures as it seemeth her good, and that all men are bound to follow such interpretations only; I shall be as conformable to the same church as you may desire me, which otherwise I dare not: therefore I require you for God's sake to satisfy me in this.

Cole. If you stand upon this point only, you may soon be satisfied if you please.

Philpot. It is the thing that I require, and to this I will stand, and refer all other controversies wherein I now stand against you, and will put my hand thereto, if you mistrust my word.

Bonner. I pray you, Mr. Philpot, what faith were you of twenty years ago? This man will have every year a new faith.

Philpot. My lord, to tell you plain, I think I was of no faith; for I was then a wicked liver, and knew not God then as I ought to do, God forgive me.

Bonner. No faith? that is not so. I am sure you were of some faith.

Philpot. My lord, I have declared to you on my conscience what I then was, and judge of myself. And what is that to the purpose of the thing I desire to be satisfied of you?

Bonner. Mr. Doctor Cole, I pray you speak your mind to him.

Cole. What will you say, if I can prove it was decreed by an universal council in Athanasius's time, that all the christian church should follow the determination of the church of Rome? but I do not now remember where.

Philpot. If you, Mr. Doctor, can shew me the same granted to the see of Rome by the authority of the scripture, I will gladly hearken thereto. But I think you be not able to shew any such thing: for Athanasius was president of the Nicene council, and there was no such thing decreed I am sure.

Cole. Though it were not then, it might be at another time.

Philpot. I desire to see the proof thereof.

And upon this Mr. Harpsfield, the chancellor to the bishop of London, brought in a book of Ireneus, with certain leaves turned in, and laid it before the bishops to help them in their perplexity, if it might be: which after the bishops of Bath and Gloucester had read together, the bishop of Gloucester gave me the book, and said:

Take the book, Mr. Philpot, and look upon that place, and there you may see how the church of Rome is to be followed of all men.

Philpot. I took the book and read the place, which after I had read, I said it made nothing against me, but against Arians and other heretics, against whom Ireneus wrote, proving that they were not to be credited, because they did teach and follow after strange doctrine in Europe, and that the chief church of the same, was founded by Peter and Paul, and had to this time continued by faithful succession of the faithful bishops in preaching the true gospel, as they had received of the apostles, and nothing like to these late sprung heretics, &c. Whereby he concludeth against them, that they were not to be heard, neither to be credited, which thing, if you, my lords, be able to prove of the church of Rome, then had you as good authority against me in my cause now, as Ireneus had against those heretics. But the church of Rome hath swerved from the truth and simplicity of the gospel which it maintained in Ireneus's time, and was uncorrupted from that which it is now, wherefore your lordships cannot justly apply the authority of Ireneus to the church of Rome now, which is so manifestly corrupted from the primitive church.

Bonner. So will you say still it maketh nothing to the purpose, whatsoever authority we bring, and will never be satisfied.

Philpot. My lord, when I do by just reason prove, that the authorities which are brought against me do not make to the purpose, as I have already proved, I trust you will receive mine answer.

Worcester. It is to be proved most manifestly by all ancient writers, that the see of Rome hath always followed the truth, and never was deceived, until of late certain heretics had defaced the same.

Philpot. Let that be proved, and I have done.

Worcester. Nay, you are of such arrogance, singularity, and vain-glory, that you will never see it, be ever so well proved.

Philpot. Ha, my lords, is it now time, think you for me to follow singularity or vain-glory, since I am now upon danger of my life and death, not only presently, but also before God to come? And I know I die not in the true faith, I shall die everlastingly: again I know, if I do not as you would have me, you will kill me, and a great many more: yet I had rather to perish at your hands, than to perish eternally. At this time I have lost all my commodities of this world, and lay in a coal-house, where a man would lay a dog, with which I am well contented.

Cole. Where are you able to prove that the church of Rome hath erred at any time? and by what history? Certain it is by Eusebius, that the church was established at Rome by Peter and Paul, and that Peter was bishop twenty-five years at Rome.

Philpot. I know well that Eusebius so writeth: but if we compare that which St. Paul writeth to the Galatians, chap. 1. the contrary will manifestly appear, that he was not half so long there. He lived not past three or five years after he was called to be an apostle: and Paul maketh mention of his abiding at Jerusalem after Christ's death more than thirteen years.

Cole. What did Peter write to the Galatians?

Philpot. No, I say Paul maketh mention of his writing to the Galatians, and of his abiding at Jerusalem. And further, I am able to prove, both by Eusebius and other historiographers, that the church of Rome hath manifestly erred, and at this present doth err, because she agreeth not with that which they wrote. The primitive church did use according to the gospel, and there needeth none other proof, but to compare the one with the other.

Bonner. I may compare this man to a certain man read of, who fell into a desperation, and went into a wood to hang himself, and when he came there, went viewing of every tree, and could find none which he might vouchsafe to hang himself. But I will not apply this as I might. I pray you (Mr. Doctor) go forth with him.

Cole. My lord, there be on every side of me, for who are better able to answer him, and I love not to fall into disputation: for we now-a-days sustain slander and obloquy thereby of the people. I had rather leave my mind in writing.

Philpot. And I had rather you should do so, otherwise, for then a man may better judge of your words, than by argument, and I beseech you so to do. But if I were a rich man, I durst wager an hundred pounds that you shall not be able to shew that which you have said, to be decreed by a general council in Athanasius's time. For this I am sure of, that it was not decreed by a general council in Africa, many years after, that none of Africa (under pain of excommunication) should appeal to Rome: which decree I am sure they would not have made, if by the scriptures and an universal council it had been decreed, that all should abide and follow the determination of the church of Rome.

Cole. But I can shew that they revoked that again.

Philpot. So you say, Mr. Doctor, but I pray you shew me where. I have hitherto heard nothing of yours to my satisfaction, but bare words without authority.

Bonner. What, I pray you, ought we to dispute you of our faith? Justinian in the law hath a title de Catholica, to the contrary.

Philpot. I am certain the civil law hath such a constitution: but our faith must not depend upon the law. For as St. Ambrose saith, Not the law, but the gospel hath gathered the church together.

Worcester. Mr. Philpot, you have the spirit of contention wherewith you be led, which will not let you yield to the truth: leave it off for shame.

Philpot. Sir, I am sure I have the spirit of faith.

h I speak at this present; neither am I ashamed to to my faith.
 Gloucester. What? do you think yourself better ed than so many notable learned men as be
 Philpot. Elias alone had the truth, when there were hundred priests against him.
 Gloucester. Oh, you would be counted now for Elias.
 yet I tell thee he was deceived: for he thought e had been none good but himself; and yet he deceived, for there were seven thousand besides Philpot. Yea, but he was not deceived in doctrine, e other four hundred were.
 Gloucester. By my faith you are greatly to blame, you cannot be content to be of the church which hath been of that faithful antiquity.
 Philpot. My lord, I know Rome, and have been e, where I saw your lordship.
 Gloucester. Indeed I did fly hence thither, but I ember not that I saw you there. But I am sorry you have been there; for the wickedness which have seen there peradventure causeth you to do ou do.
 Philpot. No, my lord, I do not as I do for that e: for I am taught otherwise by the gospel, not al-ther to refuse the minister for his evil living, so that ring sound doctrine out of God's book.
 Gloucester. Do you think the universal church may eceived?
 Philpot. St. Paul to the Thessalonians prophesieth there should come an universal departing from faith in the latter days before the coming of Christ, g, that "Christ shall not come, till there come parting first."
 Gloucester. Yea, I pray you, how take you the depart-here in St. Paul? it is not meant of faith, but of departing from the empire; for it is in Greek, STASIA.
 Philpot. Marry indeed you, Mr. Doctor, put me in remembrance of the meaning of St. Paul in that e, for APOSTASIA is properly a departing from the e, and thereof cometh Apostata, which properly sieth one that departeth from his faith: and St.
in the same place after speaketh of the decay of empire.
 Gloucester. APOSTASIA doth not only signify a departing the faith, but also from the empire, as I am able ew, Philpot. I never read it so taken, and when you shall le to shew it (as you say in words), I will believe ad not before.
 Gloucester. I am sorry that you should be against christian world.
 Philpot. The world commonly, and such as be cal-christians, (for the multitude) have hated the truth, been enemies of the same.
 Gloucester. Why, Mr. Philpot, do you think that universal church hath erred, and you only be in the
 Philpot. The church that you are of was never uni-l, for two parts of the world, which are Asia and ca, never consented to the supremacy of the bishop ome, as at this day they do not, neither do they w his decrees,
 Gloucester. Yes, in the Florentine council they did Philpot. It was said so by false report, after they of and Africa were gone home: but it was not so ed, as the sequel of them all hitherto doth prove contrary, Gloucester. I pray you by whom will you be judged atters of controversy which happen daily?
 Philpot. By the word of God. For Christ saith in ohn, "The word that he spake, shall be judge in ter day."
 Gloucester. What if you take the word one way, and ther way: who shall be judge then?
 Philpot. The primitive church.
 Gloucester. I know you mean the doctors that wrote of.

Philpot. I mean verily so, Gloucester. What if you take the doctors in one sense, and I in another: who shall be judge then?
 Philpot. Then let that be taken which is most agreeable to God's word.
 Cole. My lords, why do you trouble yourselves to answer him in this matter? It is not the thing which is laid to his charge, but his error of the sacrament, and he to shift himself of that brought in another matter.
 Philpot. This is the matter, Mr. Cole, to which I have referred all other questions, and desire to be satisfied.
 Gloucester. It is a wonder to see how he standeth with a few against a great multitude.
 Philpot. We have almost as many as you. For we have Asia, Africa, Germany, Denmark, and a great part of France, and daily the number of the gospel doth increase: so that I am credibly informed, that for this religion in which I stand, and for which I am like to die, a great multitude daily come out of France through persecution, that the cities of Germany be scarce able to receive them: and therefore your lordship may be sure, the word of God will one day take place, do what you can to the contrary, Gloucester. They were well occupied to bring you such news, and you have been well kept to have such resort unto you. Thou art the arrogantest fellow, and stoutest fond fellow, that ever I knew.
 Philpot. I pray your lordship to bear with my hasty speech: it is part of my corrupt nature to speak somewhat hastily: but for all that, I mean with humility to do my duty to your lordship.
 Bonner. Mr. Philpot, my lords will trouble you no farther at this time, but you shall go from whence you came, and have such favour as in the mean while I can shew you: and upon Wednesday next you shall be called upon again to be heard what you can say for the maintenance of your error.
 Philpot. My lord, my desire is to be satisfied of you in that I required; and your lordship shall find me as I have said.
 Gloucester. We wish you as well as ourselves.
 Philpot. I think the same (my lords), but fear you are deceived, and have a zeal of yourselves, not according to knowledge.
 Gloucester. God send you more grace.
 Philpot. And also God increase the same in you, and open your eyes, that you may see to maintain his truth, and his true church.
 Then the bishops rose up, and consulted together, and caused a writing to be made, in which I think my blood by them was bought and sold, and thereto they put their hands; and after this I was carried to my coal-house again,

Thus ended the fourth part of this tragedy. God hasten the end thereof to his glory, Amen.

Because I have begun to write unto you of mine examinations before the bishops and others, more to satisfy your desire than it is any thing worthy to be written; I thought it good to write unto you also that which had been done of late, that the same might come to light which they do in darkness, and in privy corners, and that the world now, and posterity hereafter, might know how disorderly, unjustly, and unlearnedly these ravenous wolves do proceed against the silly and faithful flock of Christ, and condemn and persecute the sincere doctrine of Christ in us, which they are not able by honest means to resist, but only by tyranny and violence.

The FIFTH EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, before the BISHOPS of LONDON, ROCHESTER, St. ASAPH, &c. and others, in the GALLERY of my LORD of LONDON'S PALACE.

BONNER. Mr. Philpot, come you hither, I have desired my lords here, and other learned men, to take some pains once again to do you good, and because I do mind to sit in judgment on you to-morrow, as I am

am commanded, yet I would you should have as much favour as I can shew you, if you will be any thing conformable; therefore play the wise man, and be not singular in your own opinion, but be ruled by these learned men.

Philpot. My lord, in that you say you will sit on me in judgment to-morrow, I am glad thereof: for I was promised by them which sent me unto you, that I should have been judged the next day after: but promise hath not been kept with me, to my farther grief. I look for none other but death at your hands, and I am as ready to yield my life in Christ's cause, as you are to require it.

Bonner. Lo, what a wilful man is this? By my faith it is but folly to reason with him, neither with any of these heretics. I am sorry that you will be no more tractable, and that I am compelled to shew extremity against you.

Philpot. My lord, you need not to shew extremity against me unless you will: neither by the law (as I have said) have you any thing to do with me, for that you are not my ordinary, however I am (contrary to all right) in your prison.

Bonner. Why, the queen's commissioners sent you hither unto me, upon your examination held before them. I know not well the cause; but I am sure they would not have sent you hither unto me, unless you had some talk with them, otherwise than it becometh a christian man.

Philpot. My lord, indeed they sent me hither without any occasion then ministered by me. Only they laid unto me the disputation I made in the convocation-house, requiring me to answer the same, and to recant it. Which because I would not do, they sent me hither to your lordship.

Bonner. Why did you not answer them thereto?

Philpot. For that they were temporal men, and ought not to be judges in spiritual causes whereof they demanded me, without shewing any authority whereby I was bound to answer them, and hereupon they committed me to your prison.

Bonner. Indeed I remember now, you maintained open heresy in my diocese: wherefore the commissioners sent you unto me that I should proceed against you, for this you have spoke in my diocese.

Philpot. My lord, I stand still upon my lawful plea in this behalf; that though it were a great heresy, as you suppose it, yet I ought not to be troubled for it, in respect of the privilege of the parliament-house, whereof the convocation-house is a member, where all men in matters propounded may frankly speak their minds; and here is present a gentleman of the queen's majesty that was present at the disputation, and can testify the questions which were then in controversy were not set forth by me, but by the prolocutor, who required in the queen's majesty's name, all men to dispute their minds freely in the same that were of the house.

The Queen's Gentleman. Though the parliament-house be a place of privilege for men of the house to speak, yet none may speak treason against the queen, or maintain treason against the crown.

Philpot. But if there be any matter which otherwise it were treason to speak of, were it treason for any person to speak therein, especially the thing being proposed by the speaker? I think not.

The Queen's Gentleman. You may make the matter easy enough to you yet, as I perceive, if you will revoke the same which you did there so stubbornly maintain.

St. Asaph. This man did not speak under reformation, as many there did, but as earnestly and persuasively as ever I heard any.

Philpot. My lords, since you will not cease to trouble me for that I have lawfully done, neither will admit my just defence for what was spoke in the convocation-house by me, contrary to the laws and custom of the realm; I appeal to the whole parliament-house, to be judged by the same, whether I ought thus to be molested for what I have there spoken.

Rochester. But have you spoken and maintained the same since that time, or no?

Philpot. If any man can charge me justly therewith here I stand to make answer.

Rochester. How say you to it now? will you stand to that you have spoken in the convocation-house, and you think you then said well, or no?

Philpot. My lord, you are not mine ordinary to proceed Ex Officio against me, and therefore I am bound to tell you my conscience at your demands.

St. Asaph. What say you now? Is there not in this blessed sacrament of the altar (and with that they all off their caps for reverence of the idol) the presence of our Saviour Christ, really and substantially after the words of consecration?

Philpot. I do believe in the sacrament of Christ's body, duly ministered, to be such manner of presence as the word teacheth me to believe.

St. Asaph. I pray you, how is that?

Philpot. As for that I will declare another time when I shall be lawfully called to dispute my mind in this matter, but I am not yet driven to that point. And the scripture saith, "All things ought to be done after an order."

Another Bishop. This is a froward and vain-glorious man.

Bonner. It is not lawful for a man by the civil law to dispute of his faith openly, as it appeared in the title, De summa Trinitate & fide Catholica.

Philpot. My lord, I have answered you to the question before.

Bonner. Why, I never asked thee of this before now.

Philpot. Yes, that you did at my last examination and moreover I answered your lordship by St. Ambrose that the church is congregated by the word, and not by man's law. Wherefore I now add further of saying, "That he which refuseth the word, objecteth the law, is an unjust man, because he shall live by faith." And moreover, my lord, there which your lordship alledgeth out of the law, make it not unlawful to dispute of all the articles of the faith but of the Trinity.

Bonner. Thou liest, it is not so: and I will shew you by the book how ignorant he is.

And with that he went with all haste to his study and brought his book, and openly read the text in title of the law, and charged me with such words seemed to make for his purpose, saying, How sayest thou to this?

Philpot. My lord, I say as I said before, that the law meaneth of the catholic faith, determined in the council of Chalcedon, where the articles of the faith were only concluded upon.

Bonner. Thou art the veriest beast that ever I heard, I must needs speak it, thou compellest me thereunto.

Philpot. Your lordship may speak your pleasure to me. But what is this to the purpose, which your lordship is so earnest in? You know that our faith is grounded upon the civil law: therefore it is not material to me whatsoever the law saith.

Bonner. By what law wilt thou be judged? Wilt thou be judged by the common law?

Philpot. No, my lord, our faith dependeth not upon the laws of man.

St. Asaph. He will be judged by no law, but as he will himself.

Worcester. The common laws are but abstractions from the scriptures and doctors.

Philpot. Whatsoever you do make them, they have no ground of my faith, by which I ought to be judged.

Bonner. I must needs proceed against thee to-morrow.

Philpot. If your lordship so do, I will have Executionem fori: for you are not my competent judge.

Bonner. By what law canst thou refuse me to be thy judge?

Philpot. By the civil law, De competente judice.

Bonner. There is no such title in the law. In what as it, as cunning a lawyer as you are?

Philpot. My lord, I take upon me no great cunning law: but you drive me to my shifts for my defence, and I am sure if I had the books of the law, I should know what I say.

Bonner. What, De competente judice? I will go bring my books. There is a title indeed, De officiis

Philpot. Verily, that is the same De competente judice, which I have alledged. With that he ran to his study, and brought the whole course of the law between his hands, which (as it might appear) he had well occupied, and the dust they were covered with.

Bonner. There are the books: find it now if thou canst, and I will promise to release thee out of prison.

Philpot. My lord, I stand not here to reason matters of civil law, although I am not altogether ignorant of the same; for that I have been a student in the law for seven years; but to answer to the articles of faith which you may lawfully burden me. And whereas you go about unlawfully to proceed, I challenge, according to my knowledge, the benefit of the law in my defence.

Bonner. Why, thou wilt answer directly to nothing that I charge thee with: therefore say not hereafter but what thou hast been satisfied here by learned men, if thou wouldst have declared your mind.

Philpot. My lord, I have declared my mind unto you, and to other of the bishops at my last being with you, desiring you to be satisfied but of one thing, whereof I have referred all other controversies: which if your lordships now, or other learned men can simply solve me of, I am as contented to be conformable in things, as you shall require; which is to prove that the church of Rome (whereof you are) is the catholic church.

Bonner. Do you not believe your creed, "I believe the catholic church?"

Philpot. Yes, that I do: but I cannot understand the same (wherewithal you burden us) to be the same, other like to it.

St. Asaph. It is most evident that St. Peter did build the catholic church at Rome. And Christ said, "Thou art Peter; and upon this rock will I build my church." And the succession of bishops in the see of Rome can be proved from time to time, as it can be of none other place so well, which is a manifest probation of the catholic church, as divers doctors do write.

Philpot. That you would have to be undoubted, is most uncertain, and that by the authority which you allege of Christ, saying unto Peter, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church," unless you can prove that rock to signify Rome, as you would make us believe. And although you can prove the succession of bishops from Peter, yet this is not sufficient to prove Rome the catholic church, unless you can prove the profession of Peter's faith, wherupon the catholic church is built, to have continued in his succession at Rome, and at this present to remain.

Bonner. Are there any more churches than one catholic church? And I pray tell me into what faith were you baptized?

Philpot. I acknowledge one holy catholic and apostolic church, whereof I am a member (I praise God), and of that catholic faith of Christ whereinto I was baptized.

Bonner. I pray you, can you tell what this word catholic doth signify? shew if you can.

Philpot. Yes, that I can, I thank God. The catholic church, or the catholic church, is not as now-a-days people are taught, to be that which is most universal, by most part of men received, whereby you do infer it to hang upon the multitude, which is not so: I esteem the catholic church to be as St. Austin saith the same: "We judge, faith he, the catholic church, of that which hath been, is, and shall be." So that if you can be able to prove, that your faith and church hath been from the beginning taught, and is, and shall be; then you may count yourselves catholic, otherwise not. And catholic is a Greek word compounded of KATA, which signifieth, after, or according, and HOLON, a sum, or principle, or whole. So that catholic church, or catholic faith, is as much as to say, the first, whole, sound, or chief faith.

Bonner. Doth St. Austin say so as he alledged it? or doth he mean as he taketh the same? How say you, Mr. Curtop?

Curtop. Indeed, my lord, St. Austin hath such a saying, speaking against the Donatists, that the catholic faith ought to be esteemed of things in times past, and as they are practised according to the same, and ought to be through all ages, and not after a new manner, as the Donatists began to profess.

Philpot. You have said well, Mr. Curtop, and after the meaning of St. Austin, and to confirm that which I have said for the signification of catholic.

Coventry. Let the book be seen, my lord.

Bonner. I pray you, my lord, be content, or in good faith I will break even off, and let all alone. Do you think that the catholic church (until within these few years, in which a few upon singularity have swerved from the same) hath erred?

Philpot. I do not think that the catholic church can err in doctrine: but I require you to prove this church of Rome to be the catholic church.

Curtop. I can prove that Irenaeus (which was within an hundred years after Christ) came to Victor, then bishop of Rome, to ask his advice about the excommunication of certain heretics, which (by all likelihood) he would not have done, if he had not taken him to be supreme head.

Coventry. Mark well this argument. How are you able to answer the same? Answer if you can.

Philpot. It is soon answered, my lord, for that is of no force; neither doth this fact of Irenaeus make any more for the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, than mine hath done, who have been at Rome as well as he, and might have spoken with the pope if I had list; and yet I would none in England did favour his supremacy more than I.

St. Asaph. You are more to blame (by the faith of my body) for that you favour the same no better, since all the catholic church (until these few years) have taken him to be the supreme head of the church, besides this good man Irenaeus.

Philpot. That is not likely, that Irenaeus so took him, or the primitive church: for I am able to shew seven general councils after Irenaeus's time, wherein he never took him for supreme head.

The other bishop. This man will never be satisfied, say what we can. It is but folly to reason any more with him.

Philpot. O, my lords, would you have me satisfied with nothing? Judge, I pray you, who hath better authority, he which bringeth the example of one man going to Rome, or I that by these many general councils am able to prove, that he was never so taken in many hundred years after Christ, as by Nicene, Ephesine, the first and second Chalcedon, Constantinopolitan, Carthaginense, Aquilense.

Coventry. Why will you not admit the church of Rome to be the catholic church?

Philpot. Because it followeth not the primitive catholic church, neither agreeth with the same, no more than an apple is like a nut.

Coventry. Wherein doth it dissent?

Philpot. It were too long to recite all, but two things I will name, the supremacy and transubstantiation.

Curtop. As for transubstantiation, albeit it was set forth and decreed for an article of faith not much above three hundred years ago, yet it was always believed in the church.

Bonner. Yes, that it was. Very well said of you, Mr. Curtop.

Philpot. You have said right, that transubstantiation is but a late plantation of the bishop of Rome, and you are not able to shew any ancient writer, that believed any such thing; and with this Curtop shrank away. And immediately after the ambassador of Spain came in, to whom my Lord of London went, leaving the others with me. To whom I said, My Lords, if you can shew me that this church of Rome (whereof you are members) is the true catholic church, I shall be content to be one thereof, and as conformable to the same as you can require me in all things; for I know there is no salvation but within the church.

Coventry. Can you disprove that the church of Rome is the catholic church?

Philpot. Yes, that I am able, but I desire rather to hear of you the proof thereof. And seeing I cannot have my request at your hands, neither be satisfied with any probable authority, I will shew you good proof why it is not. For if the primitive church were catholic, as it was indeed, and ought to be the form and school-mistress unto the world's end; then is not the church of Rome now the catholic church, which dissenteth so far from the same both in doctrine and use of the sacraments.

Coventry. How prove you that the church of Rome now dissenteth in doctrine and use of the sacraments from the primitive church?

Philpot. Compare the one with the other, and it shall soon appear; as you may see both in Eusebius and other ecclesiastical and ancient writers.

Coventry. What have you to say more, why it is not the catholic church?

Philpot. Because it is not [by your interpretation of catholic] universal, neither ever was, albeit you falsely persuade the people it is so. For the world being divided into three parts, Asia, Africa, and Europe, two parts thereof, Asia and Africa, professing Christ as well as we, did never consent to the church of Rome, which is of Europe; which is a sufficient testimony that your faith was never universal.

Coventry. How prove you that?

Philpot. All the historians which write of the proceedings of the church, do testify the same. Besides that, this present time doth declare that to be true which I say; for at present the churches of Asia, and Africa, do not consent to the church of Rome. Yea, and besides all this, most part of Europe doth not agree, neither allow the church of Rome; as Germany, the kingdom of Denmark, the kingdom of Poland, a great part of France, England, and Zealand, which is a manifest probation that your church is not universal.

After this the bishop of London called away the other bishops, and left with me divers gentlemen, with certain of his chaplains, as Dr. Saverfon, an Englishman, who began with me in this manner.

Dr. Saverfon. Mr. Philpot, I remember you beyond sea, since the time you reasoned with a friar, (a notable learned man) coming from Venice to Padua in a barge.

Philpot. I cannot forget that; for the friar threatened to accuse me of heresy as soon as he came to Padua, because I talked to him so boldly of the truth. He was not so learned a man as you name him to be, but only in his school points a good purgatory friar.

Dr. Saverfon. Well, he was a learned man for all that. And I am sorry that you this day, having communed with so many notable learned men, are no more conformable to them than you be.

Philpot. I will be conformable to all them that be conformable to Christ in his word. And I pray you, good Mr. Doctor, be not so conformable to please men more than God, contrary to your learning, for worldly estimation sake.

Dr. Saverfon. No, that I am not. Upon what occasion should you think thus of me?

Philpot. Upon no evil that I do know of you, Mr. Doctor, but I speak as one wishing that you should not be led away from the truth, for promotion's sake, as many be now-a-days.

Dr. Saverfon. I have heard your arguments hitherto, and think that a great many of the old ancient writers be against you, in that you do not allow the church of Rome, neither the supremacy; for St. Cyprian (which is an ancient writer) doth allow the bishop of Rome to be supreme head of the church.

Philpot. That I am sure he doth not. For he, writing to Cornelius, then bishop of Rome, calleth him his companion and his fellow bishop, neither attributeth to him the name either of pope, or of any other usurped terms, which now be ascribed to the bishop of Rome to the setting forth of his dignity.

Dr. Saverfon. You cannot be able to shew that St. Cyprian calleth Cornelius his fellow-bishop.

Philpot. I will wager you with what I am able to make, that I can shew it you in St. Cyprian, as I have said.

Dr. Saverfon. I will lay no other wager with you, but your book for book, that it is not so.

Philpot. I agree thereto, and I pray you one of your lord's chaplains to fetch us Cyprian hither for the purpose hereof. And with that one of them went to my library, and he brought forth Cyprian, and by and by turned to the first book of his epistles, the third epistle, and there he would have seemed to gather a strong argument for the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, because he saith, "It goeth not well with the church when a high-priest is not obeyed, which supplieth the stead of Christ, after God's word, and the consent of his fellow-bishops and the agreement of the people."

Dr. Saverfon. How can you avoid this place which maketh so plainly for the bishop of Rome's supremacy?

Philpot. It maketh not so plain, Mr. Doctor, as you gather, as by and by I will give you to understand. But first I challenge the wager which we made, that your book is mine. For here you may see that he calleth Cornelius his fellow-bishop, as he doth also in other places. And for the understanding of the place, you do misconstrue it, to take the high-priest only for the bishop of Rome, and otherwise than it was in his time. For there were by the Nicene council four patriarchs appointed, the patriarch of Jerusalem, the patriarch of Constantinople, the patriarch of Alexandria, and the patriarch of Rome, of which four, the patriarch of Rome was placed lowest in the council, and so continued many years, for the time of seven or eight general councils, as I can shew.

Therefore St. Cyprian writing to Cornelius, patriarch of Rome, (whom he calleth his fellow-bishop) findeth himself offended that certain heretics, being justly excommunicated by him, (as the Novatians were) did fly from his diocese, which was their chief bishop, (refusing to be obedient to him and to be reformed) to the bishop of Rome, and the patriarch of Constantinople, and there were received in communion of the congregation, in derogation of good order and discipline in the church, and to the maintaining of heresies and schisms: and that heresies did spring up, and schisms daily rise hereof, that obedience was not given to the priest of God, nor was it once considered him to be in the church for the time the priest, and for the time the judge in Christ's stead (as in the decree of the Nicene council was appointed) not the bishop of Rome only, but every patriarch in his precinct; who had every one of them a college or cathedral church of learned priests, in hearing of whom by convocation of his fellow-bishops, with the consent of the people, all heresies were determined by the word of God: and this is the meaning of St. Cyprian.

Dr. Saverfon. You take it so, but it seemeth to me otherwise.

Philpot. Upon what ground it should seem otherwise unto you I know not, but this meaning which I have declared, the general councils, seven or eight, one after another, confirmed it so to be, which did not allow of a supreme head only.

Pendleton. There were not so many general councils but four only allowed.

Philpot. That is not so, Mr. Pendleton, although there be four specially allowed for the confirmation of the Trinity: but besides these four, there were many other general councils, as you may learn by many writers.

A Chaplain. Did not Christ build his church upon Peter? St. Cyprian saith so.

Philpot. St. Cyprian, De simplicitate Prælatorum, de in what respect he so said: "God gave in person the keys to all, that he might signify the man, the keys to all, that he might signify the of all men." And also St. Augustine saith in the treatise of St. John, "If in Peter had not been the treasury of the church, the Lord had not said unto him, I give unto thee the keys. For if that were said to the church hath them not; if the church have them, when Peter received them, he signified the whole church." And also St. Hieron, a priest of Rome, writing to Nepotian, saith, "That all churches do lean unto their own pastors, where he speaketh of the ecclesiastical hierarchy or regiment," where he maketh no mention of the bishop of Rome. And to Evagrius, he saith, "That wheresoever a bishop be, whether it be at Rome, at Evagi, or at Rhegium, he is of one power and jurisdiction."

Dr. Saverfon. St. Hieron De celesti Hierarchia? as Dionysius you mean.

Philpot. I say not that Hieron wrote any book so called. But I say, that in the epistle by me alledged, maketh mention of the ecclesiastical regiment.

Dr. Saverfon. I wonder you will stand so stedfast in error to your own destruction.

Philpot. I am sure we are in no error, by the promise of Christ made to the faithful once, which is, that he will give to his true church such a spirit of wisdom, that the adversaries thereof should never be able to resist.

by this I know we are of the truth, for that neither by reasoning, neither by writing, your synagoga of Rome is able to answer. Where is there one of you all that ever hath been able to answer any of the learned ministers of Germany, who have disclosed your counterfeit religion? Which of you all (at this day) is able to answer Calvin's institutions, who is minister of Geneva?

Dr. Saverfon. A godly minister indeed, a receiver of out-purges and runagate traitors. And of late I can see you, there is such contention fallen between him and his own sects, that he was obliged to fly the town, out of predestination. I tell you truth, for I came by Geneva here.

Philpot. I am sure your blaspheme that godly man, and that godly church where he is minister; as it is your archbishop's disposition, when you cannot answer men by reasoning, to answer them with blasphemies and false reports. For in the matter of predestination he is in another opinion than all the doctors of the church be, according to the scriptures.

Dr. Saverfon. Men are able to answer him if they will. And I pray you, which of you has answered bishop Her's book?

Philpot. Yes, Mr. Doctor, that book is answered, and answered again, if you like to seek what hath been written against him.

And after this Dr. Story came in. To whom I said, Mr. Doctor, you have done me great injury, and with the law have straitly imprisoned me, more like a dog in a man. And besides this you have not kept promise with me, for you promised that I should be judged the next day after.

Dr. Story. I am come now to keep promise with thee. Is there ever such a fantastical man as this is? nay, there is no man, he is a beast; yea, these heretics be worse than brute beasts: for they will upon a vain fancy take upon them to be wiser than all men, being indeed very fools and ass-heads, not able to maintain at which of an arrogant obstinacy they do stand in.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, I am content to abide your judgment of me now. Say what you will, I am content, for I am under your feet to be trodden on as I like. God forgive it you; yet I am no heretic. Neither you nor any other shall be able to prove that I am one jot against the word of God otherwise than a Christian man ought.

Dr. Story. The word of God? forsooth the word of God? It is but a folly to reason with these heretics, for they are incurable and desperate. But yet I may reason with thee, not that I have any hope to win thee: whom I appoint to judge of the word whereto thou standest?

Philpot. Verily the word itself.

Dr. Story. Do you not see the ignorance of this beastly heretic? he willeth the word to be judged of the word. Can the word speak?

Philpot. If I cannot prove that which I have said by good authority, I will be content to be counted an heretic and an ignorant person, and further what you please.

Dr. Story. Let us hear what wise authority thou canst bring in.

Philpot. It is the word of Christ in St. John, "The word which I have spoken, shall judge in the last day." If the word shall judge in the last day, how much more ought it to judge of our doings now; and I am sure I have my judge on my side, who will absolve and justify me in another world. Howsoever now it shall please you by authority unrighteously to judge of me and others, sure I am in another world to judge you.

Dr. Story. What? you purpose to be a stinking martyr, and to sit in judgment with Christ at the last day to judge the twelve tribes of Israel?

Philpot. Yea, sir, I doubt not thereof, having the promise of Christ, if I die for righteousness sake, which you have begun to persecute in me.

Dr. Story. I told you it was but in vain to argue with this heretic; he is drowned in heresies without all learning.

Philpot. Sir, I have brought you good authority for what I have said out of God's book, to which you answer nothing, but go on still to give railing judgment against me without any cause.

Dr. Story. I will come to you by and by. When the judge in Westminster-Hall giveth sentence, doth the word give sentence, or the judge? Tell me.

Philpot. Civil matters are subject to civil men, and they have authority by the word to be judges of them. But the word of God is not subject to man's judgment, but ought to judge all the wisdom, thoughts, and doings of men, and therefore your comparison disproveth nothing that I have said, neither answereth any whit thereto.

Dr. Story. Wilt thou not allow the interpretation of the church upon the scriptures?

Philpot. Yes, if it be according to the word of the true church: and this I say to you, as I have said heretofore, that if you can prove the church of Rome (whercof you are) to be the true catholic church which I ought to follow, I will be as ready to yield thereto (as long as it can be so proved) as you may desire me.

Dr. Story. What a fellow is this? He will believe nothing but what he knoweth himself. Are we not in possession of the church? Have not our forefathers these many hundred years taken this church for the catholic church whercof we are now? And if we had no other proof but this, it were sufficient; for the prescription of time maketh a good title in the law.

Philpot. You do well, Mr. Doctor, to alledge prescription of many years, for it is all that you have to shew for yourselves. But you must understand, that prescription hath no place in matters belonging unto God, as I am able to shew by the testimony of many doctors.

Dr. Story. Well, sir, you are like to go after your father Latimer the sophister, and Ridley, who had nothing to alledge for himself, but that he learned his heresy of Cranmer. When I came to him with a poor bachelor of art, he trembled as though he had had the palsy, as these heretics have always some token of fear whereby a man may know them, as you may see this man's eyes do tremble in his head. But I dispatched them; and I tell thee that there never yet hath been one burnt, but I have spoke with him, and have been a cause of his dispatch.

Philpot. You have the more to answer for, Mr. Doctor, as you shall feel in another world, how much sooner you do now triumph of your proceedings.

Dr. Story. I tell thee I will never be confessed thereof. And because I cannot now tarry to speak with my lord, I pray one of you to tell my lord, that my coming was to signify to his lordship, that he must out of hand put this heretic out of the way. And going away he said to me, I certify thee, that thou mayest thank no other man but me.

Philpot. I thank you therefore with all my heart, and forgive it you.

Story. What, dost thou thank me? If I had thee in my study half an hour, I think I should make thee sing another song.

Philpot. No, Mr. Doctor, I stand upon too sure a ground to be overthrown by you now. And thus they departed all away from me one after another, until I was left alone. And afterwards going with my keeper to the coal-house, as I went I met with my lord of London, who spoke unto me very gently, saying,

Bonner. Philpot, if there be any pleasure I may shew thee in my house, I pray you require it, and you shall have it.

Philpot. My lord, the pleasure that I will require of your lordship, is to hasten my judgment which is committed unto you, and to dispatch me out of this miserable world unto my eternal rest. And for all this fair speech I cannot attain hitherto this fortnight's space, either fire, candle, or good lodging. But it is good for a man to be brought low in this world, and to be counted amongst the vilest, that he may in time of reward receive exaltation and glory. Therefore praised be God that hath humbled me, and given me grace with gladness to be content therewith. Let all who love the truth say Amen.

Thus ended the fifth tragedy.

The SIXTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, before the Right Honourable Lords, the Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, the Viscount HEREFORD, commonly called Lord FERRAS, the Lord RICH, the Lord St. JOHN, the Lord WINDSOR, the Lord SHANDON, Sir JOHN BRIDGES, Lieutenant of the Tower, and two others whose Names I know not, with the Bishop of LONDON, and Dr. CHEDSEY, Nov. 6, 1555.

WHILE the lords were seating themselves, the bishop of London came aside to me and whispered in my ear, desiring me to behave prudently before the lords of the queen's majesty's council, and to take heed what I said; and thus he pretended to give me counsel, because he wished me to do well, as I might now if I would.

And after the lords and other worshipful gentlemen were sat, my lord of London placed himself at the end of the table, and called me to him, and by the lords I was placed at the upper end against him; where I kneeling down, the lords commanded me to stand up, and the bishop spoke to me in the following manner.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, I have heretofore both privately myself, and openly before the lords of the clergy, more times than once caused you to be conversed with, to reform you of your errors, but I have not yet found you so tractable as I could wish: wherefore now I have desired those honourable lords of the temporality, and of the queen's majesty's council, who have taken pains with me this day, I thank them for it, to hear you, and what you can say, that they may be judges whether I have sought all means to do you good or no: and I dare be bold to say in their behalf, that if you shew yourself conformable to the queen's majesty's proceedings, you shall find as much favour for your deliverance as you can wish. I speak not this to fawn upon you, but to bring you home unto the church. Now let them hear what you have to say.

Philpot. My lord, I thank God that I have this day such an honourable audience to declare my mind before. And I cannot but commend your lordship's equity in this behalf, which agreeth with the order of the primitive church, which was, if any body had been suspected of heresy, as I am now, he should be called first before the archbishop or bishop of the diocese where he was suspected; secondly, in the presence of others his fellow bishops and learned elders; and thirdly, in hearing of the laity: where after the judgment of God's word declared, and with the assent of our bishops and of the people, he was condemned for an heretic, and absolved. And the second point of that good order have found at your lordship's hands already, in being called before you and your fellow bishops; and now have the third sort of men, at whose hands I trust I find more righteousness in my cause, than I have found with my lords of the clergy: God grant that I may have at the last the judgment of God's word concerning the same.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, I pray you ere you go further, tell my lords here plainly, whether you be by me or by my procurement committed to prison or not, and whether I have shewed you any cruelty, for you have been committed to my prison.

Philpot. If it shall please your lordship to give leave to declare forth my matter, I will touch it afterward.

Rich. Answer first of all to my lord's two questions, and then proceed forth to the matter. Do you say you? Were you imprisoned by my lord or no?

Philpot. I cannot lay to my lord's charge the cause of my imprisonment, neither may I say that he has used me cruelly; but rather for my part I may say, that I have found more gentleness at his lordship's hands than I did at my own ordinary's, for the time I have been within his prison, because he hath called me there or four times to mine answer, to which I was called in a year and a half before.

Rich. Well, now go to your matter.

Philpot. The matter is, that I am imprisoned for the disputations held by me in the convocation-house against the sacrament of the altar, which matter was moved principally by me, but by the prolocutor, with the consent of the queen's majesty and of the whole house, and that house, being a member of the parliament-house, which ought to be a place of free speech for all men of the house, by the ancient and laudable custom of this realm. Wherefore I think myself to have sustained hitherto great injury for speaking my conscience freely in such a place as I might lawfully do; and I desire your honourable lordships judgment whether I am of the parliament-house, whether of right I ought to be impeached for the same, and sustain the loss of my living (as I have done), and moreover of my life, as is sought.

Rich. You are deceived herein; for the convocation-house is no part of the parliament-house.

Philpot. My lord, I have always understood the contrary by such as are more expert men in things of this realm than I: and again, the title of every act leadeth me to think otherwise, which alledgeth the agreement of the spirituality and temporality assembled together.

Rich. Yea, that is meant of the spiritual lords of the upper house.

Windsor. Indeed the convocation-house is called together by one writ of the summons of the parliament of an old custom; notwithstanding that house is no part of the parliament-house.

Philpot. My lords, I must be contented to abide your judgments in this behalf.

Rich. We have told you the truth. And yet we would not that you should be troubled for any thing that there was spoken, so that you having spoken amiss, do declare now that you are sorry for what you have said.

Bonner. My lords, he hath spoken there manifestly heresy, yea, and there stoutly maintained the same against the blessed sacrament of the altar (and with that he put off his cap, that all the lords might reverence and vail their bonnets at that idol as he did), and would not allow the real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the same: yet, my lords, God forbid that I should endeavour to shew him extremity for so doing, in case he will repent and revoke his wicked sayings; and if in faith he will so do, with your lordships consent, he shall be released by and by; if he will not, he shall have the extremity of the law, and that shortly.

and Chamberlain. My lord of London speaketh ably unto you: take it while it is offered you.
Rich. How say you? will you acknowledge the presence of the body and blood of Christ, as all men of this realm do, in the mass, and as I do, will believe as long as I live, I do protest it?

Philpot. My lord, I do acknowledge in the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ such a presence as the word of God doth allow and teach me.

Bonner. That shall be no otherwise than you like.

Philpot. A sacrament is the sign of a holy thing; so there is both the sign, which is the accident (as the thickness, roundness, and shape of bread), and there is the thing itself, as very Christ both God and man.
These heretics will have the sacrament to be but bare bread. How say you? declare unto my lords here whether you do allow the thing itself in the sacrament, or no.

Philpot. I do confess that in the Lord's supper there are in due respects both the sign and the thing signified, when it is duly administered after the institution of Christ.

Bonner. You may see how he goeth about the bush (he hath done before) with my lords of the clergy, dare not utter his mind plainly.

Rich. Shew us what manner of presence you allow in the sacrament.

Philpot. If it please you, my lord of London, to leave me leave to proceed orderly thereunto, and to let me declare my mind without interruption, I will thoroughly open my mind therein.

Lord Shandois. I pray you, my lord, let him speak his mind.

Philpot. My lords, that at first I have not plainly declared my judgment unto you, the reason is this, because I cannot speak hereof without the danger of life.

Rich. There is none of us here that seeketh thy life, or means to take any advantage of that thou shalt say.

Philpot. Although I mistrust not your honourable councils that be here of the temporality; yet here is one that sitteth against me (pointing to the lord of London) that will lay it to my charge even to death.
Notwithstanding, seeing your honours do require me to declare my mind of the presence of Christ in the sacrament, that ye may perceive that I am not ashamed of the presence of Christ, neither do maintain any opinion without probable and sufficient authority of the scripture, I will shew you frankly my mind without all colour, whatsoever shall ensue unto me therefore, if my lord of London will not hinder me to utter my mind.

Rich. My lord, permit him to say what he can, seeing he is willing to shew his mind.

Bonner. I am content, my lords, let him say what he can, I will hear him.

Philpot. That which I do intend to speak unto you (right honourable lord) I do protest here, first before God and his angels, that I speak it not of vain-glory, either of singularity, neither of wilful stubbornness, but truly upon a good conscience, grounded upon God's word, against which I dare not go for fear of damnation, which will follow that which is done contrary to knowledge. Neither do I disagree to the proceedings of this realm in the religion, in that I love not the queen (whom I love from the bottom of my heart), nor because I ought to love and fear God in his word more than man in his laws, though I stand, as I seem to do, in this consideration, and for no other, as God will call to witness.

There are two things principally, by which the people at this day deceive the whole realm; that is, the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, and the name of the catholic church: which they do both pervert, having indeed neither of them. And as touching their sacrament, which they term of the altar, I say now as I said in the convocation-house, that it is not the sacrament of Christ, neither in the same is there any manner of Christ's presence. Wherefore they deceive the queen's majesty, and you of the nobility of this realm, in making you to believe that to be a sacrament which is none, and cause you to commit manifest idolatry in worshipping that for God, which is no God.

And in testimony of this to be true, besides manifest proof, which I am able to make to the queen's majesty, and to all you of her nobility, I will yield my life; which to do, if it were not upon sure ground, it were to my utter damnation.

And where they take on them the name of the catholic church (whereby they blind many people's eyes) they are nothing so, calling you from the true religion which was revealed and taught in king Edward's time, unto vain superstition. And this I will say for the trial hereof, that if they can prove themselves to be the catholic church (as they shall never be able to do), I will never be against their doings, but revoke all that I have said.
And I shall desire you, my lords, to be a means for me to the queen's majesty, that I may be brought to the just trial hereof. Yea, I will not refuse to stand against ten of the best of them in this realm. And if they be able to prove otherwise than I have said, either by writing or by reasoning, with good and lawful authority, I will here promise to recant whatsoever I have said, and to consent to them in all points.

And in the declaration of these things more at large, which now I write in sum, the bishop of London would have interrupted me, but the lords procured my liberty to make out my argument, to the great grief of the lord bishop of London, as it appeared by the dumps he was in.

Bonner. It hath been told me before, that you love to make a long tale.

Rich. All heretics do boast of the Spirit of God, and every one would have a church by himself; as Joan of Kent, and the Anabaptists. I had myself Joan of Kent a week in my house after the writ was out for her to be burnt, where my lord of Canterbury, and bishop Ridley, resorted almost daily unto her: but she was so high in the Spirit, that they could do nothing with her for all their learning. But she went wilfully into the fire, was burnt, and so do you now.

Philpot. As for Joan of Kent, she was a vain woman (I knew her well) and an heretic indeed, well worthy to be burnt, because she stood against one of the manifest articles of our faith, contrary to the scriptures: and such vain spirits are soon known from the true Spirit of God, and his church, for that the same abideth within the limits of God's word, and will not go out of the same, neither stubbornly maintain any thing contrary to the word, as I have God's word thoroughly on my side to shew for that I stand in.

Bonner. I pray you, how will you join these two scriptures together; Pater major me est; & pater & ego unum sumus. I must interpret the same, because my lords here understand not the Latin, that is to say,
"The Father is greater than I: and I and the Father are one." But I cry your mercy, my lords, I have misspoken, in saying you understand no Latin; for the most part of you understand Latin as well as I. But I speak in consideration of my lord Shandois, and Mr. Bridges his brother, whom I take to be no great Latin men.
Now shew your cunning, and join these two scriptures by the word if you can.

Philpot. Yes, that I can right well. For we must understand that in Christ there be two natures, the divinity and humanity, and in respect of his humanity, it is spoken of Christ, "The Father is greater than I."
But in respect of his Deity he said again, "The Father and I be one."

Bonner. But what scripture have you?

Philpot. Yes, I have sufficient scripture for the proof of that I have said. For the first, it is written of Christ in the Psalms, "Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels." It is the 19th Psalm, beginning,
"The heavens declare." And there I misreckoned, whereupon my lord took me.

Bonner. It is in "O Lord, our Lord." You may see, my lords, how well this man is used to say his mattins,

Philpot,

Philpot. Though I say not mattins in such order as your lordship meaneth; yet I remember of old, that "O Lord, our Lord," and "The heavens declare," be not far asunder: and although I mis-named the psalm, it is no prejudice to the truth that I have proved.

Bonner. What say you then to the second scripture? how couple you that by the word to the other?

Philpot. The text itself declareth, that notwithstanding Christ did abase himself in our human nature, yet he is still one in Deity with the Father. And this St. Paul to the Hebrews doth more at-large set forth. And as I have by the scriptures joined these two scriptures together, so am I able to do in all other articles of faith which we ought to believe, and by the manifest word of God to expound them.

Bonner. How can that be, seeing St. Paul saith, "That the letter killeth, but it is the Spirit that giveth life?"

Philpot. St. Paul meaneth not the word of God written, in itself killeth, which is the word of life, and faithful testimony of the Lord; but that the word is unprofitable, and killeth him that is void of the Spirit of God, although he be the wisest man of the world, and therefore St. Paul said, "That the gospel to some was a favour of life unto life, and to others a favour of death unto death." Also an example hereof we have in the sixth of John, of them who hearing the word of God without the Spirit, were offended thereby; wherefore Christ said, "The flesh profiteth nothing, it is the Spirit that quickeneth."

Bonner. What? do you understand that of St. Paul and of St. John so?

Philpot. It is not mine own interpretation, it is agreeable to the word in other places; and I have learned the same of ancient fathers interpreting it likewise. And to the Corinthians it is written, "The natural man perceiveth not the things that be of the Spirit of God, but the spiritual man, who is endued with the Spirit, judgeth all things."

Bonner. You see, my lords, that this man will have his own mind, and wilfully cast himself away. I am sorry for him.

Philpot. The words that I have spoken are none of mine but the gospel, whercon I ought to stand. And if you, my lord of London, can bring better authority for the faith you will draw me unto, than that which I stand upon, I will gladly hear the same by you or by any other in this realm.

Wherefore I, kneeling down, besought the lords to be good unto me a poor gentleman, that would fain live in the world if I might, and testify as you have heard me to say this day, that if any man can prove that I ought to be of any other manner of faith than that which I am now, and can prove the same sufficiently, I will be neither wilful nor desperate, as my lord of London would make you believe me to be.

Rich. What countryman are you? Are you of the Philpots of Hampshire?

Philpot. Yea, my lord, I am sir P. Philpot's son, of Hampshire.

Rich. He is my near kinsman; wherefore I am the more sorry for him.

Philpot. I thank your lordship that it pleaseth you to challenge kindred of a poor prisoner.

Rich. In faith I would go an hundred miles on my bare feet to do you good.

Lord Chamberlain. He may do well enough if he will.

St. John. Mr. Philpot, you are my countryman, and I would be glad you should do well.

Rich. You said even now, that you would desire to maintain your belief before ten of the best in the realm. You did not well to compare with the nobility of the realm. But what if you have ten of the best in the realm to hear you, will you be tried by them?

Philpot. My lord, your lordship mistaketh me to think that I challenge ten of the best of the realm. It was no part of my mind; but the best learned on the contrary side.

Rich. Well, I take your meaning: what be made to the queen's majesty that you shall request, will you be judged by them?

Philpot. My lord, it is not meet that I be judged by his adversaries.

Rich. By whom then would you be judged?

Philpot. I will make your honours judges shall be hearers of us.

Rich. I dare be bold to procure for queen's majesty that you shall have ten learned reason with you, and twenty or forty of the to hear, so you will promise to abide their. How say you, will you promise here before so to do?

Philpot. I will be contented to be judged.

Rich. Yea, but will you promise to agree judgment?

Philpot. There are causes why I may not unless I were sure they would judge according word of God.

Rich. O, I perceive you will have no but yourself, and think yourself wiser than all ed men in this realm.

Philpot. My lord, I seek not to be mine of but am willing to be judged by others, so that of judgment in matters of religion be kept the the primitive church, which is, first that God his word was sought, and thereunto both the spiritual and temporality were gathered together, and consents and judgment, and such kind of judgment will stand to.

Bonner. My lords, he would make you believe he were profoundly known in ancient writings judgments of the primitive church, and never any such manner of judgment used as talketh of.

Philpot. In the epistles of St. Cyprian I have shew it you.

Bonner. Ah, I tell you there is no such thing as me Cyprian hither.

Philpot. You shall find it otherwise when cometh. And Dr. Chedsey, his chaplain, appointed to fetch his book) whispered the in his ear, and brought not the book, in likelihood he should have sustained the reproach there book had been brought. Well, my lord, said Doctor knoweth it is so, or else he would have the book ere this.

Rich. You would have no other judge, I the word.

Philpot. Yes, my lord, I will be tried by you and by such as will judge according to the word for an example, if there were a controversy, your lordship and another upon the words of must not the words of the statute judge and of the controversy?

Rich. No marry, the judges of the law may mine of the meaning thereof.

Bonner. He hath brought as good an example himself as can be.

And here the bishop thought he had a good ment against me, and therefore enlarged it with words to the judgment of the church.

The Lords. He hath overthrown himself by argument.

Philpot. My lords, it seemeth to your honours you have great advantage of me by the example brought in to express my cause, but if it be thoroughly, it maketh wholly with me, and against me, as my lord of London hath pretended. I will ask of my lord Rich here, whom I know good knowledge in the laws and statutes of the although a judge may discern the meaning of agreeable to the words, whether the same may meaning contrary to the express words or no?

He cannot so do.

Even so say I, that no man ought to judge of God to have a meaning contrary to the words thereof, as this false church of Rome in many things: and with this the lords seemed to do, and made no further reply herein.

I marvel then why you do deny the express Christ in the sacrament, saying, "This is my body, yet you will not stick to say it is not his body, not God omnipotent? And is not he able as God omnipotency to make it his body, as he was made of a piece of clay? Did not he say, my body which shall be betrayed for you? Not his very body betrayed for us? Therefore his body shall be his body."

My lord Rich, you have said wonderful things earnestly. But you might have begun with him, in the sixth of John, where Christ promised his body in the sacrament of the altar, saying, "And which I will give is my flesh." How can you say to that?

If it please you to give me leave to answer my lord Rich, I will also answer this.

Answer my lord of London first, and after me.

My lord of London may be soon answered: the teaching of St. John is, that the humanity of Christ, took upon him for the redemption of man, the seed of life whereby our souls and bodies are brought to eternal life, of which the sacramental bread is representation, and an effectual coaptation to us to believe on his passion. And as Christ saith in the sixth of John, "I am the bread that came down from heaven;" but yet he is not material, neither carnal: likewise the bread is his flesh, not natural, but by signification, and by grace in the sacrament.

Now to my lord Rich's argument. I do not deny the words of Christ in the sacrament, "This is my body;" but I deny that they are naturally and corporally taken: they must be taken sacramentally, actually, according to the express declaration of Christ saying, that the words of the sacrament which carnalists took carnally, as the Papists now do, shall be taken spiritually and not carnally, as they imagine, not weighing what interpretation Christ made in this behalf, neither following the institution of Christ, neither the use of the apostles and of the church, who never taught, neither declared a carnal manner of presence as is now exacted of us, but only without any ground of scripture or authority: who used to put out of the church all such as did receive the sacrament with the rest, and also to burn such as were left after the receiving, as by the canon of the apostles, and by the decree of the council of Ananias may appear.

No, that is not so; they were only Catechumens, which went out of the church at the celebration of communion, and none other.

It was not only of such as were novices in the church, but of all others that did not receive.

What say you to the omnipotency of God? Is not he able to perform that which he spake, as my lord Rich hath very well said? I tell thee, that God omnipotency may make himself to be this carpet.

As concerning the omnipotency of God, I say that God is able to do (as the prophet David saith) ever he willeth; but he willeth nothing that is contrary to his word; that is blasphemy which my lord of London hath spoken, that God may become a creature. For, as I have learned of ancient writers, God is not that which is contrary to his nature, and it is not to the nature of God to be a creature. A creature is that which is created by God; and God is the creator; and the creator cannot be the creature: wherefore unless you can declare by scripture, that Christ is otherwise present with us actually and sacramentally by grace, as he hath said, you pretend the omnipotency of God in vain.

Bonner. Why, wilt thou not say that Christ is really present in the sacrament? Or do you deny it?

Philpot. I deny not that Christ is really present in the sacrament to the receiver thereof according to Christ's institution.

Bonner. What mean you by really present?

Philpot. I mean by really present, present indeed.

Bonner. Is God really present every where?

Philpot. He is so.

Bonner. How prove you that?

Philpot. The prophet Isaiah saith, "That God filleth all places:" and wheresoever there be two or three gathered together in Christ's name, there is he in the midst of them.

Bonner. What, his humanity?

Philpot. No, my lord, I mean the Deity, according to that you demanded.

Rich. My lord of London, I pray you let Dr. Chedsey reason with him, and let us see how he can answer him, for I tell thee he is a learned man indeed, and one that I do credit before a great many of you, whose doctrine the queen's majesty and the whole realm doth well allow, therefore hear him.

Bonner. My lords, I pray you, will it please you to drink? You have talked a great while, and much talk is thirsty. I will leave Mr. Doctor and him reasoning together a-while, with your leave, and will come to you by and by again. He went, as I suppose, to make room for more drink, after the lords had drank.

My lord Rich said to the lords, I pray you let the poor man drink, for he is thirsty, and with that he called for a cup of drink, and gave it me, and I drank before them all: God requite him, for I was thirsty indeed. Afterwards Dr. Chedsey began in this wise, making a great process, of which this is the effect.

Chedsey. Mr. Philpot findeth fault with the convocation-house before your lordships, that he hath lain thus long in prison, and that he had there a dozen arguments, whereof he would not be suffered to prosecute one thoroughly, which is not so; for he had leave to say what he could, and was answered to as much as he was able to bring: and when he had nothing else to say, he fell to weeping. I was there present and can testify thereof; although there is a book abroad of the report of the disputation to the contrary, in which there is never a true word. And whereas you require to be satisfied of the sacrament, I will shew you the truth thereof, both by the scriptures, and by the doctors.

Philpot. It is a shrewd likelihood that you will not conclude with any truth, since you have begun with so many untruths, as to say that I was answered while I had any thing to say; and that I wept for lack of matter to say, and that the book of the report of the disputation is not true. God be praised, there were a good many noblemen, gentlemen, and worshipful men that heard and saw the doings thereof, which can testify that you here have made an unjust report before these honourable lords. And that I wept, was not for lack of matter, as you slander me; for I thank God I have more matter than the best of you all shall ever be able to answer, as little learning as I have: but my weeping was, as Christ was upon Jerusalem, seeing the destruction that should fall upon her: and I foreseeing then the destruction which you (through violence and unrighteousness which you there declared) would work against the true church of Christ and her faithful members, as this day beareth witness, was compelled to weep in remembrance of that which I with many more have felt and shall feel.

All these words I did then speak out, being interrupted by my lord Rich, saying, that I should suffer him to proceed out in this matter, and afterwards I should have leisure to answer him in every article. But he promised more than he could perform, as the end did well declare; for he had not the consent of the spirituality to his promise, which now rule the roast. God shorten their cruel days, for his elect's sake. And therefore I add this, which I purposed to have spoken, if then I might have been suffered, lest any that perfectly know not the things done in the convocation-house and now laid to my charge, if they should not be answered by me, might reckon reckon Dr. Chedsey's saying to be true. And as concerning the book of the report of the disputations, I wrote the same, and it is true in every argument, as Mr. Dean, of Rochester, and Mr. Cheney, archdeacon of Hereford, (being yet alive, and within the realm) can testify.

Chedsey. You have of scriptures the four evangelists for the probation of Christ's real presence to be in the sacrament after the words of consecration, with St. Paul to the Corinthians; which all say, "This is my body." They say not, as you would have me believe, this is not the body. But especially the 6th of John proveth this most manifestly, where Christ promised to give his body, which he performed in his last supper, as it appeareth by these words, "The bread which I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world."

Philpot. My lord Rich, with your leave I must needs interrupt him a little, because he speaketh open blasphemy against the death of Christ: for if that promise, brought in by St. John, was performed by Christ in his last supper, then he needed not to have died after he had given the sacrament.

Rich. Let Mr. Doctor make an end of his arguments, and afterward object to him what you can.

Chedsey. You must note, that there is twice Dabo in this saying of St. John, and the first is referred to the sacrament of the altar; and the second to the sacrifice upon the cross: and besides these manifest scriptures, there are many ancient doctors proving the same, as Ignatius, Ireneus, St. Cyprian (whose authority he recited at large) which I do omit, because I was not permitted to answer the same.

Rich. Now answer, and object to him what you can, and you shall be heard.

Philpot. My lord, the chief ground whereon he with the rest of his side do ground themselves against us, are these words, "This is my body," with a false pretence of the omnipotency of God. And before I will come to the particular answers of all that he hath alledged, for that your lordships may the better understand me, what I mean, and whereupon I stand, I will first require Mr. Doctor to answer me one question. But first of all I do protest to your honours that I think as reverently of the sacrament, as a christian man ought to do, and that I acknowledge the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, ministered after Christ's institution, to be one of the greatest treasures and comforts that he left us on the earth: contrary-wise, it is most sinful and abominable, not being ministered as it ought to be, as it is used now-a-days.

And now to my question, which is this: whether these words only, "This is my body," spoken by a priest over the bread and wine, may make the body and blood of Christ, as you suppose, or no?

Chedsey studying what he might say, at last answered, That these words alone, pronounced by the priest, are sufficient to make the bread and the wine the very body and blood of Christ really.

Philpot. That is blasphemy to say, and against all the scriptures and doctors, who affirm that the form and substance in consecration must be observed which Christ used and did institute, as St. Cyprian saith, "In the sacrifice which is Christ, only Christ is to be followed." And by the law it is forbidden to add or to take away from God's word. And St. Peter saith, "If any man speak, let him speak as the word of God." Wherefore whosoever saith that these words only, "This is my body," do make a presence of Christ, without "Bless, Take, and Eat," which be three as substantial points of the sacrament, as, "This is my body," he is highly deceived.

Therefore St. Augustine saith, "Let the word be joined to the element, and it cometh a sacrament." So that if the intire words of Christ's institutions be not observed in the ministration of a sacrament, it is no sacrament; as the sacrifices which the ten tribes did offer at Bethel to God, were not acceptable, because they were not in all points done according to God's word. Wherefore except blessing be made after the word, (which is a due thanksgiving for our redemption in Christ) and also a shewing forth of the Lord's death in such wise as the congregation may beedified; and moreover a taking and eating after Christ's commandment; except (I say) these three parts be first performed, (which is not done in the mass) these words, "This is my body," which are last placed in the institution of the Lord's supper, cannot be verified. For Christ commanded as well, "Take ye, Eat ye," as "This is my body."

Chedsey. Christ said, "Take, Eat, this is my body," and not Take ye, Eat ye.

Philpot. Did he not, Mr. Doctor? be not these the words of Christ, Accipite, Manducate? and do not these words in the plural number signify, "Take ye, Eat ye," and not Take thou, Eat thou, as you would suppose?

Chedsey. I grant it is as you say.

Philpot. Likewise of consequence, you (Mr. Doctor) must needs deny what you have said, that these words, "This is my body," being only spoken, be sufficient to make the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament, as you have untruly said.

Then the bishop came in again and said, What is it that you would have Mr. Doctor deny?

Philpot. My lord, Mr. Doctor hath affirmed that these words, "This is my body," spoken by the priest only, do make the sacrament.

Bonner. Indeed if Mr. Bridges should speak these words over the bread and wine, they would be of some effect: but if a priest speak them after a due manner, they are effectual, and make a real body.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor hath said otherwise.

Bonner. I think you mistake him; for he meant of the words duly pronounced.

Philpot. Let him revoke that he hath granted, and then will I begin again with that which before was said; that, "This is my body," hath no place, except Bless, Take, and Eat, duly go before. And therefore because the same words do not go before, "This is my body," but preposterously follow in your sacrament of the mass, it is not the sacrament of Christ, neither hath Christ in it presence.

Chedsey. If "This is my body" only do not make the sacrament, no more do "Bless, take, and eat."

Philpot. I grant that the one without the other cannot make the sacrament. And it can be no sacrament unless the whole action of Christ doth concur together according to the first institution.

Chedsey. Why, then you would not have it to be the body of Christ, unless it be received?

Philpot. No verily, it is not the very body of Christ to any other, but such as condignly receive the same after his institution.

Bonner. Is not a loaf a loaf, being set on the table, though no body eat thereof?

Philpot. It is not alike, my lord; for a loaf is a loaf before it be set on the table; but so is not the sacrament a perfect sacrament before it be duly administered at the table of the Lord.

Bonner. I pray you what is it in the mean while before it is duly received?

Philpot. It is, my lord, a sign begun of a holy thing, and yet no perfect sacrament until it be received. For in the sacrament there be two things to be considered, the sign, and the thing itself, which is Christ and his whole passion; and it is that to none but such as worthily receive the holy signs of bread and wine, according to Christ's institution.

Windsor. There were never any that denied the words of Christ as you do. Did he not say, "This is my body?"

Philpot. My lord, I pray you be not deceived. We do not deny the words of Christ: but we say, these words be of none effect, being spoken otherwise than Christ did institute them in his last supper. For example; Christ biddeth the church to baptize in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. If a priest say these words over the water, and there be no child to be baptized, these words only pronounced do not make baptism. And again, baptism is only baptism to such as be baptized, and to none other standing by.

Chamberlain. I pray you, my lord, let me ask one question. What kind of presence in the sacrament (duly administered according to Christ's ordinance) do you allow?

Philpot. If any come worthily to receive, then do I see the presence of Christ wholly to be with all the effects of his passion, unto the said worthy receiver, by the spirit of God, and that Christ is thereby joined to him and he to Christ.

Chamberlain. I am answered.

Bonner. My lords, take no heed of him, for he goeth about to deceive you. His similitude that he bringeth about baptism, is nothing like to the sacrament of the Lord's supper. For if I should say to sir John Bridges being with me at supper, and having a fat capon, Take, eat, this is a capon, although he eat not thereof, is it not a capon still? And likewise of a piece of beef, or of a cup of wine, if I say, Drink, this is a cup of wine, is it so, because he drinketh not thereof?

Philpot. My lord, your similitudes are too gross and high mysteries as we have in hand, as, if I were your lord, I could more plainly declare; and there is much difference between common meats and drinks, and there is between baptism and the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ. Like must be compared to like, and spiritual things with spiritual, and not spiritual things with corporal things. And meats and drinks be of their own natures good or evil, and your lordships commending or discommending, do but declare what they are. But the sacraments are to be considered according to the word which Christ spake of them, of which, "Take ye, and eat ye," be some of the chief, current to the making of the same, without which there can be no sacraments. And therefore the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ is called Communion: and likewise in the gospel Christ commanded, saying, "Divide it among you."

Chancellor. St. Paul calleth it a Communication.

Philpot. That doth more expressly shew that there is but a participation of the sacrament together.

Bonner. My lords, I am sorry I have troubled you long with this obstinate man, with whom we can do no good; I will trouble you no longer now. And with that the lords rose up, none of them saying any evil word unto me.

Thus ended the sixth examination.

SEVENTH EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, on the 19th of November, before the BISHOPS of LONDON and ROCHESTER, the CHANCELLOR of LITCHFIELD and Dr. CHEDSEY.

BONNER. Sirrah, come hither. How chance you came no sooner? Is it well done of you to make the Chancellor and me to tarry for you this hour? By the faith of my body, half an hour before mass, and half an hour even at mass, looking for your coming.

Philpot. My lord, it is well known to you that I am a prisoner, and that the doors be shut upon me, and cannot come when I please; but as soon as the doors of my prison were open, I came immediately.

Bonner. We sent for thee to the intent thou shouldst have come to mass. How say you, would you have come to mass or no, if the doors had been sooner opened?

Philpot. My lord, that is another manner of question.

Bonner. Lo, Mr. Chancellor, I told you we should have a froward fellow of him; he will answer directly to nothing. I have had him before the spiritual lords and temporal, thus he fareth still; yet he reckoneth himself better learned than all the realm. Yea, before the temporal lords the other day, he was so foolish as to challenge the best: he would make himself learned, and is a very ignorant fool indeed.

Philpot. I reckon I answered your lordship before the lords plain enough.

Bonner. Why answerest thou not directly, whether thou wouldst have gone to mass or no, if thou hadst come in time?

Philpot. Mine answer shall be thus, that if your lordship can prove your mass, whereunto you would have me to come, to be the true service of God, whereunto a christian ought to come, I will afterwards come with a good will.

Bonner. Look, I pray you; the king and queen, and all the nobility of the realm do come to mass, and yet he will not. By my faith, thou art too well handled; thou shalt be worse handled hereafter, I warrant thee.

Philpot. If to lie in a blind coal-house, may be counted good handling, without either fire or candle, then may it be said, I am well handled. Your lordship hath power to treat my body as you please.

Bonner. Thou art a fool, and a very ignorant fool. Mr. Chancellor, in good faith I have handled him and his fellows with as much gentleness as they can desire. I did let their friends come unto them to relieve them. And wot you what? the other day they had gotten themselves up into the top of the leads, with a number of apprentices gazing abroad as though they had been at liberty; but I cut off your resort: and as for the apprentices they were as good not to come to you, if I take them.

Philpot. My lord, we have no such resort to us as your lordship imagineth, and there come very few unto us. And of apprentices, I know not one, neither have we any leads to walk on over our coal-house, that I know of: wherefore your lordship hath mistaken your mark.

Bonner. Nay, now you think (because my lord chancellor is gone) that we will burn no more: yes, I warrant thee, I will dispatch you shortly, unless you do recant.

Philpot. My lord, I had not thought that I should have been alive now, neither so raw as I am, but even well roasted to ashes.

Chancellor. Cast not yourself wilfully away, Mr. Philpot. Be content to be ruled by my lord here, and by other learned men of this realm, and you may do well enough.

Philpot. My conscience beareth me record that I seek to please God, and that the love and fear of God causeth me to do as I do: and I were of all other creatures most miserable, if for mine own will only I do lose all the conveniencies I might have in this life, and afterwards be cast into damnation. But I am sure it is not my will whereon I stand, but God's will, who will not suffer me to be cast away, I am sure.

Chancellor. You are not so sure, but you may be deceived.

Bonner. Well, since thou wilt not be conformable by fair means, I will proceed against thee Ex Officio, and therefore hearken here to such articles as I have here written, and I charge thee to make answer to them. And with that he read a libel which he had in his hand of divers articles, and when he had done he bade me answer.

Philpot. Your libel, my lord, containeth in sum two special points: The first pretendeth, that I should be of your diocese, and therefore your lordship upon divers suspicions and infamies of heresy going upon me, is moved to proceed against me by your ordinary office; which first is not true, for that I am not of your lordship's diocese, as the libel doth pretend. And the second is, that I being baptized in the catholic church, and in the catholic faith, am gone from them, which is not so, for I am of that catholic faith and church which I was baptized into.

Bonner. What? art thou not of my diocese? where are you now, I pray you?

Philpot. I cannot deny but I am in your coal-house, which is your diocese: yet I am not of your diocese.

Bonner. You were sent hither unto me by the queen's majesty's commissioners, and thou art now in my diocese: wherefore I will proceed against thee as thy ordinary.

Philpot. I was brought hither through violence, and therefore my present being now in your diocese is not enough to abridge me of mine own ordinary's jurisdiction.

jurisdiction, neither make it me willingly subject to your jurisdiction, since it cometh by force, and by such men as had no just authority so to do; no more than a sanctuary man, being by force brought forth of his place of privilege, doth thereby lose his privilege, but always may challenge the same wheresoever he be brought.

Chedsey. Hath not the queen's majesty authority, by her commissioners, to remove your body whither she will? and ought you not to obey herein?

Philpot. I grant that the queen's majesty (of her just power) may transpose my body, whither it shall please her grace to command the same. But yet by your laws, spiritual causes are not subject to the temporal power. As for example: you, Mr. Doctor, if the queen's majesty would appoint two temporal men to be judges over you in certain spiritual matters, might not you alledge the privilege of a clerk, and demand competent spiritual judges in your cause?

Bonner. Doth not a judge (I pray you) appoint a court at his own discretion?

Philpot. My lord, your rule is true in temporal matters, but in spiritual causes it is not so: which be otherwise privileged.

Bonner. What sayest thou then to the second article, and to the other?

Philpot. My lord, I say that I am not bound to answer the second, neither the rest, unless the first be proved.

Bonner. Well, suppose the first may be proved, as it will be, what will you say then to the second, that you are not of the same catholic faith, neither of the same church now as you were baptized in?

Philpot. I am of the same catholic faith, and of the same catholic church, which is of Christ, the pillar and establishment of truth.

Bonner. Nay, that you are not.

Philpot. Yes, that I am.

Bonner. Your godfathers and godmothers were of another faith than you are now.

Philpot. I was not baptized either into my godfathers faith or my godmothers, but into the faith and into the church of Christ.

Bonner. How know you that?

Philpot. By the word of God, which is the touchstone of faith, and the limitor the church.

Bonner. How long hath your church stood, I pray you?

Philpot. Even from the beginning, from Christ and from his apostles, and from their immediate successors.

Chancellor. He will prove his church to be before Christ.

Philpot. If I did so, I go not amiss: for there was a church before the coming of Christ, which maketh one catholic church.

Chancellor. It is so indeed.

Philpot. I will desire no better rule than the same which is oftentimes brought in of your side, to prove both my faith and the catholic church; that is, antiquity, universality, and unity.

Bonner. Do you not see what a bragging foolish fellow this is? He would seem to be very well versed in the doctors, and he is but a fool. By what doctor art thou able to prove thy church? Name him, and thou shalt have him.

Philpot. My lord, let me have all your ancient writers, with pen, and ink, and paper, and I will prove both my faith and my church out of every one of them.

Bonner. No, that thou shalt not have. You shall see how he lieth. St. Cyprian saith, "There must be one high-priest, to which the residue must obey;" and they will allow no head, neither vicar general.

Philpot. St. Cyprian saith not, that there should be a vicar general over all. For in his book De simplicitate Prælatorum, I am sure he saith the contrary: "There is but one bishopric, which is wholly possessed of every bishop in part."

Bonner. Fetch hither the book, thou shalt see the manifest place against thee.

Dr. Chedsey brought the book, and turned to the place in an epistle written unto Cornelius then bishop of Rome, and recited these words in sum, "That it went not well with the church, where the high-priest was not obeyed;" and so would have concluded for the confirmation of the bishop's saying.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, you mis-construe the place of St. Cyprian; for he meaneth not there by the high-priest, the bishop of Rome, but every patriarch in his precinct, of whom there were four appointed in his time. And in writing unto Cornelius, he meaneth by the high-priest, himself, who was then bishop of Africa, whose authority the heretics began to despise. Where he complaineth to Cornelius, and saith, the church cannot be well ordered, where the chief minister is not in order after the judgment of the scriptures, after the agreement of the people, and the consent of his fellow bishops, is not obeyed.

Bonner. Hath not the bishop of Rome always been supreme head of the church, and Christ's vicar on earth even from Peter?

Philpot. No, that he was not. For by the word of God he hath no more authority, than the bishop of London hath.

Bonner. Was not Peter head of the church, and had not the bishop of Rome, who is his successor, the same authority?

Philpot. I grant that the bishop of Rome, as he is the successor of Peter, hath the same authority as Peter had: but Peter had no more authority than every one of the apostles had.

Chancellor. Yes, that St. Peter had; for Christ said specially unto him, "I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven;" which he spake to none other of his disciples singularly, but to him.

Philpot. St. Augustine answereth otherwise to the objection, and saith, "That if in Peter there had not been the figure of the church, the Lord had not said to him, To thee will I give the keys of the kingdom of heaven. Which if Peter received not, the church had them not; if the church hath them, then Peter hath them not."

Bonner. What if I can prove and shew you out of the civil law, that all christendom ought to follow the holy catholic church of Rome, as there is a special title thereof, De catholica fide & sancta Romana ecclesia?

Philpot. That is nothing material, seeing the things of God be not subject to man's laws; and the divine matters must be ordered by the word of God, and not of man.

A Doctor. What will you say, if I can prove that Christ built his church upon Peter, and that out of St. Cyprian? will you then believe that the bishop of Rome ought to be supreme head of the church?

Philpot. I know what St. Cyprian writeth in that behalf; but he meaneth nothing as you take it.

A Doctor. St. Cyprian hath these words, That upon Peter was built the church, as upon the first beginning of unity.

Philpot. He declareth that in an example, that unity must be in the church; he grounded on Peter his church alone, and not upon men. Which he doth more manifestly declare in the book De simplicitate Prælatorum, saying, in the person of one man God gave the keys to all, that he in signification thereby might declare the unity of all men.

A Doctor. What, will you understand St. Cyprian so? That were good indeed.

Philpot. I think you cannot understand St. Cyprian better, than he doth declare himself.

Bonner. I will desire you (Mr. Chancellor) to take some pains with Dr. Chedsey, about his examination, for I must go to the parliament house. And I desire you will dine with me.

Philpot. Then the doctor again took his former authority in hand for want of another, and would have made a further circumstance, digressing from his purpose. To whom I said, he knew not whereabouts he went, and therewith he laughed. And I said his divinity was nothing but scoffing.

A Doctor. Yea, then I have done with you, and so away.

Philpot. You are too young in divinity to teach me the matters of my faith. Though you may be more learned in other things than I, yet in divinity I have been longer practised than you, for any thing I can hear of you; therefore be not too hasty to judge what I do not perfectly know.

Chancellor. Peter and his successors from the beginning have been allowed for the supreme head of the church, and that by the scriptures, for Christ said unto him in St. John thrice, "Feed my sheep."

Philpot. That is no otherwise to be taken, than,
 "Go ye and preach," which was spoken to all the apostles as well as unto Peter. And that Christ said twice, "Feed my sheep," it signifieth nothing else but the earnest study that the ministers of God ought to have in preaching the word. God grant that you the clergy would weigh your duty in this behalf more than you do. Is this a just interpretation of the scripture, to take "Feed my sheep," for to be lord of the whole world?

In the mean while a bachelor of divinity came in, which is a reader of Greek in Oxford, belonging to the bishop, and he took upon him to help Mr.
 Chancellor.

Scholar. What will you say if I can shew you a Greek author called Theophylact, to interpret it so?
 Will you believe his interpretation?

Philpot. Theophylact is a late writer, and one that is a favourer of the bishop of Rome, and therefore not to be credited, since his interpretation is contrary to the determination of many general councils.

Scholar. In what general council was it otherwise, that the bishop of Rome was not supreme head of all?

Philpot. In the council of Nice I am sure it was otherwise; for Athanasius was there the chief bishop and president of the council, and not the bishop of Rome.

Scholar. Nay, that is not so.

Philpot. Then I perceive you are better seen in words than in knowledge of things: and I will lay with you what you will it is so, as you may see in the epitome of the councils.

Scholar. I will fetch Eusebius and shew the contrary, and the book of General Councils. He went into my lord's closet, and brought Eusebius, but the General Councils he brought not, saying (for saving of his honesty) that he could not come by them, and where he would have defended that it was otherwise in Eusebius, but he was not able to shew the same, and so shrunk away confounded.

Chancellor. The church of Rome hath been always taken for the catholic church: therefore I would advise you to come into the same with us. You see all the men of this realm do condemn you. And why will you be so singular?

Philpot. I have said, and still do say, that if you can be able to prove it unto me, that I will be of the same. But I am sure that the church, which you make so much of, is a false church, and a synagogue of Satan. And you with the learned men of the realm do persecute the true church, and condemn such as are more righteous than you.

Chancellor. Do you hear, Mr. Doctor, what he saith, that the church of Rome is the devil.

Chedsey. I wish you did think more reverently of the church of Rome. What will you say if I can shew you out of St. Austin, in his epistle written unto pope Innocent, that the whole general council of Carthage did allow the church of Rome to be the chief over all others?

Philpot. I am sure you can shew no such thing.
 And with that he fetched me the book of St. Austin, and turned to the epistle, but he could not prove his allegation manifestly, but by conjectures in this wise.

Chedsey. Here you may see, that the council of Carthage writing to Innocent, the bishop calleth the see of Rome the apostolic see. And besides this, they

No. 34.

write to him, certifying him of things done in the council for the condemnation of the Donatists, requiring his approbation in the same; which they would not have done if they had not taken the church of Rome for the supreme head of others. And moreover you may see how St. Austin doth prove the church of Rome to be the catholic church, by continual succession of the bishops until his time, which succession we can prove until our days: therefore by the same reason of St. Austin we say now, that the church of Rome is the catholic church.

Philpot. Mr. Doctor, I have considered how you do weigh St. Austin; and contrary to his meaning and words, you would infer your false conclusion. As concerning that it was called by him the apostolical see, that is not material to prove the church of Rome now to be the catholic church. I will grant indeed that it is the apostolic see, in respect that Paul and Peter did there once preach the gospel, and abode there for a certain season. I wish you could prove it to be the apostolical see of the true religion and sincerity as the apostle left it, and did teach the same; which if you could do, you might boast of Rome as of the apostolical see; otherwise it is now of no more force, than if the Turks at Antioch and at Jerusalem should boast of the apostolic sees, because the apostles did there once abide, and founded the church of Christ.

And whereas the whole council of Carthage did write unto pope Innocent, certifying him of what was done in the general council, and willing him to set his helping hand to the suppressing of the Donatists, as they had done; that fact of the council doth not prove the supremacy of the bishop of Rome, no more than if the whole convocation-house now gathered together, and agreeing upon certain articles, might send the same to some bishop that upon certain impediments is not present, desiring him to agree thereto, and to set them forth in his diocese. Which fact doth not make any such bishop of greater authority than the rest, because his consent is brotherly required.

And touching the succession of the bishops of Rome, brought in by St. Augustine, it maketh nothing now thereby to prove the same catholic church, unless you can conclude with the same reason as St. Augustine doth. And the rehearsal of the succession of the bishops doth tend to this only, to prove the Donatists to be heretics, because they began, as well at Rome as in Africa, to found another church of their own setting up, than was grounded by Peter and Paul, and by their successors, whom he reciteth until his time, which all taught no such doctrine, neither such church as the Donatists. And if presently you be able to prove by the bishops of Rome (whereof you do glory) that such doctrine hath not been taught by any of the successors of Peter's see, as is now taught and believed by us, you have good reason against us: otherwise it is of no force, as I am able to declare.

Chancellor. Well, Mr. Doctor, you see we can do no good in persuading of him: let us administer the articles which my lord hath left us, unto him. How say you, Mr. Philpot, to these articles? Mr. Johnson, I pray you write his answers.

Philpot. Mr. Chancellor, you have no authority to inquire of me my belief in such articles as you go about, for I am not of my lord of London's diocese; and to be brief with you, I will make no further answer herein than I have already to the bishop.

Chancellor. Why then let us go our ways, and let his keeper take him away.

Thus ended the seventh part of his tragedy.

A private CONFERENCE between Mr. PHILPOT and BISHOP BONNER.

EARLY the next morning the bishop sent one of his men to me, to call me up into his chapel to hear mass.

Bishop's man. Mr. Philpot, where are you?

Philpot. Who is that that calleth me?

Bishop's man. My lord's will is, you should rise and come to hear mass: will you come or no?

5 E

Philpot,

Philpot. My stomach is not very good this morning: you may tell my lord I am sick. After this, the keeper was sent to bring me to my lord.

Keeper. Mr. Philpot, you must rise and come to my lord.

Philpot. I am at your command, Mr. Keeper, as soon as I can: and going out of the prison, he asked me, saying:

Keeper. Will you go to mass?

Philpot. My stomach is too raw to digest such raw meats of flesh, blood, and bone, this morning.

After this, my keeper presented me to the bishop in his hall.

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, I charge you to answer unto such articles as my chaplain and my register have from me to object against you; go and answer them.

Philpot. My lord, all judgments ought to be public. Therefore if your lordship has any thing to charge me lawfully with, let me be in judgment lawfully and openly called, and I will answer according to my duty; otherwise in corners I will not.

Bonner. Thou art a foolish knave I see well enough, thou shalt answer whether thou wilt or no; go thy ways with them, I say.

Philpot. I will go with them at your lordship's pleasure; but I will make them no further answers than I have said already.

Bonner. No, wilt thou not, knave? Have him away, and set him in the stocks: what, foolish knave?

Philpot. Indeed, my lord, you handle me, with others, like fools: and we must be content to be made fools at your hands, stocks and violence are your bishop-like alms. You go about by force in corners to oppress, and are ashamed that your doings should come to light: God shorten your cruel kingdom for his mercy's sake. And presently after I was put into the stocks, in a house alone, separate from my fellows: God be praised that he hath thought me worthy to suffer any thing for his name's sake. Better it is to sit in the stocks of this world, than sit in the stocks of a damnable conscience.

Another CONFERENCE between the BISHOP and Mr. PHILPOT, and other PRISONERS.

PHILPOT. The day after, an hour before day, the bishop sent for me again by the keeper.

Keeper. Mr. Philpot, arise, you must come to my lord.

Philpot. I wonder what my lord meaneth, that he sendeth for me thus early, I fear he will use some violence towards me, wherefore I pray you make him this answer, That if he did send for me by an order of law, I will come and answer; otherwise since I am not of his diocese, neither is he mine ordinary, I will not (without I be violently constrained) come unto him.

Keeper. I will go and tell my lord what answer you make: and so he went away to the bishop, and immediately returned with two of the bishop's men, saying, that I must come whether I would or no.

Philpot. If by violence any of you will enforce me to go, then I must go, otherwise I will not; and there-with one of them took me by force by the arm, and led me up into the bishop's gallery.

Bonner. What, thou art a foolish knave indeed; thou wilt not come without thou be fetched.

Philpot. I am brought indeed (my lord) by violence unto you, and your cruelty is such, that I am afraid to come before you; I would your lordship would gently proceed against me by the law.

Bonner. I am blamed by the lords the bishops, that I have not dispatched thee ere this. And in faith, I made suit to my lord cardinal, and all the convocation-house, that they would hear thee. And my lord of Lincoln stood up, and said thou wert a frantic fellow, and a man that will always have the last word. And they all have much blamed me, because I have brought thee so often before the lords openly: and they say, it is meat and drink to you to speak in an open audience, you glory so in yourself. Wherefore I am commanded to take a further order with thee, and in good faith if thou wilt not relent, I will make no further delay. If thou wilt yet be conformable, I will forgive thee that is past, and thou shalt have no hurt for any thing that is already spoken or done.

Philpot. My lord, I have answered you already in this behalf, what I will do. And as for the report of Mr. White, bishop of Lincoln, I heed it not; he is known to be mine enemy, for that I being archdeacon did excommunicate him for preaching naughty doctrine. If Christ my master was called a madman, it is no marvel though you count me frantic.

Bonner. Hadst thou not a pig brought thee the other day with a knife in it? Wherefore was it (I perceive) but to kill thyself? or, as it is told me, (that I am counselled to take heed of thee) to kill me? I fear thee not, I think I am able to tread under my feet, do the best thou canst.

Philpot. My lord, I cannot deny but that there was a knife in the pig's belly that was brought me. But who put it in, or for what purpose, I know not, unless it were because he that sent the meat, thought I was without a knife, and so put it in. But other things your lordship needeth not to fear; for I was never without a knife, since I came to prison. And touching your person, you shall live long if you should live till I should about to kill you; and I confess, by violence your lordship is able to overcome me.

Bonner. I charge thee to answer to mine articles. Hold him a book. Thou shalt swear to answer truly to all such articles, as I shall demand of thee.

Philpot. I will first know your lordship to be mine ordinary, before I swear herein.

Bonner. What, we shall have an Anabaptist of thee who thinketh it not lawful to swear before a judge.

Philpot. My lord, I am no Anabaptist, I think it lawful to swear before a competent judge, being lawfully required. But I refuse to swear in these courts before your lordship, because you are not mine ordinary.

Bonner. I am thine ordinary, and here do pronounce by sentence peremptory, I am thine ordinary, and thou art of my diocese: and here he ordered others to be called in to bear him witness. And I make thee (taking one of his servants by the arm) to be my notary. And now hearken to my articles, to which (when he had read them) he admonished me to make answer, and said to the keeper, Fetch me his fellows, and I shall make them be witnesses against him.

In the mean while came in one of the sheriffs of London, whom the bishop (calling for two chairs) placed by him, saying, Mr. Sheriff, I would you should understand how I do proceed against this man. Mr. Sheriff; you shall hear what articles this man doth maintain; and so read a rabblement of feigned articles: That I should deny baptism to be necessary to them that were born of christian parents, that I denied fasting and prayer, and all other good deeds, that I maintained only bare faith to be sufficient to salvation, whatsoever a man did besides, and I maintained God to be the author of all sin and wickedness.

Philpot. Ha, my lord, have you nothing of truth to charge me withal, but you must be fain to imagine these blasphemous lies against me? You might as well have said I had killed your father. The scriptures say, "That God will destroy all men that speak lies." And is not your lordship ashamed to say before this worshipful gentleman, (who is unknown to me) that I maintain these abominable blasphemies which you have rehearsed? which if I did maintain, I were well worthy to be counted an heretic, and to be burnt an hundred times if it were possible.

Bonner. I do object them unto thee, to hear what thou wilt say in them, and how thou canst clear thyself of them.

Philpot. Then it was not justly said of your lordship in the beginning, that I did maintain them, since almost I hold none of these articles you have read, in form as they are written.

Bonner. How sayest thou? wilt thou answer to them?

Philpot. I will first know you to be mine ordiand that you may lawfully charge me with such s, and then afterwards being lawfully called in ment, I will shew my mind fully thereof, and not wile.

Bonner. Well, then I will make thy fellows to be esses herein against thee: where are they? are they Philpot. They are here, my lord.

Bonner. Come hither, sirs; [hold them a book] shall swear by the contents of that book, that you (all manner of affections laid apart) say the truth such articles as shall be demanded of you con-ing this man here present, who is a very naughty and take you heed of him that he doth not deceive as I am afraid he doth you much hurt, and theneth you in your errors.

Prisoners. My lord, we will not swear, except we where to; we can accuse him of no evil, we have but a while acquainted with him.

Philpot. I wonder your lordship knowing the law, go about, contrary to the same, to have infamous ons to be witnesses, for your lordship doth take them heretics, and by the law an heretic cannot be a ess.

Bonner. Yes, one heretic against another may be enough. And, Mr. Sheriff, I will make one of n to be a witness against another.

Philpot. You have the law in your hand, and will what you list.

Prisoners. No, my lord.

Bonner. No, will you not? I will make you swear, ther you will or no. I think they be Anabaptists, Sheriff, they think it not lawful to swear before a ge.

Philpot. We think it lawful to swear for a man judily called, as we are not now, but in a blind cor-

Bonner. Why, then seeing you will not swear against r fellow, you shall swear for yourselves, and I do e in the presence of Mr. Sheriff object the same ares unto you, as I have done unto him, and require under pain of excommunication, to answer partiarly unto every one of them when you shall be mined, as you shall be by and by examined by register and some of my chaplains.

Prisoners. My lord, we will not accuse ourselves.
any man can lay any thing against us, we are here dy to answer thereto: otherwise we pray your lord-p not to burden us; for some of us are here before d, we know no just cause why.

Bonner. Mr. Sheriff, I will trouble you no longer h these froward men. And so he rose up, and was ng away, talking with Mr. Sheriff.

Philpot. Mr. Sheriff, I pray you record how my d proceedeth against us in corners, without all order law, having no just cause to lay against us. And af-this, we were all commanded to be put in the stocks, ere I sat from morning until night; and the keeper night upon favour let me out.

other private CONFERENCE between the BISHOP and Mr. PHILPOT in the COAL-HOUSE.

PHILPOT. The Sunday after, the bishop came into the coal-house at night, with the keeper, and ewed the house, saying, that he was never there be-re: whereby a man may guess how he kept God's mmandment in visiting the prisoners, seeing he was ver with them that have been so nigh his nose:
d he came not then for any good zeal, but to view e place, and thought it too good for me, and there-e after supper, between eight and nine, he sent for e, saying;

Bonner. Sir, I have great displeasure of the queen d council for keeping you so long, and letting you ve so much liberty; and besides that, you be yon-r, and strengthen the other prisoners in their errors, as I have laid wait for your doings, and am certified of you well enough; I will sequester you therefore from them, and you shall hurt them no more as you have done, and I will out of hand dispatch you as I am commanded, unless you will be a conformable man.

Philpot. My lord, you have my body in your custody, you may transport it whither you please, I am content. And I wish you would make as quick expedition in my judgment, as you say; I long for it: and as for conformity, I am ready to yield to all truth, if any can bring better than I.

Bonner. Why, will you believe no man but yourself, whatsoever they say?

Philpot. My belief must not hang upon men's sayings, without sure authority of God's word, which if they can shew me, I will be pliant to the same; otherwise
I cannot go from my certain faith to that which is uncertain.

Bonner. Have you then the truth only?

Philpot. My lord, I will speak my mind freely unto you, and upon no malice that I bear to you, before God:
You have not the truth; neither are you of the church of God; but you persecute both the truth and the true church of God, for which cause you cannot prosper long:
You see God doth not prosper your doings according to your expectations: he hath of late shewed his just judgment against one of your greatest doers, who by report died miserably. I envy not the authority you are in. You that have learning, should know best how to rule. And seeing God hath restored you to your dignity and living again, use the same to God's glory, and to the setting forth of his true religion; otherwise it will not continue, do what you can. With this saying he paused, and at length said:

Bonner. That good man was punished for such as thou art. Where is the keeper? Come, let him have him to the place that is provided for him. Go your way before.

Philpot. And he followed me, calling the keeper aside, commanding him to keep all men from me, and narrowly to search me, (as the sequel did declare) and brought me to his privy door that goeth into the church, and commanded two of his men to accompany the keeper, and to see me placed.

And afterwards I passed through St. Paul's up to Lol-lards' Tower, and after that turned along the west-side of St. Paul's through the wall, and passing through six or seven doors, came to my lodging through many straits; where I called to remembrance, that strait is the way to heaven. And it is in a tower, right on the other side of Lollards' Tower, as high almost as the battlements of St. Paul's, eight feet in breadth, and thirteen in length, and almost over the prison where I was before, having a window opening towards the east, by which I could look over the tops of a great many houses, but see no man passing into them: and whoso walk in the bishop's outer gallery going to his chapel, might see my window, and me standing in the same.

And as I came to my place, the keeper plucked off my gown, and searched me very narrowly, and took away a pen-case, ink-horn, girdle, and knife, but (as God would) I had an inkling a little before I was called;
of my removal, and thereupon made an errand to the stool, where (full sore against my will) I cast away many a sweet and friendly letter: but that which I had written of my last examination before, I thrust into my hose, thinking the next day to have made an end thereof, and with walking it was fallen down to my leg, which he by feeling did soon find out, and asked what that was. I said, they were certain letters: and with that he was very busy to have them out. Let me alone, said I, I will pluck them out: with that I put my hand, having two other letters therein, and brought up the same writ-ting into my breeches, and there left it, giving him the other two letters that were not of any great importance; which to make a shew that they had been weighty, I began to tear as well as I could, till they snatched them from me, and so deluded him (I thank God) of his purpose.

Then he went away, and as he was going, one of them that

that came with him, said, that I did not deliver the writing I had in my house, but two other letters I had in my hand before. Did he not, says he? I will go and search him better: which I hearing, conveyed my examination I had written, into another place near my bed, and took all my letters I had in my purse, and was tearing of them when he came again, and as he came I threw the same out of the window, saying, That I heard what he said; wherefore I did prevent his searching again, and I was right glad. God be praised that gave me that present shift to blind their eyes from the knowledge of my writings, which if they had known, it would have been a great occasion of straiter keeping and looking unto, although they looked narrowly enough.

The EIGHTH EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, before the Bishops of LONDON and St. DAVID'S, Mr. MORDANT, and others in the Bishop's CHAPLAINS.

THE next day after, my keeper came in the morning before day to call me down, and so I was brought down into his wardrobe, where with a keeper I was left, and there continued all the day. But after dinner I was called down into the chapel, before the bishops of London and St. David's, Mr. Mordant, one of the queen's council, Mr. Archdeacon of London, and before a great many other Baalamites. And the bishop spake to me in this wise.

Bonner. Sir, I here object, and lay unto you, in the presence of my lord of St. David's, and of Mr. Mordant, and of these worshipful men, these articles here in this libel contained: and openly he read them.

To whom when I would particularly have answered to some of his blasphemies, he would not permit me; but said, I should have leisure to say what I would, when he had spoken.

And unto these here I add another schedule. Also, I require thee to answer to the catechism set forth in the schismatical time of king Edward. Also I will thee to answer to certain conclusions agreed upon in Oxford and Cambridge. And I here do bring forth these witnesses against thee in thine own presence, namely, my lord of St. David's, Mr. Mordant, and Mr. Harpsfield, with as many as were present at the disputation you made in the convocation-house; willing you to testify, of your oaths taken upon a book, his stubborn and irreverent behaviour he did there use against the blessed sacrament of the altar. Give me a book, and receiving one, he opened the same, saying, I will teach him here one trick in our law, which he knoweth not; that is, my lord of St. David's, because you are a bishop, you have this privilege, that you may swear by looking on the gospel book without touching the same. And so he opened the book in his sight, and shut it again, and caused the others to put their hands on the book, and take their oath, and desired them to resort to his register to make their depositions when they might be best at leisure. And afterwards he turned to me and said, Now, sir, you shall answer but two words, whether you will answer to these articles which I have laid unto you, directly, yea, or nay?

Philpot. My lord, you have told a long tale against me, containing many lying blasphemies, which cannot be answered in two words: besides this, you promised me at the beginning, that I should say what I could for my defence, and now you will not give me leave to speak. What law is this?

Bonner. Speak yea, or nay, for you shall say no more at this time.

[The cause was, as I guess, that he saw so many there gathered to hear.]

Philpot. Then my two words you would have me speak, shall be, that I have appealed from you, and take you not for my sufficient judge.

Bonner. Indeed, Mr. Mordant, he hath appealed to the king, and to the queen; but I will be so bold with her majesty, to stay that appeal in mine own hands.

Philpot. You will do what you please, my lord, you have the law in your hands.

Bonner. Wilt thou answer, or no?

Philpot. I will not answer otherwise than I have said.

Bonner. Register, note his answer that he maketh.

Philpot. Knock me on the head with an hatchet, or set up a stake and burn me out of hand, without further law; you may as well do so, as what you do for all is without order of law: such tyranny was never seen as you use now-a-days; God of his mercy deliver your cruel kingdom. And whilst I spake thus, the bishop went away in haste.

St. David's. Mr. Philpot, I pray you be quiet, and have patience with you.

Philpot. My lord, I thank God, I have patience to bear and abide all your cruel intents against me notwithstanding I speak this earnestly, being justly moved thereto, to notify your unjust and cruel dealing with men in corners, without all due order of law.

After this, at night I was conducted again by three or four into the coal-house.

The NINTH EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, before Bishop BONNER and his Chaplains.

THE next day, betimes in the morning I was called down by my keeper, and brought again into the wardrobe, where I remained till the bishop heard his mass, and afterwards he sent up for me into his inward parlour, and there he called for a chair to sit down, and brought his infamous libel of his forged articles in his hand, and sat down, willing me to draw near unto him, and said;

Bonner. I am this day appointed to tarry at home from the parliament-house to examine you and your fellows upon these articles, and you stand dallying with me, and will neither answer to nor fro. I know all your exceptions will not serve you. Will it not be fair honesty for you, think you, that when thou comest before the lord mayor and the sheriffs, and other worshipful audience, when I shall say before them all, that I have had thee many times before me, and before many learned men, and then thou couldst say nothing for that thou standest in, for all thy great brags of learning, neither wouldst thou answer directly to any thing?

Philpot. My lord, I have told you my mind plainly enough; but yet I do not intend to lose that privilege the law giveth me, which is free choice to answer when I am not bound, and this privilege will I cleave unto until I be compelled otherwise.

Bonner. Well, I perceive thou wilt play the obstinate fool. Lay thine appellation when thou comest to judgment, and answer in the mean while to these articles.

Philpot. No, my lord, by your leave I will not answer to them, until my lawful appeal be tried.

Bonner. Well, thou shalt hear them, and with that he began to read them.

Philpot. I shrunk back into the window, and looked on a book, and after he had read them over he said unto me:

Bonner. I have read them over, although it hath not pleased you to hear me. I marvel, in good faith, what thou meanest by being so wilful and stubborn, seeing thou mayest do well enough if thou liked. It is but a singularity; dost thou not see all the reason against thee?

Philpot. My lord, I speak unto you in the witness of God, before whom I stand, that I am neither wedded to mine own will, neither stand upon my stubbornness or singularity, but upon my conscience instructed by God's word: and if your lordship can shew better evidence than I have for a good faith, I will follow the same.

Bonner. What, thou wilt not, lo, for all that! What all that is past shall be forgotten, if thou wilt be conformable unto us. I know thou mightest find as much favour as thou wouldst desire.

Then I perceiving that he fawned so much upon me, thought it good to give him some hope of my releasing to the intent I might give him and his hypocritical ration openly a further foil, perceiving that they reason openly with none but such as are unlearned, for lack of knowledge not able to answer, or else such as they have a hope that for fear or love of the will recant: I said, my lord, it is not unknown to that I have openly, in the audience of a great number, stood to the maintenance of these opinions I am in, by learning did offer to defend them; therefore, my I would it might openly appear to the world that I won by learning, or else what will they say, but either for fear, or love of the world, I am without ground turned from the truth? And if I hear any of learning openly shewed, I shall be as conformable as you may require me.

Bonner. Yea marry, now you speak somewhat like a reasonable man. You might have had a great deal of favour in my house, and liberty than you have, and you shall lack nothing that is within my reach; call for it and you shall have it. And what is it that you would openly by learning be somewhat satisfied in? Tell me.

Philpot. My lord, I have openly said, and do believe it also, that your sacrifice of the mass is no sacrament.

Bonner. What, do you deny the presence of Christ in the sacrament?

Philpot. No, my lord, I deny not the presence of Christ in the sacrament, but I have denied the sacrament of the altar, as it is used in your mass, to be the sacrament of Christ's institution: and first it must be proved a sacrament before there can be any presence in it.

Bonner. Why, do you deny the mass to be a sacrament? I pray you, what is a sacrament? Is it not a sign of a holy thing, as St. Austin doth define it?

Philpot. Yes, verily that it is.

Bonner. Then I make this argument unto you: A sacrament is the sign of a holy thing: but the mass is a sign of a holy thing: therefore, it is a sacrament.

Philpot. You must add this to your major, or first position, as St. Augustine doth mean, that a sacrament is the sign of a holy thing instituted of God, and commanded; for otherwise it can be no sacrament; for men cannot make a sacrament.

Bonner. I grant that; and such a sign of a holy thing is the mass of Christ's institution.

Philpot. I deny that, my lord.

Bonner. I will prove this by St. Augustine by and by. I will go shew you the book, and you shall have any book I have that you will demand. Ho, who is with me there? Call me Mr. Doctor Chedsey, Mr. Archdeacon, Mr. Cofins, and other chaplains hither.

Here, my lords: Mr. Dr. Chedsey is gone to Westminister, and Mr. Archdeacon Harpsfield was here even now.

Bonner. Mr. Cofins, I pray you examine him upon these articles, and write the answer he maketh to every one of them. I will go examine his fellows, and send for St. Augustine by and by. I find this man more conformable than he was before.

Cofins. I trust, my lord, you shall find him at length a good catholic man. Marry, here be a sight of here; I dare say you will hold none of them, nor stand for any of them. How say you to the first?

Philpot. Mr. Cofins, I have told my lord already, that I will answer to none of these articles he hath objected against me; but if you will with learning answer that which is in question between my lord and me, I will gladly hear and commune with you.

Cofins. Will you not? Why, what is that then that is in question between my lord and you?

Philpot. Whether your mass be a sacrament or no.

Cofins. What, the mass to be a sacrament? Who doubts thereof?

Philpot. If it be an undoubted truth, you may the more prove it; for I doubt much thereof.

Cofins. Why, I will prove it. It is the sign of a holy thing: therefore, it is a sacrament.

Philpot. I deny your antecedent.

No. 34.

Cofins. What, will you so? Then there is no reasoning with you.

Thus Mr. Cofins gave over in the plain field for want of further proof. And then the morrow-mass chaplain began to speak for his occupation: and with that Mr. Harpsfield came out from my lord with St. Augustine's epistles, saying:

Harpsfield. My lord hath sent you here St. Augustine to look upon, and I pray you look what he saith in a certain epistle which he writeth; I will read over the whole. Here you may hear the celebration of the mass, and how it reproveth them that went a hawking and hunting before the celebration of the same, on the sabbath and holidays.

Philpot. I perceive the contents of this epistle, and I see nothing here against me, neither any thing that maketh for the proof of your sacrament of the mass.

Harpsfield. No, doth he not make mention of the mass, and the celebration thereof? what can be spoken more plain?

Philpot. St. Austin meaneth of the celebration of the communion, and of the true use of the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, and not of your private mass, which you of late years have erected in the stead thereof; for this word Mass hath been an old term, attributed to the communion even from the primitive church. And I pray you tell me what Missa doth signify? I think not many that say mass can well tell.

Cofins. No, can they not? that is a marvel.

Philpot. Then tell me if you can. But Mr. Cofins and my morrow-mass chaplain were both dumb, looking upon Mr. Harpsfield for help, and at length he spake.

Harpsfield. You think it cometh of the Hebrew word Massah, as though none were versed in the Hebrew but yourself.

Philpot. I have not gone so long to school, to derive the signification of the word Missa, which is a Latin word, out of Hebrew: but I have learned to interpret Greek words by Greek, and Latin by Latin, and Hebrew by Hebrew; I take the communion to be called Missa, a mittendo, of such things as at the celebration of the communion were sent by such as were of ability, to the relief of the poor, where the rich brought according to their devotion and ability, and required the minister in the celebration of the communion to pray unto God for them, and to accept their common alms, which they at such times did send for the relief of their poor brethren and sisters; and for this it was called Missa, as learned men do witness. At which celebration of the mass, all that were present did communicate under both kinds, according to Christ's institution, as they did in St. Augustine's time. But unless you can shew that your mass is used as it then was, you shall never by the name of mass, (which St. Augustine attributed to the true use of the communion) prove your private mass to be a sacrament, unless you can prove the same now to be in your masses as was then, which is clean contrary.

Harpsfield. What, deny you the mass to be a sacrament? For shame speak it not.

Philpot. I will not be ashamed to deny it, if you cannot prove it.

Harpsfield. Why, it is a sacrifice, which is more than a sacrament.

Philpot. You may make of it as much as you like: but you shall never make it a sacrifice, as you may imagine thereof, but first it must be a sacrament, for of the sacrament you deduce your sacrifice.

Harpsfield. Why, doth not Christ say, "This is my body?" and doth not the priest pronounce the same that Christ did?

Philpot. The pronounciation only is not enough, unless the words be therewithal applied to the use, as Christ spake them to. For though you speak the words of baptism over water ever so many times, yet there is no baptism unless there be a christian person to be baptized.

Harpsfield. Nay, that is not alike; for, he that said,

Hoc est corpus pus meum, that is, "This is my body," said also, Accipite, manducate, that is, Take ye, eat ye. And except the former part of the institution of Christ's sacrament be accomplished according to the communion; the later, "This is my body," can have no verification, take it which way you will, and how you will.

Morrow-mass Chaplain. Why then you will make the sacrament to stand in the receiving, and that receiving maketh it a sacrament.

Philpot. I do not say, that the receiving only maketh it a sacrament, but I say, that a common receiving must needs be concurrent with the true sacrament, as a necessary member, without which it cannot be a sacrament, because Christ hath made this a principal part of the sacrament, "Take ye, eat ye," which you do not in your mass according to Christ's institution; wherefore, it can be no sacrament, for that it wanteth Christ's institution.

Cofins. We do forbid none to come to it, but as many as like may be partakers with us at the mass if they require it.

Philpot. Nay, that they shall not, though they require it, you will minister but one kind unto them, which is not after Christ's institution. Besides that, you ought, before you go to mass, to exhort all that be present to make a sacrifice of thanksgiving, for Christ's passion with you, and exhort them to be partakers with you, according to Christ's commandment, saying unto all that be present, "Take ye, eat ye:" and likewise by preaching shew forth the Lord's death, which you do not.

Cofins. What if all things be done, even as you would have it, and whilst the minister is about to administer the sacrament, before any have received it there arise a sudden hurly burly, that the communicants be compelled to go away; is it not a sacrament for all that none hath communicated besides the priest?

Philpot. In this case, where all things are appointed to be done according to God's word, if incident necessity had not hindered, I cannot say but it is a sacrament, and that he who hath received, hath received the true sacrament. After this, the morrow-mass priest made this apish reason.

Morrow-mass Priest. If the sacrament of the mass be no sacrament, unless all do receive it, because Christ said, "Take ye, eat ye," then the sacrament of baptism is no sacrament where there is but one baptized, because Christ said to his apostles, "Go preach the gospel to all creatures, baptizing all nations in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost."

Philpot. In that saying of Christ, "Baptizing all nations," is a commandment to the apostles, to baptize all sorts of men, and to exclude none that believe, be he Gentile or Jew, not meaning all at once, for that were impossible. And there are many examples that baptism may be singularly ministered to one person, as we have example of Christ baptized of John, and in the Eunuch baptized of Philip, with many more such like: but so have you not of the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, but contrariwise by the express words of St. Paul you are commanded to use it in a communion and participation of many together; 1 Cor. xi. "As oft as ye come together to eat (meaning the Lord's supper) tarry one for another." And also the minister in the celebration of the sacrament speaketh unto all that be present in Christ's behalf, to communicate with him, saying, "Take ye, and eat ye." Wherefore, as many as are present and do not communicate, break God's commandment in not receiving the same, and the minister is no just minister that doth not distribute the sacrament as Christ did, to all that are present; and where God's word is transgressed, there is not Christ present, and consequently it is no sacrament.

Harpsfield. What, would you have it no sacrament without it be a communion?

Philpot. I make it not so, but God's express word teacheth me so, yea, also all the ancient writers: as Chrysostom writing upon the epistle to the Ephesians, faith, That the oblation is in vain, where none doth communicate with the priest. If by his judgment the action of the priest alone is in vain, where is no communion, how can that be a sacrament, which he calleth a vain oblation, and a vain standing at the altar?

Cofins. Such a fellow I have never heard, you will not have the mass to be a sacrament; you are no more for me to reason with. Come, let us go, pointing to the morrow-mass chaplain: we will leave you (Mr. Archdeacon) and him together; and so they went away. Afterwards the archdeacon fell into earnest persuasion with me, saying:

Harpsfield. Mr. Philpot, you and I have been acquainted these many years; we were school-fellows both in Winchester and in Oxford. Wherefore I wish you as well to do as myself, and I pray you think of me.

Philpot. I thank you for your good will towards me. But if you be deceived (as I am sure you are), I desire you not to wish me deceived with you. For before God I tell you plainly, you are highly deceived, and maintain false religion, and be not those men you take yourselves for: and if you do not repent, and leave off your persecuting Christ's truth, you will go to the devil for it. Therefore consider it in time, I give you warning, for else in the day of judgment I shall be witness against you, that I told you this here talking together.

Harpsfield. Fic, that is but your own singular opinion; I perceive you are now still that man you were in Oxford.

Philpot. I trust you can report no notorious evil that ever you knew by me there.

Harpsfield. I can say no evil of your conversation but I knew you to be a studious man. Marry, if you remember when we met in disputation in Paris, you would not lightly give over, and for that cause I speak what I have said.

Philpot. Mr. Harpsfield, you know in the schools of Oxford, when we were young men, we did strive much upon vain glory, and upon contention, more than for the truth: but now our years and riper learning teach us to fall to a truth, which must be our portion for ever. And if I was then, in my time of ignorance earnest in my own cause, I ought now to be earnest in my master Christ's cause, and his truth. I know now that nothing done upon vain glory and singularity can please God, have it ever so godly a shew: wherefore I pray you judge not so of me now.

Harpsfield. What, will you think yourself better learned than all the learned men in this realm?

Philpot. My faith hangeth not upon the learned of the world, but on the learned of God's word.

Harpsfield. Well, I will talk with you no more now, but pray God to open your heart.

Philpot. I pray God open both our hearts, to do more his will than we have done in times past.

Harpsfield. Ho, keeper, take him away with you.

Philpot. I pray you, Mr. Harpsfield, tell me what this pronoun (Hoc) doth demonstrate and shew, in this indicative proposition as you call it, Hoc est corpus meum, This is my body.

Harpsfield. It doth demonstrate the substance of bread, which by the words spoken by the priest, and by the omnipotency of God, is turned into the substance of Christ's very body.

Philpot. Is the substance of bread, as you say, turned into Christ's body?

Harpsfield. Yea, that it is.

Philpot. Why, then Christ's body receiveth daily a great increase of many thousand pieces of bread into his body, and that is his body become now, which was not before, and by this you would seem to make, that there is an alteration in Christ's glorified body, which is a wicked thing to think.

Harpsfield. Then he fetched about again, and remembering himself better, and seeing the inconvenience of his first assertion, of the transubstantiation of bread into Christ's body, he said, That the substance of bread, after the words spoken by the priest, was evacuated or vanished away by the omnipotency of God.

Philpot. This is another song than you sung first.

here you may see how contrary you are to yourselves. For indeed your schoolmen do hold, That the substance of bread is really turned into the very substance of Christ's body. And now you perceiving the inconvenience which is objected against you at opinion, are driven to imagine a new shift, and the substance of bread is evacuated, contrary to which your church hath at first believed and taught. That contrariety is there among you, and all to dethe sincere truth.

Arpsfield. Is not God omnipotent? and cannot he as he hath said?

Philpot. But his omnipotence will not do as you say, contrary to his word and to his honour. It is not God's power to include him bodily into a piece of bread, and necessity to tie him thereto. It is not God's honour to make a piece of bread God and man, which lie before your face doth putrify after a certain time. Is not God's omnipotence as able to give body with the sacramental bread, as to make so many turnings away of the bread, as you do, and that directly against the scripture, which calleth it bread many times after consecration? Are you not ashamed to make so many alterations of the Lord's institution you do, and take away the substantial parts of the sacrament, as, "Take ye, eat ye, drink ye all of this; and this in remembrance of me;" and to place in the bread, Hear ye, gaze ye, knock ye, worship ye, sacrifice ye for the quick and the dead! If be not blasphemy to God and his sacraments, to add to pluck away in this sort, and that contrary to the word of all ancient writers, and contrary to the example of Christ and all his apostles, tell me.

Arpsfield. I know you have gathered the sayings of doctors together which make for your purpose; I talk no longer with you.

Philpot. I pray God open both our hearts, to do his will than we have done in times past.

Arpsfield. Ho, keeper, take him away with you.

TENTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, before Bishop BONNER, his REGISTER, and others.

THE next day, after dinner, I was brought into my lord's upper hall, and there he called me before him and his register, and before Dr. Chedsey, in the presence of two homely gentlemen, and a priest which I knew not: at which time the bishop said:

Bonner. I do here lay to this man in your presence, charging you to be a witness against him, as much as you know in any of them) these articles, this book of catechism, made in king Edward's days, also these conclusions agreed upon both in Oxford and Cambridge; I lay unto him, that he hath despised the censures of the church, and hath stood accursed above this month, and never required absolution thereof, say you, wert thou not accursed by my lord chancellor?

Philpot. I was excommunicated by him wrongfully, without any just cause, and without order of law, and never personally cited.

Bonner. Didst thou not tell me the other day, when I required thee to come to the mass, that thou wast excommunicated, and therefore by law could not come to mass? How long hast thou thus been excommunicated?

Philpot. More than a year and a half.

Bonner. Lo, you may hear what he saith: write

Philpot. But as you would have written what I said, I have been thus long excommunicated; also let him write, that I did require of my lord chancellor that did excommunicate me, my absolution, but he would not give it me, saying, That I was Excommunicatus ipso jure, because I was an heretic, and pleased him to call me, therefore accursed by the law, and so commanded me to prison, where I remain.

Gentleman. Why do you not require absolution at the lord's hands here now?

Philpot. Because he is not mine ordinary, neither hath by the law any thing to do with me of right.

Bonner. What an obstinate fool is this? I tell thee I will be thine ordinary whether thou wilt or no.

Philpot. And because of this your unrighteous force towards me, I have appealed from you, and require you, Mr. Register, that my appeal may be entered in writing.

Bonner. Have you heard such a froward fellow as this? He seemed yesterday to be very tractable, and I had good hope of him. I tell thee, thou art of my diocese.

Philpot. I am of Winchester diocese, and not of London diocese.

Bonner. I pray you, may not a man be of two dioceses at once?

Philpot. No, that he cannot.

Bonner. Lo, will you see what an ignorant fool this is in the law, in which he would seem to be proficient? I tell thee a man may be of three dioceses at once: as if thou wert born in London, by reason thereof thou shouldst be of my diocese; or else if thou wert not born, but hadst a dignity here, also thou art to be counted of my diocese, or else by reason of thy habitation in my diocese.

Philpot. In none of these respects am I of your lordship's diocese. But for all that, this will not follow, that I dwelling at Winchester, am at that present of London diocese.

Bonner. What wilt thou lay thereof? Wilt thou recant if I prove it?

Philpot. But what shall I win if you do not?

Bonner. I will give thee my bishopric if I prove it not.

Philpot. Yea, but who shall deliver it me if I win?

Bonner. Thou art an arrogant fool, enter their oaths, and take these witnesses depositions. I must be gone to the parliament-house.

After this, a priest who was standing by, asked me, whether I was a-kin to my lord Rich, or no.

I said, my lord Rich said so himself to me the other day, but how I know not.

Chedsey. I heard him say he was his nigh kinsman.

Baalamite. Why then you and I must be a-kin, for he is my nigh kinsman. How chance it that you and I be of contrary judgments?

Philpot. It is no marvel, for Christ prophesied, "That the father should be divided against the son, and the son against the father, for my truth's sake."

Baalamite. You do hold, as I understand, against the blessed sacrament of the altar, and against the holy mass.

Philpot. If you can prove it a sacrament, I will not hold against you.

Baalamite. What, prove it a sacrament? said he, Doth not St. Paul say, "That such things as the eye hath not seen, neither ear heard, hath God prepared for them that love him."

Philpot. That saying of St. Paul concerneth not your sacrament, but is meant of the heavenly joys that are prepared for all faithful believers.

Baalamite. Why then I perceive you understand not St. Paul. By God, you are deceived.

Philpot. You ought not to swear, kinsman, if you will that I shall so call you: and without disowning of our kindred, I understand St. Paul as well as you, and know what I say; and with that shewed him a Greek Testament, with Erasmus's translation, and with the old also, demanding of him, which text he was best acquainted withal.

Baalamite. I knew Greek too once, as well as you, I care not which you read.

Philpot. You know them all alike; you understand the one as well as the other. With this my Baalamite kinsman departed in a fury.

The next day after I was brought down again, after dinner, to the chapel, and there my Baalamite kinsman (to verify the scriptures, that a man's own kinsfolks shall be his enemies) came in with the bishop as a witness against me: and there the bishop caused another that came, came to hint about other matters, to swear also to be a witness against me, who was a priest also, saying :

Bonner. You shall swear also to depose all the truth of certain articles you shall be inquired of concerning this man; and here I (according to the law) do bring them forth in thy presence.

Philpot. My lord, I do not agree to the production of them, but do appeal from all these and other your proceedings against me; and require you, Mr. Register, that my appeal may be entered, and I will pay you for your labour.

Register. Your appeal shall be entered at leisure. Whom do you appeal unto? Tell me.

Philpot. I appeal to a higher judge, as to the lieutenant of the archbishopric of Canterbury, for I know not who is bishop thereof at this present. With that the bishop went away, and my Baalamite kinsman looked big upon me, but said never a word.

Thus have I in haste scribbled out all mine examinations hitherto, that the same which hath been done unto me in the dark might come to light, and that the papists' unjust proceedings and nakedness in their false religion, might be known to their confusion. Jesus is Emanuel, that is, God with us, Amen. 1555.

The ELEVENTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, on St. Andrew's Day, before the Bishops of DURHAM, CHICHESTER, BATH, and LONDON, Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON, Dr. CHEDSEY, Mr. MORGAN of Oxford, Dr. WESTON, Dr. HARPSFIELD, Archdeacon, Mr. COSINS, and Mr. JOHNSON, Register to the Bishop of LONDON, in his Palace.

BEING sent for with my keeper, the bishop of London met me at his hall-door, and full mannerly he played the gentleman-usher to bring me before the lords, saying,

Bonner. My lords, I shall desire you to take some pains with this man, he is a gentleman, and I would he should do well, but he will wilfully cast away himself.

Durham. Come hither, sir, what is your name?

Philpot. My name is Philpot.

Durham. I have heard of that name to be a worshipful flock, and since you are a gentleman, do as you may live worshipfully among other gentlemen. What is the cause of your trouble now?

I told him the cause, as in my former examinations is expressed.

Durham. Well, all causes set apart, will you now be a conformable man to the catholic faith, and leave all new-fangled opinions and heresies? I was in Germany with Luther at the beginning of these opinions, and can tell how they began. Leave them and follow the catholic church throughout the whole world, as the whole realm now doth.

Philpot. My lord, I am in the catholic faith, and desire to live and die in the same: but it is not unknown to your lordship, that I, with others, these twenty years have been taught another manner of faith than you now go about to compel us unto; wherefore it is requisite that we have time to weigh the same, and to hear how it agreeth with God's word. For faith is at a sudden neither won, neither removed, but as St. Paul saith, "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word."

Chichester. And if you will give me leave, my lord, I will shew him how he taketh the saying of St. Paul amiss, as many others now-a-days do, alledging the same, that they ought not to be compelled to believe, whereas St. Paul meaneth of infidels, and not of the faithful; and so St. Austin, writing against the Donatists, saith, That the faithful may be compelled to believe.

Philpot. St. Bernard (if it please your lordship) doth take that sense of St. Paul as I do, saying, that faith must be persuaded to a man, and not enjoined. And St. Augustine speaketh of such as were first thoroughly persuaded by manifest scriptures, and yet would resist of stubborn wilfulness.

Chichester. So Bernard meaneth of infidels also.

Philpot. No, my lord, that he doth not, for he writeth not of the infidels, but he writeth of such as were deceived by errors.

Chichester. My lord of Durham, I have been so bold as to interrupt your lordship of your tale, I pray you now proceed on.

Durham. Mr. Philpot, will you be of the same catholic faith and church with us you were baptized in, and your godfathers promised for you, and hold as we do? and then may you be rid out of trouble. I perceive you are learned, and it is a pity but you should do well.

Philpot. I am of the same catholic faith and catholic church I was baptized into, and in that will I live and die.

Durham. That is well said; if you hold there, you cannot but do well.

Chichester. Yea, my lord, but he meaneth otherwise than you do. Are you of the same faith your godfathers and godmothers were, or no?

Philpot. I cannot tell what faith they were of certainly, but I am of the faith I was baptized into, which is the faith of Christ; for I was not baptized into the faith of my godfathers, but in the faith of Christ.

Chichester. St. Austin saith, That infants are baptized in the faith of their godfathers.

Philpot. St. Augustine, in so saying, meaneth of the faith of Christ, which the godfathers do, or ought to believe, and not otherwise.

Durham. How say you, will you believe as we do, and all the learned of the realm, or no? and be of one church with us?

Philpot. My lords, it is not unknown to you, that there have been always two churches.

Chichester. Nay, that is not so: there is but one catholic church.

Philpot. I shall desire your lordships to hear out my tale, and to take my meaning. For I know there is but one true church; but always from the beginning there hath been joined to the same true church, a false church, adversary to the true: and that was declared at first in Abel and Cain, who persecuted and slew his brother, in whom (St. Augustine witnesseth) is represented the false and true church. And that as soon as God had chosen his peculiar people, and shewed unto them his sanctuary, holy statutes, and will, anon after arose the false church, and ten of the twelve tribes of Israel divided themselves from the true church of Judah and Benjamin, and made one to themselves at Bethel, and set up golden calves, and yet pretended therewith to serve God, and so abused his word. Notwithstanding God was displeased with them, and ceased not his wrath until he had utterly destroyed them.

Chichester. I will grant you before the coming of Christ there were two churches in the old law; but in the new law since Christ's coming, you cannot shew it to be so by the scripture.

Philpot. Yes, my lord, that I can, if you would give me leave. After Christ had chosen his apostles, was there not a Judas in the new law, and a Simon Magus, and were they not of the church?

Chichester. Yea, but I mean after the gospel was written, where can you find me two churches after Christ had ascended, and sent the Holy Ghost?

Philpot. The gospel was within eight years after the ascension written by St. Matthew; and the writing thereof is not material to the declaration of these two churches to have been always from time to time, as by example it may be shewed: and yet as bad as my memory is, I remember in the New Testament mention is made of two churches, as it appeareth in the Revelations, and also as St. Paul to the Thessalonians maketh mention, that Antichrist, with his false generation, shall sit in the temple of God. To which Chichester replied not.

Durham. The church in the scripture is likened to a great fisher's net, which contained in it both good fish and bad fish. I trust you will be of the better sort, and lean to the truth.

Philpot. My lord, it is my whole desire now to follow that which is good, whatsoever I have done in times and to cleave to God's truth.

Bonner. Do you so, and then you shall do well: it almost night, my lord of London, I must needs be e.

Bonner. Nay, my lord of Durham, I must desire your lordship, and my lord of Chichester, to tarry a while. And before he had so said, the bishop of went his way without saying a word. What, my of Bath, will you be gone? I pray you tarry. My I have earnest matters to charge this man withal, ereof I would your lordships to be made privy, and I e them here written in a libel, I pray you sit down in, or else I will. First, I lay to him here, that he written in a bible, which I took from him, this erneous saying, that "The Holy Ghost is Christ's vi-on earth." Wilt thou abide by this saying of thine, t the Spirit is Christ's vicar on earth?

Philpot. My lord, it is not my saying, it is a more rned man's than mine: for I use not to write mine sayings, but the notable sayings of other ancient riters, as all others be where you find the same writ-
n. And as I remember, it is even the saying of St.
arnard, and a saying that I need not be ashamed of, ther you to be offended at, as my lord of Durham, d my lord of Chichester, by their learning can disn, and will not reckon it ill said.

Bonner. Will they not? Why take away the first lable, and it soundeth Arius.

Philpot. That is far fetched indeed; if your lordship ll scan men's sayings in such wise, you may find out at you list.

Bonner. But to help this, I find moreover with his n hand, in another book, "In me, John Philpot, here sin did abound, grace hath super-abounded." I ay you what super-abundant grace have you more an other men? So said Arius, That he had abun-nce of grace above all others.

Philpot. My lord, you need not be offended with at saying more than the other, for it is the saying of Paul himself, and I did apply it to myself for my omfort, knowing that though my sins be huge and reat in the sight of God, yet is his mercy and grace bove them all. And concerning Arius and his adhe-ents, I defy them, and it is well known that I have ritten against them.

Bonner. Also I lay to thy charge that thou killedst ny father, and was accursed of thy mother on her eath-bed, as I can bring witness thereof.

Philpot. O my lord, what blasphemy is this? Hath our lordship nothing of truth to charge me withal, ut (as I may speak it with your honour) such blasphemous lies? If any of these can be proved, I will promise to recant at Paul's Cross what you will have me:
am so sure they are as great blasphemies as may be ob-ected to any man. Ha, my lords, I pray you, consider ow my lord of London hath hitherto proceeded against me: for indeed he hath none other but such pretended anderous lies.

Chichester. They be Parerga; that is, matter beside he purpose.

Durham. My lord, I must needs bid you farewell.

Bonner. Nay, my lord, here is a letter, which I shall desire you to hear ere you go. This man (being in my keeping) hath taken upon him to write letters out of prison, and to pervert a young gentleman, called Mr.
Green, in my house, (call him hither) and hath made a false report of his examination, as you shall hear, not being content to be evil himself, but to make others as bad as himself. He tore the letter when he saw my man went about to search him, but yet I have pieced it gain together, and caused a copy to be written thereof; and he read the torn letter, bidding Mr. Christopherson and Morgan to mark the copy thereof.

The contents of the letter was the examination of Mr.
Green, before the bishop of London, in the presence of Mr. Pecknam, dean of St. Paul's, and of divers others, whose ready answers in the scriptures and in the doctors were wondered at by the dean himself, and many others, as Pecknam did report: and that he was committed to

Dr. Chedsey, and to have his meat from the bishop's own table. How say you, my lords, was this well done of him, being my prisoner, to write this? and yet he hath written a shameful lie, that he was in Dr. Ched-sey's keeping. How say you, Mr. Dr. Chedsey, is it not a shameful lie?

Chedsey. Yes, my lord, he was never in my keeping.

Bonner. Art thou not ashamed to write such shameful letters? Come hither, Mr. Green, did I not shew you this letter?

Green. Yea forsooth, my lord, you shewed it me.

Bonner. How think you, my lords, is not this an honest man to belie me?

Philpot. Your lordship doth mistake all things.
This letter (as your lordship may perceive, and all others that have heard the same) was not written by me, but by a friend of mine, certifying me at my request, how Mr. Green fared at the bishop of London's hands:
and there is nothing in the letter that either I, or he that wrote it, need to fear, but that might be written as my report.

Bonner. Then tell me who wrote it, if you dare.

Philpot. No, my lord, it is not my duty to accuse my friend: and especially seeing you will take all things at the worst: neither shall you ever know of me who wrote it. Your lordship may see in the end of the letter, that my friend did write unto me upon the occasion of my appeal which I have made to the whole parliament-house, about such matters as I am wrongfully troubled for.

Bonner. I would see any so hardy to put up thine appeal.

Philpot. My lord, I cannot tell what God will work,
I have written it, speed it as it may.

Bonner. My lords, I have used him with much gentleness since he came to me. How sayest thou, have I not?

Philpot. If to lie in the vilest prison in this town, (being a gentleman and an archdeacon) and in a coal-house, for the space of five or six weeks already, without fire or candle, may be counted gentleness at your hands, I must needs say I have found gentleness. But there were never men so cruelly handled as we are in these days.

Bonner. Lo, what a varlet is this. Besides this, my lords, even yesterday he procured his man to bring a bladder of black powder, I cannot tell for what purpose.

Philpot. Your lordship needeth not to mistrust the matter: it is nothing but to make ink withal for lack of ink, as I had it before in the King's-Bench, when my keeper took away my inkhorn.

Bonner. And why shouldst thou go about any such thing unknowing to me, being thy keeper? for I am thy keeper in this house, I tell thee.

Philpot. My lord, because you have caused my pen-case and inkhorn to be taken from me, I would yet be glad my friends should know what I lack, not that I intend to write any thing that I would be afraid should come to your sight.

Bonner. More than this, my lords, he caused a pig to be roasted, and made a knife be put between the skin and the flesh, for what purpose judge you. How sayest thou, didst thou not so?

Philpot. I cannot deny but there was half a pig sent me, and under the same a knife lying in the sauce, but for no ill purpose that I know; your lordship may judge what you will. It was not to kill myself nor any other as you would have men to believe; for I was never yet without a knife since I came to prison. Therefore all these are but false surmises, and not worth rehearsal.

Bonner. I have here to lay to his charge (chiefest of all) his book of the report of the disputation in the convocation-house, which is the rankest heresy that can be against the blessed sacrament of the altar. How say you, Dr. Weston, did he maintain the same there stubbornly, or no?

Weston. Yea, my lord, that he did, and would 5 G never never be answered. And it is pity that the same worshipful congregation should be slandered with such untrue reports.

Philpot. You answered me indeed, Mr. Doctor, (being then prolocutor) goodly, with, Hold thy peace, and, Have him to prison, and, Put him out of the house. I have read the book, and I find the report of every man's argument to be true in all points. And if there be any fault, it is, because he setteth forth your doings too favourably, and nothing like to that you did use me, being an archdeacon, and not of the worst in the house.

Weston. Thou art no archdeacon.

Philpot. Indeed, Mr. Doctor, you have amongst you un-archdeaoned me now, (I thank God for it) and that without all order of law.

Bonner. I pray you, my lords, hearken to what he writeth of himself, I read it over this morning, and made a note of it. He said that Dr. Weston called him a frantic and mad-man, and said, he should go to Bedlam.

Philpot. Indeed, my lord, so it pleased Dr. Weston to taunt at me, and say his shameful pleasure, but yet I was not one whit the more so for all his sayings, than Christ was when the scribes and pharisees said likewise he was mad, and that he was possessed of a devil, most blasphemously.

Durham. My lord of London, I can tarry no longer, I must needs bid you farewell. Mr. Philpot, methinketh you have said well that you will abide in the catholic faith, and in the catholic church: I pray you so do, and you shall do right well. And so he departed with Dr. Weston and Mr. Hussey.

Philpot. I have purposed so to do, howsoever I speed, by God's grace.

Bonner. I pray you, my lord of Chichester, and Mr. Prolocutor, and Mr. Dr. Morgan, to commune with him while I go to my lord of Durham.

Christopherson. Mr. Philpot, I was acquainted with you at Rome, if you remember it, but you have forgotten me, and talked somewhat with you of these matters, and I find you now the same man that you were then, I wish it were otherwise. For God's sake be conformable to men that are better learned than you, and stand not in your own conceit.

Philpot. Whereas you call me in remembrance of acquaintance had at Rome, indeed it was so, though it were but very strange on your part to me-ward, being driven to necessity.

Christopherson. You know the world was dangerous at that time.

Philpot. Nothing so dangerous as it is now; but let that pass. Whereas you say, you find me to be the same man I was then, I praise God that you see me not like a reed wavering with every wind. And whereas you would have me follow better learned men than myself; indeed I acknowledge that you, with a great many others, are far better learned than I, whose books, in respect of learning, I am not worthy to carry after you: but faith and the wisdom of God consisteth not in learning only, and therefore St. Paul willeth that our faith be not grounded upon the wisdom of man. If you can shew by learning out of God's book, that I ought to be of another faith than I am, I will hear you, and any other man whatsoever he be.

Christopherson. I marvel why you should dissent from the catholic church, since it hath thus long been universally received, except within these five or six years here in England.

Philpot. I do not dissent from the true catholic church, I do only dissent from the bishop of Rome, which if you can prove to be the catholic church of Christ, I will be of the same also with you.

Christopherson. Will you believe St. Cyprian, if I can shew out of him, that the church of Rome is such a one unto which misbelief cannot approach?

Philpot. I am sure you cannot shew any such saying out of St. Cyprian.

Christopherson. What will you lay thereon?

Philpot. I will lay as much as I am able to make.

Morgan. Will you promise to recant, if I shew saying to be true?

Philpot. My faith shall not hang upon any doctor saying, further than he shall be able to prove the same by God's word.

Christopherson. I will go fetch the book, and shew him by and by; and therewithal he went into the bishop's study, and brought Cyprian, and pointed out these words in one of his epistles, Ad Romanos ecclesiarum fides Apostolo predicante laudata est, non potest cedere perfidia; that is, "But unto the Romans, whose faith by the testimony of the apostle is praised, misbelief can have no access."

Philpot. These words of Cyprian do not prove your pretended assertion, which is, That to the church of Rome there could come no misbelief.

Christopherson. Good Lord, doth it not? What can be said more plainly?

Philpot. He speaketh not of the church of Rome absolutely.

Christopherson. By God, a child that can but fix his grammar will not deny what you do, the words are so plain.

Philpot. Swear not, Mr. Doctor, but weigh Cyprian's words with me, and I shall make you to say as I have said.

Christopherson. I am no doctor, but I perceive it is but labour lost to reason with you.

And with that the bishop of London came in bearing again, and said, What, is my lord of Chichester gone away also? (for he even a little before departed without any other word, than that he must needs be gone.) What (says Bonner) is the matter you now stand upon?

Morgan. Mr. Christopherson hath shewed Mr. Philpot a notable place of the authority of the church of Rome, and he maketh nothing of it.

Bonner. Where is the place? Let me see. By my faith here is a place alone. Come hither, sir, what say you to this? Nay, tarry a while, I will help this place with St. Paul's own testimony, in the first chapter to the Romans, where he saith, That their faith is preached throughout the world: how can you be able to answer to this?

Philpot. Yes, my lord, it is soon answered, if you will consider all the words of Cyprian; for he speaketh of such as in his time were faithful at Rome, and followed the doctrine of St. Paul; as he had taught them, and as it was notified throughout the world, by an epistle which he had written in the commendation of their faith. With such as are praised by St. Paul at Rome, for following the true faith, misbelief can have no place. And if you can shew, that the faith which the church of Rome holdeth now, is that faith which the apostle praised and allowed in the Romans in his time, then will I say what St. Cyprian then said, and with you, That infidelity can have no place there; but otherwise it maketh not absolutely for the authority of the church of Rome, as you do mistake it.

Christopherson. You understand Cyprian well indeed; I think you never read him in your life?

Philpot. Yes, Mr. Doctor, that I have, I can shew you a book noted with mine own hand: though I have not read so much as you, yet I have read somewhat. It is a shame for you to rest and wreath the doctors as you do, to maintain a false religion, which be altogether against you, if you take them aright; and indeed your false packing of doctors together hath given me and others occasion to look upon them, whereby we find you shameful liars, and mis-reporters of the ancient doctors.

Morgan. What, will you be in hand to allow doctors now? They of your sect do not so. I marvel therefore that you will allow them.

Philpot. I do allow them inasmuch as they do agree with the scriptures, and so do all they which are of the truth, howsoever you term us, and I praise God for that good understanding I have received by them.

Christopherson. What? you understand not the doctors, you may be ashamed to say it.

Philpot.

Philpot. I thank God, I understand them berter in you: for you have Excœcationem cordis, The blindness of heart; so that you understand not truly what I read, no more than the wall here; as your taking Cyprian doth declare. And, before God, you are deceivers of the people, for all the brag you make of learning; neither have you scripture or ancient reason your side, being truly taken.

Morgan. Why, all the doctors are on our side, and and you altogether.

Phipps. Yea, so you say' when you are in your puls alone, and none to answer you. But if you will me to call accounts with me thereof, I will venture th you a recantation, that I (as little fight as I have the doctors) will bring more authorities of ancient ctors on my side than you shall be able for your's, d he that can bring most, to him let the other side
d. Are you willing so to do?

Christopher. It is but folly to reason with you, you believe no man but yourself.

Philo. I will believe you or any other learned man, you can bring any thing worthy to be believed. You cannot win me with vain words from my faith. For God there is no truth in you.

Alorcan What, no truth? No truth? ha, ha, ha!

Philpot. Except the articles of the Trinity, you are true in all other things, and sound in nothing.

Morgm. What say you, do we not believe well on sacrament?

Philopat. It is the thing which (among all others) we do most abuse.

Morgan. Whercin I pray you? tell us.

Philpot. I have told you before, Mr. Doctor, in the recreation-house.

III. For there you fell down upon your knees, and to weeping, ha, ha, ha !

Philip. I did weep indeed, and so did Christ upon Jerusalem, and am not to be blamed for it, if you consider the cause of my weeping.

Morgan. What, make you yourself Christ? ha, ha,

Philip. No, fir, I make not myself Christ; but I am ashamed to do as my master and Saviour did, to weep and lament your infidelity and idolatry, which I here foresaw through tyranny you would bring again this realm, as this day doth declare.

Morgan. That is your argument.

Christopher. Wherein do we abuse the sacrament?
us.

Philpot. As I may touch but one of the least abuses, you administer it not in both kinds as you ought to do, but keep the one half from the people, contrary to Christ's institution.

Christopher. Why, is there not as much contained in one kind, as in both? And what need is it then to interfere in both kinds?

Philist. I believe not so: for if it had, Christ would have given but one kind only; for he instituted nothing superfluous: and therefore you cannot say that the whole effect of the sacrament is as well in one kind as in both, since the scripture teacheth otherwise.

Crispian. What if I can prove it by scripture, that we may administer it in one kind? The apostles did so, as it may appear in the Acts of the Apostles in one or two places, where it is written, that the apostles continued "in prayers and in breaking of bread," which is meant of the sacrament.

Pet. A. Why, Mr. Doctor, do you not know that Luke, by making mention of breaking of bread, teacheth the whole use of the sacrament according to Christ's institution, by a figure which you have learned in grammar, Synecdoche, where part is mentioned, and the whole understood to be done, as Christ commanded

Christopherson. Nay, that is not so: for I can shew you out of Eusebius, in his Ecclesiastical History, that there was a man of God, whom he named, that at the sacrament in one kind by a boy, to one that was sick.

Philpot. I have read indeed that they did use to give what was left of the communion-bread to children, to mariners, and to women, and so peradventure the boy might carry a piece of what was left to the sick man.

Christopherfon. Nay, as a sacrament it was purposely sent unto him.

Philpot. If it were so, yet you cannot precisely say, that he had not the cup administered unto him also by some sent unto him: but though one man did use it thus, doth it follow that all men may do the like? St. Cyprian noteth many abuses of the sacrament in his time, which rose upon singular men's examples, as using of water instead of wine: therefore he saith, "We must not look what any man hath done before us," but what Christ first of all did and commanded."

Christopherson. Hath not the church taught us so to use the sacrament? And how do we know that Christ is Homousios, that is, of one substance with the Father, but by the determination of the church? How can you prove that otherwise by express words of scripture, and where find you Homousios in all the scripture?

Philos. Yes, that I do in the first of the Hebrews, where it is written that Christ is the express image of God's own substance, Ejusdem substantiæ.

Christopherson. Nay, that is not so. That is, there is no more but Expressa imago substantiæ, The express image of God's substance, and image is accident.

Philpot. It is in the text, Of his substance, Substantie illius, or his own substance, as it may be right well interpreted. Besides this, that which Christ spake of himself in St. John manifesteth the same, saying, I and the Father be one thing, Ego & Pater unum sumus. And whereas you say, Imago here is an accident; the ancient fathers use this for a strong argument to prove Christ to be God, because he is the very image of God.

Christopherson. Do they? Is this a good argument, because we are the image of God, therefore we are God?

Pb. lpo. We are not called the express image of God, as it is written of Christ, and we are but the image of God by participation; and as it is written in Genesis, We are made to the likeness and similitude of God. But you ought to know, Mr. Christopherson, that there is no accident in God, and therefore Christ cannot be the image of God, but he must be of the same substance with God.

Christopherson. Tush.

Morgan. How say you to the presence of the sacrament? Will you stand here to the judgment of your book, or no? Or will you recant?

Philpot. I know you go about to catch me in words. If you can prove that book to be my setting forth, lay it to my charge when I come to judgment.

Morgan. Speak, are you of the same mind as this book is of, or no? Sure I am you were once, unless you are become another manner of man than you were.

Philpot. What I was, you know; what I am, I will not tell you now: but this I will say to you by the way, that if you can prove the sacrament of the mass (as you now use it) to be a sacrament, I will then grant you a presence; but first you must prove the same a sacrament, and afterward treat of the presence.

Morgan. Ho, do you doubt that it is a sacrament?

Philpot. I am past doubting, for I believe you can never be able to prove it a sacrament.

Christopherfon. Yea, do you? Good Lord, doth not St. Augustine call it the sacrament of the altar? How say you to that?

Philpot. That maketh nothing for the probation of your sacrament. For so he with other ancient writers do call the holy communion or supper of the Lord, in respect that it is the sacrament of the sacrifice which Christ offered upon the altar of the cross, which sacrifice all the altars and sacrifices done upon the altars in the old law did prefigure and shadow, which pertaineth nothing to your sacrament hanging upon your altars of lime and stone.

Christopherson:

Christopherfon. Doth it not? I pray you, what signifieth Altar?

Philpot. Not as you falsely take it, materially, but for the sacrifice of the altar of the cross.

Christopherfon. Where find you it ever so taken?

Philpot. Yes, that I do in St. Paul to the Hebrews, the thirteenth chapter, where he saith, "We have an altar, of which it is not lawful for them to eat that serve the tabernacle." Is not altar in this place taken for the sacrifice of the altar, and not for the altar of lime and stone?

Christopherfon. Well, God blefs me out of your company. You are such an obstinate heretic, as I have not heard the like.

Philpot. I pray God keep me from such blind doctors, who when they are not able to prove what they say, then fall to reviling (as you do now) for lack of better proof. In the mean while the bishop of London was talking with some other hard by, and at length came in to supply his part, and said:

Bonner. I pray you, matters, hearken to what I shall say to this man. Come hither, Mr. Green: and now, fir, (pointing to me) you cannot think it sufficient to be wicked yourself, but must go about to procure this young gentleman by your letters to do the like.

Philpot. My lord, he cannot say that I ever hitherto wrote unto him concerning any such matter, as he here can testify.

Green. No, you never wrote unto me.

Bonner. Why, is not this your letter which you did write concerning him?

Philpot. I have shewed your lordship my mind concerning that letter already: it was not written to Mr. Green, neither was he privy to the writing thereof.

Bonner. How say you then, if a man be in an error, and you know thereof, what are you bound to do in such a case?

Philpot. I am bound to do the best I can to bring him out of it.

Bonner. If Mr. Green here be in the like, are you not bound to reform him thereof if you can?

Philpot. Yes, that I am, and will do the uttermost of my power therein.

But the bishop remembering himself, thinking that he would but shrewdly after his expectation be holpen at my mouth, but rather confirmed in that which he called an error, ceased to go any further in his demand, and called Mr. Green aside, and before his register read him a letter, I know not the contents thereof: and therewithal he gave Mr. Green the book of my disputation in the convocation-house, and afterwards went aside, communing with Mr. Christopherfon, leaving Mr. Morgan, Mr. Harpsfield, and Mr. Cofins, to reason with me in the hearing of Mr. Green.

Morgan. Mr. Philpot, I would ask you how old your religion is?

Philpot. It is older than your's by a thousand years and more.

Morgan. I pray you, where was it fifty years ago?

Philpot. It was in Germany apparent by the testimony of Huss, Jerome of Prague, and Wickliffe, whom your generation an hundred years ago and more did burn for preaching the truth unto you; and before their time and since hath been, although under persecution it hath been put to silence.

Morgan. That is a marvellous strange religion, which no man can tell certainly where to find it.

Philpot. It ought to be no marvel unto you to see God's truth through violence oppressed; for so it hath been from the beginning from time to time, as it appeareth by history, and as Christ's true religion is now to be found here in England, although hypocrisy hath by violence the upper hand. And in the Revelations you may see it prophesied, that the true church should be driven into corners, and into the wilderness, and suffer great persecutions.

Morgan. Ah, are you versed in the Revelations? there are many strange things therein.

Philpot. If I tell you the truth which you are not able to refute, believe it, and dally not out so earnest matters: methinks you are more like a scoffer in a plea than a reasonable doctor to instruct a man; you have sense of shame, but dance naked in a net, and see not your own nakedness.

Morgan. I pray you, be not so quick with me, let us talk a little more calmly together.

Philpot. I will talk with you as mildly as you can desire, if you will speak learnedly and charitably. But if you go about with taunts to delude the truth, I will not hide it from you.

Morgan. Why will not you submit your judgment to the learned men of this realm?

Philpot. Because I see they can bring no good ground whereupon I may with a good conscience let my faith, more surely than on that which I am now grounded upon by God's manifest word.

Morgan. Can they not? It is marvellous that so many learned men should be deceived.

Philpot. It is not marvellous to St. Paul, for he saith, "That not many wise, neither many learned after the world be called to the knowledge of the gospel."

Morgan. Have you then alone the Spirit of God and not we?

Philpot. I say not that I alone have the Spirit of God, but as many as abide in the true faith of Christ have the Spirit of God as well as I.

Morgan. How know you that you have the Spirit of God?

Philpot. By the faith of Christ which is in me.

Morgan. Ah, by faith do you so? I think it is the spirit of the buttery, which your fellows have had that have been burned before you, who were drunk the night before they went to their death, and I believe were drunken unto it.

Philpot. It appeareth by your communication, that you are better acquainted with the spirit of the buttery than with the Spirit of God; wherefore I must now tell thee, thou painted wall and hypocrite, in the name of the living Lord, whose truth I have told thee, that God shall rain fire and brimstone upon such scorers of his word and blasphemers of his people as thou art.

Morgan. What, you rage now.

Philpot. Thy foolish blasphemies have compelled the Spirit of God, which is in me, to speak that which I said to thee, thou enemy of all righteousness.

Morgan. Why do you judge me so?

Philpot. By thine own wicked words I judge of thee, thou blind and blasphemous doctor; for as it is written, "By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." I have spoke on God's behalf, and now I have done with thee.

Morgan. Why then I tell thee, Philpot, thou art a heretic, and shalt be burned for thine heresy, and afterwards go to hell-fire.

Philpot. I tell thee, thou hypocrite, that I mind not thy threats of fire and faggots, neither, I thank God my Lord, stand in fear of the same: my faith in Christ shall overcome them. But the hell-fire with which thou threatenest me, is thy portion, and is prepared for thee, (unless thou speedily repent) and for such hypocrites as thou art.

Morgan. What, thou speakest upon wine, thou hast tumbled well to-day by appearance.

Philpot. So said the cursed generation to the apostles, being replenished with the Holy Ghost, and speaking the wondrous works of God; they said they were drunk, when they had nothing else to say, as thou dost now.

Morgan. Why, I am of opinion I am able to answer thee.

Philpot. So it seemeth, with blasphemies and lies.

Morgan. Nay, even with learning, say what thou canst.

Philpot. That appeared well at my disputation in the convocation-house, where thou didst undertake to answer those few arguments I was permitted to make, and yet were not able to answer one; but in thine answers did fumble and stammer, that the whole house was ashamed of thee: and the final conclusions of all thine answers ers didst fumble and stammer, that the whole house ashamed of thee: and the final conclusion of all answers was, that thou couldst answer me if I were in the schools at Oxford.

Morgan. What, did I so? thou beliefst me.

Philpot. I do not belie thee, the book of the report the disputation beareth record thereto, and all that the present then can tell thou sayedst so, if they list. I tell thee plain, thou art not able to answer that point of truth which speaketh in me for the defence of Christ's true religion. I am able by the might thereof to drive thee round about this gallery before me: and I would please the queen's majesty and her council to see thee and me, I would make thee for shame shrink and the door.

Morgan. Yea, would you so?

Philpot. Thou hast the spirit of illusion and sophistry, which is not able to countervail the spirit of truth. Thou art but an ass in the true understanding of things pertaining unto God. I call thee ass, not in respect of malice, but in that thou kickest against the truth, and art void of all godly understanding, not able to answer to that thou braggest in.

Morgan. Why, have I not answered thee in all things thou hast said unto me? I take them to record.

Philpot. Ask my fellow whether I be a thief.

Cosins. Hark, he maketh us all thieves.

Philpot. You know that phrase of the proverb, that he will hold with like. And I am sure you will not disagree with me against him, speak I ever so true; and in this sense I speak it. The strongest answer that he hath made against me is, that you will burn me.

Morgan. Why, we do not burn you, it is the temporal men that burn you, and not we.

Philpot. Thus you would (as Pilate did) wash your hands of all your wicked doings. But, I pray you, call upon the secular power to be executioners of your unrighteous judgments. And have you not a title in your law, To burn heretics?

Harpesfield. I have heard you both a good while reason together, and I never heard so stout an heretic as you are, Mr. Philpot.

Cosins. Nor I, in all my life.

Philpot. You are not able to prove me an heretic, by the word of God's word.

Harpesfield. You have the spirit of arrogancy, I will reason with you no more. And so he was departing, and Mr. Cosins also. And with that the bishop and Christopherson came in again, and said:

Bonner. Mr. Doctor, how doth this man and you agree?

Morgan. My lord, I do ask him where his church was fifty years ago.

Bonner. Are you not half agreed? as one man said once to two parties, in whom the one was equally disagreeing from the other.

Christopherson. My lord, it is but folly to reason with him any further, your lordship will but lose time, for he is incurable.

Bonner. Well, then let his keeper have him away. And with that Dr. Chedsey led me a way by which we could not pass, and therefore came back again through the bishop's chamber, where all these doctors were clustered together; and as I was passing by, the bishop took me by the gown, and said, Know you what Mr. Christopherson telleth me? I pray you, Mr. Christopherson, rehearse the sentence in Latin; and so he did; the contents whereof were, That an heretic would not be won.

Christopherson. St. Paul saith, "Fly an heretic after once or twice warning."

All the Doctors. Yea, my lord, it is best you so do, and trouble your lordship no more with him.

Philpot. You must first prove me justly to be an heretic, before you use the judgment of St. Paul against me: for he speaketh of such as hold opinion against the manifest word, which you cannot prove by me: and because you want in your proof, and be able to prove nothing against me, therefore you go about falsely to suppose me to be an heretic, for the safeguard of your counterfeit honesty; but before God you are the heretics which so stoutly and stubbornly maintain so many things directly against God's word, as God in his time will reveal. As I went out of his chamber, the bishop called me aside, and said:

Bonner. I pray thee in good sadness, what didst thou mean by writing in the beginning of thy bible, "The Spirit is the vicar of Christ on the earth?" I suppose you have some special meaning therein.

Philpot. My lord, I have no other meaning than as I have told you already, That Christ, since his ascension, worketh all things in us by his Spirit, and by his Spirit doth dwell in us. I pray you, my lord, let me have my bible, with other lawful books and writings which you have of mine, whereof many of them be none of mine, but lent to me by my friends.

Bonner. Your bible you shall not have, but I will perhaps let you have another, and after I have perused the rest you shall have such as I think good.

Philpot. I pray your lordship then, that you would let me have candle-light.

Bonner. To what purpose, pray?

Philpot. The nights be long, and I would fain occupy myself about somewhat, and not spend my time idly.

Bonner. Then you may pray.

Philpot. I cannot well say my prayers without light.

Bonner. Can you not say your Pater-noster without a candle? I tell you, you shall have some meat and drink of me, but candles you shall have none.

Philpot. I had rather have candles than your meat and drink; but seeing I shall not have my request, the Lord shall be my light.

Bonner. Have him down.

Chedsey. I will bring him to his keeper, my lord. Mr. Philpot, I wonder all these learned men whom you have talked withal this day can nothing at all persuade you.

Philpot. Why, Mr. Doctor, would you have me to be persuaded with nothing? or would you have me build my faith upon sand? What do you all bring, whereby I ought by any sufficient authority to be persuaded by you?

Chedsey. I am sorry you will so wilfully cast yourself away, whereas you might live worshipfully: do you not think that others have souls to be saved as well as you?

Philpot. Every man shall receive according to his own doings. Sure I am that you are deceived, and maintain a false religion; and as for my casting away, I with my burning day was to-morrow, for this delay is every day to die, and yet not be dead.

Chedsey. You are not like to die yet, I can tell you.

Philpot. I am the more sorry thereof. But the will of God be done of me to his glory, Amen.

The TWELFTH EXAMINATION of Mr. JOHN PHILPOT, on Wednesday, December 4, before the BISHOPS of LONDON, WORCESTER, and BANGOR.

IN the morning I was brought down to the wardrobe adjoining to the chapel, and within a while after came three of the bishop's chaplains unto me, saying:

Chaplains. Mr. Philpot, my lord hath sent us unto you, to desire you to come to mass, certifying you, that there is a doctor of divinity, a chaplain of my lord's, called Dr. Chedsey, going to mass: therefore we also pray you, good Mr. Philpot, be content to come, it is hard-by.

Philpot. I wonder my lord would trouble you in sending you about this matter, seeing he knoweth I am a man (by your law) that cannot hear mass, because I stand excommunicate.

Chaplains. Your excommunication is but upon a contumacy, and my lord will dispense with you if you will come.

Philpot. My lord cannot, for he is not mine ordinary, nary, and I will not seek any such thing at his hands. With this answer they went away.

After mass, the bishop called me before him into his chapel, and there in the presence of his register, (after he had said his mind because I would not come to mass) recited the articles, which he oftentimes before had done in that behalf, with the depositions of the witnesses, of whom some were not examined.

Bonner. Sir, what can you now say why I should not now proceed to give sentence against thee as an heretic?

Philpot. Why, my lord, will you proceed to give sentence before your witnesses be examined? that is plain against your own law, as all your doings have been hitherto.

Bonner. See what a fool thou art in the law. I need not to recite the depositions of the witnesses, but if I list: for I know them well enough already.

Philpot. It appeareth indeed you may do what you list.

Bonner. Tell me, I say, whether thou wilt answer, or no: and whether if thou wert absolved of thine excommunication, thou wouldst come to mass, or no?

Philpot. I have answered as much as I intended to do, until I be called to lawful judgment; and as concerning my conscience, I will not make you God to sit there as yet; it is God's part only to be searcher of my heart.

Bonner. Look how foolishly he speaks. Art thou God? and yet dost thou not sit in thine own conscience?

Philpot. I sit not in my own conscience, but I know it; and God there only ought to sit, and none else.

Bonner. Thou art a naughty fellow, and hast done much hurt, and hast seduced other poor fellows here in prison with thee, by thy comforting of them in their errors, and hast made them rejoice and sing with thee.

Philpot. Yea, my lord, we shall sing, when you, and such others as you are, shall cry, Woe, woe, except you repent.

Bonner. What an arrogant fool is this! I will handle thee like an heretic, and that shortly.

Philpot. I fear nothing, I thank God, you can do unto me. But God shall destroy such as thou art, and that shortly, as I trust.

Bonner. Have him away, this is a knave indeed.

And I was had into the wardrobe again by my keeper, and within an hour after was sent for to come before him and the bishops of Worcester and Bangor.

Bonner. Sir, I have talked with you many times, and have caused you to be talked with by many learned men, yea and honourable, both temporal and spiritual, and it availeth nothing with you. I am blamed that I have brought thee before so many; for they say thou gloriest to have many to talk withal. Well, now it lieth upon thee to look to thyself, for thy time draweth near to an end, if thou do not become conformable. And at present we are sent from the synod to offer you this grace, that if you will come to the unity of the church of Rome with us, and acknowledge the real presence of Christ in the sacrament of the altar with us, all that is past shall be forgiven, and you received to favour.

Worcester. Mr. Philpot, we are sent (as you have heard by my lord of London) from the synod to offer you mercy, if you will receive it, and of the good will I bear you I wish you to take it whilst it is offered, and be not a singular man against a whole multitude of learned men, which now in fasting and prayer, are gathered together to devise to do you good. Many very learned men have talked with you, why should you think yourself better learned than them all? Be not of such arrogancy, but have humility, and remember there is no salvation but in the church.

Bangor. Methinks my lord hath spoke wonderfully well unto you, that you should not think yourself so well learned, but other men are as well learned as you; neither of so good wit, but others be as wise as you; neither of so good memory, but others have as good memories as you. Therefore mistrust your own judgment, and come home to us again. I never liked your religion, because it was set forth by violence and tyranny, and that is no true token of true religion. And I was the same manner of man then that I am now, and a great many more. Marry, for fear we held our peace, and bore with that time. Wherefore, Mr. Philpot, I will say you well, for I love you; and therefore be content to come home with us again into the catholic church of Rome.

Philpot. Where, my lord, (as I may begin first to answer you) you say, that religion is to be disliked which is set forth by tyranny, I pray God you give not occasion to think the same by your's at this day, which has no other argument to stand but by violence. If you can shew me any good sufficient ground whereby to ground my conscience, that the church of Rome is the true catholic church, whereunto you call me, I will gladly be of the same; otherwise I cannot so soon change the religion I have learned these many years.

Bangor. Where was your religion to be found (I pray you) an hundred years ago, that any man knew of it?

Philpot. It was in Germany, and in divers other places apparent.

Worcester. Jesus! will you be still so singular a man? What is Germany to the whole world?

Bonner. My lords, I pray you give me leave to tell you, that I sent for him to hear mass this morning. And think you what excuse he made unto me, forsooth that he was accursed, alledging his own shame. He placeth as the varlet Latimer did at Cambridge, when the vice-chancellor sent for him (who intended to have excommunicated him for his heresies), and the chancellor was coming to his chamber, he hearing thereof, made answer that he was sick of the plague, and rebuked the chancellor; even so this man saith, he was accursed, because he will not come to mass.

Worcester. My lord (I am sure) here doth behave himself like a father unto you; therefore be admonished by him, and by us, that come now friendly unto you, and follow your fathers before you.

Philpot. It is forbidden us of God by the prophet Ezekiel, to follow our fathers, or to walk in their commandments.

Worcester. It is written also in another place, Ask of your fathers.

Philpot. We ought to ask indeed our fathers that have more experience and knowledge than we of God's will, but no more to allow them, than we perceive they agree with the scripture.

Worcester. You will be a contentious man, I see well; and St. Paul saith, that neither we, nor the church of God have any such custom.

Philpot. I am not contentious but for the verity of my faith, in which I ought to contend with all such as do impugn the same without any just objection.

Worcester. Let us rise, my lord, for I see we shall do no good.

Bonner. Nay, I pray you, tarry and hear the articles I lay to his charge. And after he had recited them, they arose, and stood to reason with me a while.

Worcester. Mr. Philpot, I am very sorry that you will be so singular. I never talked with any yet in my diocese, but after once communication had with me, they have been contented to revoke their errors, and to teach the people how they were deceived, and to do much good, as you may like. For as I understand you were archdeacon of Winchester, (which is the eye of the bishop) and you may do much good in that country if you would forsake your errors, and come to the catholic church.

Philpot. Wherewithal you so soon persuaded them to your will, I see not. Error, that I know, I hold none; and of the catholic church I am sure I am.

Worcester. The catholic church doth acknowledge a real presence of Christ in the sacrament, and so will not you.

Philpot. That is not so: for I acknowledge a very essential presence in the duly using of the sacrament.

Wright. What, a real presence?

Philpot. Yea, a real presence by the Spirit of God in the right administration.

Wright. That is well said: and do you agree with the catholic church also?

Philpot. I do agree with the true catholic church.

Wright. My lord of London, this man speaketh reasonably now.

Burr. You do agree in generals, but when it shall come to particulars, you will far disagree.

Wright. Well, keep yourself here, and you shall see other learned bishops to commune further with me, as my lord of Durham, and my lord of Chichester, whom I hear say you do like well.

Philpot. I do like them as I do all others that speak truth. I have once already spoken with them, and found no fault with me.

Wright. In the mean season pray to God for me.

Philpot. Prayer is the most comfortable exercise I am in my trouble, and my conscience is quiet, and I have the peace of mind, which cannot be the fruits of self.

Wright. We bid you farewell for this time.

After dinner they called for me again, and demanded me whether I meant as I spake before dinner, and I did not go from it. To whom I answered, that I would not go from what I had said.

Wright. You said at my departing from you before dinner, that if we did burn you, we should burn a catholic man: will you be a catholic man, and stand to the catholic church?

Philpot. I will stand to the true catholic church.

Wright. Will you stand to the catholic church of Rome?

Philpot. If you can prove the same to be the catholic church, I will be one thereof.

Wright. Did not Christ say unto Peter, and to all successors of Rome, "Feed my sheep, feed my flock?" Which doth signify that he gave him more authority than the rest.

Philpot. That saying pertaineth nothing to the authority of Peter, above others, but declareth what he requireth of his beloved apostles, that they should with all diligence preach to the flock of Christ the way of salvation, and that doth the iteration of feeding, spoken to Peter, only signify. But the bishop of Rome doth regardeth the spiritual feeding, and therefore he hath imagined an easier way to make himself lord of the whole world, yea, and of God's word too, and doth feed Christ's flock as Peter did.

Wright. How can you tell that?

Philpot. Yes, I have been there, and I could not find of all his countrymen that ever he preacheth.

Wright. Though he preacheth not one way, he teacheth another, by procuring good order for the flock to be kept in.

Philpot. I am sure that it will be his damnation before God, that he leaveth what he is commanded by Christ, and setteth forth his own decrees to deface the gospel.

Wright. It is the evil living that you have seen at Rome, that causeth you to have this ill judgment of the bishop of Rome. I cannot now tarry with you to reason further of the matter.

How say you to the real presence of the sacrament, if you stand to that?

Philpot. I do acknowledge (as I have said) a real presence of the sacrament, in the due administration thereof, to the worthy receivers by the Spirit of God.

Wright. You add now a great many more words than you did before: and yet you say more of the sacrament, than a great many will do.

Thus they departed, and after them came unto me, Chedsey, and Dr. Wright, archdeacon of Oxford, and a great many more.

Chedsey. Mr. Philpot, here is Mr. Archdeacon of London come to give you good counsel, I pray hear Philpot. I will refuse to hear none that will counsel me any good; and if any can bring me better matter than I have, I will stick thereunto.

Wright. I would wish you, Mr. Philpot, to agree with the catholic church, and not to stand in your own conceit: you see a great many learned men against you.

Philpot. I am, Mr. Doctor, of the unfeigned catholic church, and will live and die therein: and if you can prove your church to be the true catholic church, I will be one of the same.

Wright. I came not to dispute with you, but to exhort you. Here are better learned than I, who can inform you better.

Chedsey. What proof would you have? I will prove unto you our church to have its being and foundation by the scriptures, by the apostles, and by the primitive church, confirmed by the blood of martyrs, and with the testimony of all confessors.

Philpot. Give me your hand, Mr. Doctor, prove that, and have with you.

Chedsey. If I had my books here, I could soon prove it, I will go fetch some; and with that he went, and brought his book of annotations, saying, I cannot well bring my books, therefore I have brought my book of annotations, and turned there to a common place of the sacrament, asking me whether the catholic church did allow the presence of Christ's body in the sacrament, or no? I hear say you do confess a real presence: but I'll be hanged if you will abide by it: you will deny it by and by.

Philpot. What I have said I cannot deny, neither intend, whatsoever you say.

Chedsey. If there be a real presence in the sacrament, then evil men receive Christ, which thing you will not grant, I am sure.

Philpot. I deny the argument, for I do not grant in the sacrament, by transubstantiation, any real presence, as you falsely imagine, but in the due administration to the worthy receivers.

Chedsey. I will prove that the evil and wicked men eat the body of Christ, as well as the good men; by St. Augustine here.

Philpot. And in the beginning of his text St. Augustine seemeth to approve his assertion; but I bad him read out to the end, and there St. Austin declareth most evidently that it was Quodammodo, after a certain manner the evil men received the body of Christ, which is sacramentally, only in the outward sign, and not really; or indeed as the good doth. And thus all the doctors that you seem to bring in for your purpose, be quite against you if you did rightly weigh them.

Chedsey. By God you are a subtle fellow. See how he would writhe St. Augustine's words.

Philpot. See which of us do writhe St. Augustine most, you or I, who take his meaning by his own express words. And seeing you charge me with subtlety, what subtlety is this of you, to say, that you will prove your matter of the church, even from the beginning, promising to shew your books therein, and when it cometh to the proof, you are able to shew none, and for want thereof slip into a by-matter, and you faint in the proof thereof? Before God you are ridiculous and without shame in your religion.

Chedsey. You shall be constrained to come to us at length, whether you will or no.

Philpot. Hold that argument fast; for it is the best you have, for you have nothing but violence.

The THIRTEENTH EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT, before the Archbishop of YORK, and other Bishops.

THE Thursday after, I was called in the morning before the archbishop of York, the bishop of Chichester, the bishop of Bath, and the bishop of London. The bishop of Chichester being first come, began to talk with me.

Chichester. I am come of good will to talk with you, to instruct you what I can, to come to the catholic church, and to exhort you to instruct your own judgment, and to learn first to have humility, and by the same to learn learn first to have humility, and by the same to learn of others that be better learned than you, as they did learn of such as were their betters before them.

Philpot. We must be taught of God, and I will with all humility learn of them that will inform me by God's word, what I have to do. I confess I have but little learning in respect of you, that both of your years and great exercise do excel therein: but faith consisteth not in learning, but in the simplicity which God's word teacheth. Therefore I shall be glad to hear both of your lordship, and of any other, (that God hath revealed unto by his word) the true doctrine thereof, and to thank you that it doth please you to take pains herein.

Chichester. You take the first alledged amiss, as though all men should be taught by inspiration, and not by learning. How do we believe the gospel, but by the authority of the church, and because the same hath allowed it?

Philpot. St. Paul saith, "He learned not the gospel by men, neither of men, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ." Which is a plain and sufficient proof that the gospel taketh not it's authority of man, but of God only.

Chichester. St. Paul speaketh but of his own knowledge how he came thereto.

Philpot. Nay, he speaketh of the gospel generally, "which cometh not from man, but from God;" and that the church must only teach that which cometh from God, and not man's precepts.

Chichester. Doth not St. Augustine say these words, "I would not believe the gospel, if the authority of the church did not move me thereto."

Philpot. I grant the authority of the church doth move the unbelievers to believe; but yet the church doth not give the word it's authority; for the word hath it's authority only from God, and not of men; men be but disposers thereof. For first, the word had it's being before the church, and the word is the foundation of the church, and first is the foundation sure, before the building thereon can be steadfast.

Chichester. I perceive you mistake me, I speak of the knowledge of the gospel, and not of the authority; for by the church we have all knowledge of the gospel.

Philpot. I confess that; for faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. And I acknowledge that God appointeth an ordinary means for men to come unto the knowledge now, and not miraculously, as he hath done in times past; yet we that be taught by men, must take heed that we learn nothing else but that which was taught in the primitive church by revelation. Here came in the bishops of York and Bath; and after they had saluted one another, and communed a while together, the archbishop of York called me unto them, saying,

York. Sir, we hearing that you are out of the way, are come of charity to inform you, and to bring you into the true faith, and to the catholic church again; willing you first to have humility, and to be humble and willing to learn of your betters, for else we can do no good with you. And God saith by his prophet, "On whom shall I rest but on the humble and meek, and such as tremble at my word?" Now if you be so, we shall be glad to travel with you.

Philpot. I know that humility is the door whereby we enter unto Christ; and I thank his goodness I have entered in at the same unto him, and with all humility will hear whatsoever truth you shall speak unto me.

York. What be the matters you stand on, and require to be satisfied in?

Philpot. My lord, if it shall please your grace, we were entered into a good matter before you came, of the church, and how we should know the truth but by the church.

York. Indeed that is the head we ought to begin at, for the church being truly known, we shall sooner agree in particular things.

Philpot. If your lordships can prove the church of Rome to be the true catholic church, it will do much to persuade me towards what you would have me incline unto.

York. Why, let us go to the definition of the church. What is it?

Philpot. It is a congregation of people dispersed throughout the world, agreeing together in the word of God, using the sacraments, and all other things according to the same.

York. Your definition is of many words to no purpose.

Philpot. I do not precisely define the church, but declare unto you what I think the church is.

York. Is the church visible or invisible?

Philpot. It is both visible and invisible. The invisible church is of the elect of God only; the visible church consists both of good and bad, using all things in faith according to God's word.

York. The church is an universal congregation of faithful people in Christ throughout the world; where this word catholic doth well express; for what is catholic else? doth it not signify universal?

Philpot. The church is defined by St. Augustine to be called catholic in this wise, "The church is called therefore catholic, because it is truly perfect, and hath in nothing."

York. Nay, it is called catholic, because it is universally received of all christian nations, for the most part.

Philpot. The church was catholic in the apostle time, yet was it not universally received of the world; but because their doctrine which they had received of Christ was perfect, and appointed to be preached throughout the whole world, therefore it is called catholic faith, and all persons receiving the same, may be counted the catholic church. And St. Augustine in another place writeth, that the catholic church is that which believeth aright.

York. If you will learn, I will shew you St. Augustine, writing against the Donatists, that he proveth the catholic church by two principal points, which is, universality and succession of bishops, in one apostolic see, from time to time. Now thus I will make mine argument.

The church of Rome is universal, and hath her succession of bishops from time to time.

Therefore, it is the catholic church.

How answer you to this argument?

Philpot. I deny the antecedent, that the catholic church is only known by universality and succession of bishops.

York. I will prove it, and with that he brought forth a book, which he had noted out of the doctors and turned to his common places therein of the church and recited one or two out of St. Augustine, especially out of his epistle written against the Donatists, where St. Augustine manifestly proveth, that the Donatists were not the catholic church, because they have no succession of bishops in their opinion, neither universality; and the same force hath St. Augustine's argument against you.

Philpot. My lord, I have weighed the force of the argument before now, and I perceive it maketh nothing against me, neither cometh it to your purpose; for I will stand to the trial of St. Augustine for the approbation of the catholic church whereof I am. For St. Augustine speaketh of universality joined with unity and of faithful successors of Peter before corruption came into the church. And so if you can deduce your argument for the see of Rome now, as St. Augustine might do in his time, I would say it might be of force, otherwise not.

York. St. Augustine proveth the catholic church principally by succession of bishops, and therefore you understand not St. Augustine. For what, I pray you, was the opinion of the Donatists, against whom he wrote, can you tell? what country were they of?

Philpot. They were a certain sect of men, affirming among other heresies, that the dignity of the sacraments depended upon the worthiness of the minister; so that if the minister was good, the sacraments which he ministered were available, or else not.

Chichester. That was their error, and they had no other but that. And he read another authority of St. Austin, out of a book which he brought, even to the same use that the other was.

Philpot. I challenge St. Austin to be with me thoroughly in this point, and will stand to judgment, taking place with another.

Chichester. If you will not have the church to be as I pray you by whom will you be judged in matters of controversy?

Philpot. I do not deny the church to be certain; but that it is necessarily tied to any place, longer than it is in the word; and for all controversies the word is to be judge.

Chichester. But what if I take it one way, and you another, how then?

Philpot. St. Austin sheweth a remedy for that, and saith, "That one place of the scripture ought to be understood by the majority."

York. How answer you to this argument?

Philpot. Rome hath known succession of bishops, which your church hath not.

Chichester. Therefore, that is the catholic church, and your's is not, because there is no such succession can be proved in your church.

Philpot. I deny, my lord, that succession of bishops is an infallible point to know the church by: for there may be a succession of bishops known in a place, and yet there be no church, as at Antioch and Jerusalem, and in other places where the apostles abode as well as at Rome. But if you put to the succession of bishops, succession of doctrine withal, as St. Austin doth, I will take it to be a good proof for the catholic church; but if succession only is nothing available.

York. You will have no church then, I see well.

Philpot. Yes, my lord, I acknowledge the catholic church, as I am bound by my creed; but I cannot acknowledge a false church for the true.

Chichester. Why, are there two catholic churches?

Philpot. No, I know there is but one catholic church, and there have been, and be at this present, that take upon them the name of Christ and of his church, which be so indeed, as it is written, "There be they that call themselves apostles, and be not so indeed, but the synagogues of Satan and liars." And now it is with us as it was with the two women in Solomon's time, which lay their children, and the one overlaid her child, and afterwards came about to challenge the true mother's child.

Chichester. What a babbling is here with you now? You lack humility. You will go about to teach, and not to learn.

Philpot. My lords, I must desire you to bear with my hasty speech, it is my infirmity of nature. All that I speak is to learn by, I wish you did understand my mind, that I might be satisfied by you through your authority.

Chichester. My lord, if it please your grace, turn your argument upon him which you have made, and let him shew the succession of the bishops of his church, as he can do. How say you, can you shew the succession of bishops in your church from time to time? Will you this argument troubled Dr. Ridley so fore, that he could never answer it; yet he was a man well learned? I dare say you will say so.

Philpot. He was a man so learned, that I was not worthy to carry his books for learning.

Chichester. I promise you he was never able to answer that. He was a man that I loved well, and he me; he came unto me divers times being in prison, and conferred with me.

Philpot. I wonder, my lord, you should make this argument, which you would turn upon me, for the sake of my church whereof I am, or that you would make bishop Ridley so ignorant that he was not able to answer it, since it is of no force. For behold, first you denied you that a local succession of bishops in any place is a necessary point alone to prove the catholic church by, and that which I have denied you cannot prove: and is it then reason that you should put me to the trial of that, which by you is unproved, and of no force to conclude against me?

Chichester. I see, my lords, we do but lose our labours to reason with him; he thinketh himself better learned than we.

Philpot. I take upon me the name of no learning. I boast of no knowledge but of faith and of Christ, and that I am bound undoubtedly to know, as I am sure I do.

Chichester. These heretics take upon them to be sure of all things they stand in. You should say rather with humility, I trust I know Christ, than that you be sure thereof.

Philpot. Let him doubt of his faith that listeth; God giveth me grace always to believe that I am sure of true faith and favour in Christ.

Bath. How will you be able to answer heretics, but by determination of the known catholic church?

Philpot. I am able to answer all heretics by the word of God, and convince them of the same.

Chichester. How arrogantly is that spoken! I dare not say so.

Philpot. My lords, I pray you bear with me; for I am bold on truth's side, and I speak somewhat by experience that I have had with heretics; and I know the Arians be the subtlest that ever were, and yet I have manifest scriptures to beat them down withal.

Chichester. I perceive now you are the same manner of man I have heard of, that will not be satisfied with learning.

Philpot. Alas, my lord, why do you say so? I do most humbly desire to be taught, if there be any better way that I should learn, and hitherto you have shewed me no better, therefore I pray your lordship not to mis-judge without a cause.

Bath. If you be of the true catholic church, then will you hold with the real presence of Christ in the sacrament, which the true church hath ever maintained.

Philpot. And I, my lord, with the true church, do hold the same in the due administration of the sacrament; but I desire you, my lord, there may be made a better conclusion in our first matter, before we enter into any other; for if the church be proved, we shall soon agree in the rest. In the mean while my lord of York was turning his book for more places to help his cause.

York. I have found at length a very notable place, which I have looked for all this while, of St. Austin, De simplicitate credendi.

Chichester. It is but folly, my lord, for your grace to read any more places to him, for he esteemeth them not.

Philpot. I esteem them, inasmuch as they be of force, as your lordship doth hear me deny no doctors you bring, but only require the true application of them, according to the writer's meaning, and as by his own words may be proved.

York. I will read him the place, and so make an end. After he had read the sentence, he said, that by four special points St. Augustine here proveth the catholic church. The first is by consent of all nations; the second, by the apostolic see; the third, by universality; and the fourth, by this word catholic.

Chichester. That is a notable place indeed, if it please your grace.

Philpot. I pray you, my lord, of what church doth St. Augustine write the same, of Rome, or not?

York. Yea, he writeth of the church of Rome.

Philpot. I will lay your lordship as much as I have, that it is not so; and let the book be seen.

Bath. What art thou able to lay? Thou hast nothing.

York. Doth he not make mention here of the apostolic see, whereby he meaneth Rome?

Philpot. That is very straightly interpreted, my lord, as though the apostolic see had been no where else but at Rome. But let it be at Rome, and yet you shall never verify the same, unless all the other conditions do go therewith, as St. Augustine doth proceed withal, whereof none, except the apostolic see, can now be verified of the church of Rome. For the faith which that see now maintaineth hath not the consent of all nations, neither hath had. Besides that, it cannot have the name of catholic, because it differeth from the catholic churches which the apostles planted, almost in all things.

York. Nay, he goeth about here to prove the catholic church by universality; and how can you shew your church to be universal fifty or an hundred years ago?

Philpot. That is not material, neither any thing against St. Augustine: for my church (whereof I am) were to be accounted universal, though it were but in ten persons, because it agreeth with the same that the apostles did universally plant.

York. I perceive you are an obstinate man in your own opinion, and will not be taught; wherefore it is but lost labour to talk with you any longer; you are a member to be cut off.

Chichester. I have heard of you before, how you troubled the good bishop of Winchester, and now I see in you what I have heard.

Philpot. I trust you see no evil in me by this; I desire of you a sure ground to build my faith on, and if you shew me none, I pray you speak not ill of him that meaneth well.

Chichester. Thou art as impudent a fellow as any I have talked with.

Philpot. That is spoken uncharitably, my lord, to blaspheme him whom you cannot justly reprove.

Chichester. Why, thou art not God: blasphemy is counted a rebuke to God-ward, and not to man.

Philpot. Yes, it may be as well verified of an infamy laid to man, speaking in God's cause, as you now do lay unto me, for speaking freely the truth before God, to maintain your vain religion. You are void of all good ground. I perceive you are blind guides, and leaders of the blind: and therefore (as I am bound to tell you) very hypocrites, tyrannously persecuting the truth, which otherwise by just order you are by no means able to convince. Your own doctors and testimonies which you bring, be evidently against you, and yet you will not see the truth.

Chichester. Have we these thanks for our good will, in coming to instruct thee?

Philpot. My lords, you must bear with me, since I speak in Christ's cause; and because his glory is defaced, and his people cruelly and wrongfully slain by you, because they will not consent to the dishonour of God, and to hypocrisy with you; if I told you not your fault, it would be required at my hands in the day of judgment. Therefore know you, ye hypocrites indeed, that it is the Spirit of God that telleth you your sin, and not I; I thank God, I value not all your cruelty. God forgive you, and give you grace to repent. And so they departed.

Another CONFERENCE the same Day.

THE same day at night, before supper, the bishop sent for me into his chapel, in the presence of archdeacon Harpsfield, Dr. Chedsey, and his other chaplains and servants. And then he said:

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, I have by sundry means gone about to do you good, and I marvel you do so little consider it. By my truth, I cannot tell what to say to you: tell me directly whether you will be a conformable man, or no; and whereupon you chiefly stand.

Philpot. I have told your lordship oftentimes plain enough, whereon I chiefly stand, requiring a sure probation of the church whereunto you call me.

Harpsfield. St. Augustine, writing against the Donatists, declareth four special marks to know the church by; the consent of many nations, the faith of the sacraments confirmed by antiquity, succession of bishops, and universality.

Bonner. I pray you, Mr. Archdeacon, fetch the book hither; it is a notable place, let him see it. And the book was brought, and the bishop read it, demanding how I could answer the same.

Philpot. My lord, I like St. Augustine's four points for the trial of the catholic church, whereof I am: for it can abide every point thereof together, which you cannot do.

Harpsfield. Have not we succession of bishops in the see and church of Rome? Wherefore then do you deny our church to be the catholic church?

Philpot. St. Augustine doth not put succession of bishops only to be sufficient, but he addeth the use of the sacraments according to antiquity, and doctrine universally taught and received by most nations from the beginning of the primitive church, which your church is far from. But my church can avouch these better than your's; therefore by St. Augustine's judgment, which you here bring, mine is the catholic church, and not your's.

Harpsfield and Chedsey. It is but folly, my lord, for you to reason with him, for he is irrecoverable.

Philpot. That is a good shift for you to run unto when you are confounded in your own sayings, and have nothing else to say; you are evidently deceived, and yet will not see it when it is laid open to your face.

Thus have I at large set forth as many of the failings of John Philpot's examinations and privy conferences as are yet come to light, being faithfully written with his own hand. And although he was examined after this several other times, both openly in the consistory at St. Paul's, and also secretly in the bishop's house; yet what was there said is not sufficiently known, either because his writings are by some kept close, and not brought forth, otherwise than as the bishop's register hath noted, whose handling of such matters, because it is (either for fear or favour of his lord and master) very slender, little light of any true meaning can be gathered, especially in the behalf of the answerer; however, such as it is, such thought I good to put forth; requiring the reader to judge hereof according to his answers in his former examinations.

The LAST EXAMINATION of Mr. PHILPOT in open JUDGMENT, with his final CONDEMNATION by BISHOP BONNER, in the CONSISTORY at St. PAUL'S.

THE bishop having sufficiently taken his pleasure with Mr. Philpot in his private talk, and seeing his zealous, learned, and immutable constancy, thought it now high time to rid his hands of him; and therefore on the thirteenth and fourteenth days of December, sitting judicially in the consistory at St. Paul's, he caused him to be brought thither before him and others, as it seemeth, more for order's sake, than for any good affection to justice and right judgment. The effect of which their two sundry proceedings, as well also of another had the eleventh day of the same month in his chapel, appeared in a manner to be all one. The bishop therefore first speaking to Mr. Philpot, said:

Bonner. Mr. Philpot, amongst other things that were laid and objected against you, these three things you were principally charged and burthened with.

The first is, That you being fallen from the unity of Christ's catholic church, do refuse and will not come to be reconciled thereunto.

The second is, That you have blasphemously spoken against the sacrifice of the mass, calling it idolatry.

And the third is, That you have spoken against the sacrament of the altar, denying the real presence of Christ's body and blood to be in the same.

And according to the will and pleasure of the synod legislative, you have been often by me invited and required to go from your said errors and heresies, and to return to the unity of the catholic church, which if you will now willingly do, you shall be mercifully and gladly received, charitably used, and have all the favour I can shew you. And now to tell you true, it is assigned and appointed me to give sentence against you, if you stand herein, and will not return. Wherefore if you so refuse, I do ask of you whether you have any cause that you can shew, why I now should not give sentence against you.

Philpot. Under protestation, not to go from my appeal that I have made, and also not to consent to your competent judge, I say, touching your first objection concerning the catholic church, I neither was nor am of the same. And as touching the sacrifice of the mass, and the sacrament of the altar, I never spoke against the same. And as concerning the pleasure of the synod, I say, that these twenty years I have been brought up in the faith of the true catholic church, which is contrary to your church, whereunto you would have me to come: and in that time I have been many times sworn both in the reign of king Henry the Eighth, and good king Edward his son, against the usurped power of the bishop of Rome, which oath I think that I am bound in my conscience to keep, because I must conform unto the Lord mine oath. But if you, or any of the synod, can by God's word persuade me that my oath was unlawful, and that I am bound by God's word to come to your church, faith, and religion, whereunto you be now, I will gladly yield, agree, and be conformable unto you, otherwise not.

Bonner then not able with all his learned doctors to accomplish this his offered condition, fell to persuading him, both by his accustomed vain promises and threatenings, to return to their church; to which he answered:

Philpot. You, and all other of your sort, are hypocrites, and I wish all the world knew your hypocrisy, your tyranny, ignorance, and idolatry.

Upon these words the bishop did for that time dismiss him, commanding that on Monday the 16th day of the next month, between the hours of one and three in the afternoon, he should again be brought thither, there to receive the definitive sentence of condemnation pronounced against him, if he remained then in his former obstinacy.

At which day and time, Mr. Philpot being there presented before the bishops of London, Bath, Worcester, and Litchfield; Bonner, bishop of London, began to speak in this manner:

Bonner. My lords, Stokesley, my predecessor, when he went to give sentence against an heretic, used to make this prayer;

Deus qui errantibus, ut in viam possint redire; justitiæ et veritatisque tux lumen ostendis, da cunctis qui christiana professione censentur, Et illa respicere quæ huic inimica sunt animi, Et ea quæ sint apta sectari per Christum Dominum nostrum, Amen. Which I will follow. And so he read it with a loud voice in Latin. To which Mr. Philpot said:

I wish you would speak in English, that all men might hear and understand you; for St. Paul willeth, that all things spoken in the congregation to edify, should be spoken in a tongue that all men might understand.

Whereupon the bishop did read it in English:

"O God, who shewest the light of thy truth and righteousness to those that stray, that they may return unto thy way, give to all who profess themselves christians, to refuse those things which are foes to thy name, and to follow those things which are fit, by Christ our Lord, Amen." And when he came to these words "To refuse those things which are foes to thy name,"

Mr. Philpot said,

Then they all must turn away from you; for you are enemies to that name (meaning Christ's name), and God save us from such hypocrites as would have things in a tongue that men cannot understand.

Bonner. Whom do you mean?

Philpot. You, and all others that be of your generation and sect. And I am sorry to see you sit in the place that you now sit in, pretending to execute justice, and to do nothing less but deceive all men in this realm. And then turning himself unto the people, he further said, O all you gentlemen, beware of these men (meaning the bishops) and all their doings, which are contrary to the primitive church. And I would know of you, my lord, by what authority you proceed against me.

Bonner. Because I am bishop of London.

Philpot. Well, then you are not my bishop, nor have I offended in your diocese: and moreover, I have appealed from you, and therefore by your own law you ought not to proceed against me, especially being brought hither from another place by violence.

Bonner. Why, who sent you hither to me?

Philpot. Dr. Story, and Dr. Cook; with other commissioners of the king and queen: and, my lord, is it not enough for you to worry your own sheep, but you must also meddle with other men's sheep?

Then the bishop delivered two books to Mr. Philpot, one of the civil, and the other of the canon law, out of which he would have proved that he had authority to proceed against him in such manner as he did. Mr. Philpot then perusing the same, and seeing the small and slender proof that was there alledged, said to the bishop:

Philpot. I perceive your law and divinity is all one; for you have knowledge in neither of them; and I wish you did know your own ignorance: but you dance in a net, and think that no man doth see you. Hereupon they had much talk, but what it was is not yet known. At last Bonner said unto him:

Philpot, as concerning your objections against my jurisdiction, you shall understand that both the civil and canon laws make against you; and as for your appeal, it is not allowed in this case: for it is written in the law, There is no appeal from a judge executing the sentence of the law.

Philpot. My lord, it appeareth by your interpretation of the law, that you have no knowledge therein, and that you do not understand the law; for if you did, you would not bring in that text.

Hereupon the bishop recited a law of the Romans, That it was not lawful for a Jew to keep a christian man in captivity, and to use him as a slave, laying then to the said Philpot's charge that he did not understand the law, but did like a Jew. Whereunto Philpot answered,

No, I am no Jew, but you, my lord, are a Jew. For you profess Christ, and maintain Antichrist; you profess the gospel, and maintain superstition, and you be able to charge me with nothing.

Bonner and another Bishop. With what can you charge us?

Philpot. You are enemies to all truth, and all your doings be naught, full of idolatry, saving the article of the Trinity.

Whilst they were thus debating the matter, there came thither sir William Garret, knight, then mayor of London, sir Martin Bowes, knight, and Thomas Leigh, then sheriff of the same city, and sat down with the said bishops in the said consistory, where bishop Bonner spake these words in effect as follows:

Bonner. Philpot, before the coming of my lord mayor, because I would not enter with you into the matter, wherewith I have heretofore, and now intend to charge you withal, until his coming, I did rehearse a prayer unto you, both in English and Latin, which bishop Stokesley, my predecessor, used when he intended to give sentence against an heretic.

And here did again read the said prayer both in English and Latin: which being ended, he spake again unto him, and said:

Bonner. Philpot, amongst others I have to charge you especially with three things:

First, Where you have fallen from the unity of Christ's catholic church, you have thereupon been invited and required, not only by me, but also by many and divers other catholic bishops, and other learned men; to return and come again to the same: and also you have been offered by me, that if you would so return and confess your errors and heresies, you should be mercifully received, and have so much favour as I could shew unto you.

The second is, That you have blasphemously spoken against the sacrifice of the mass, calling it idolatry and abomination:

And thirdly, That you have spoken and held against the sacrament of the altar, denying the real presence of Christ's body and blood to be in the same.

This being spoken, the bishop recited unto him a certain certain exhortation in English, the tenor and form whereof is this :

BISHOP BONNER'S EXHORTATION.

MR. Philpot, this is to be told you, that if you, not being reconciled to the unity of the catholic church, from whence you did fall in the time of the late schism, here in this realm of England, against the see apostolic of Rome, will now heartily and obediently be reconciled to the unity of the same catholic church, professing and promising to observe and keep, to the best of your power, the faith and christian religion observed and kept by all faithful people of the same: and moreover, if you, which heretofore, in the years of our Lord 1553, 1554, and 1555, or in one of them, have offended and trespassed grievously against the sacrifice of the mass, calling it idolatry and abominable: and likewise have offended and trespassed against the sacrament of the altar, denying the real presence of Christ's body and blood to be there in the sacrament of the altar, affirming also withal, material bread and material wine to be in the sacrament of the altar; and not the substance of the body and blood of Christ: if you, I say, will be reconciled as aforesaid, and will forsake your heresies and errors before touched, being heretical and damnable, and will also allow the sacrament of the mass, you shall be mercifully received, and charitably used with as much favour as may be; if not, you shall be reputed, taken, and judged for an heretic (as you be indeed). Now do you chuse what you will do; you are counselled herein friendly and favourably.

Ita est quod EDM. BONNER, Episc. Lond.

The bishop's exhortation thus ended, Mr. Philpot turned himself to the lord mayor, and said,

Philpot. To you, my lord mayor, bearing the sword, I am glad it is my chance now to stand before that authority, that hath defended the gospel and the truth of God's word: but I am sorry to see that that authority, which representeth the king and queen's persons, should now be changed, and be at the command of Antichrist; and you (speaking to the bishops) pretend to be the followers of the apostles of Christ, and yet be the very Antichrists and deceivers of the people; and I am glad that God hath given me power to stand here this day, and to declare and defend my faith, which is founded on Christ.

Therefore, as touching your first objection, I say, that I am of the catholic church, whereof I never was out; and that your church (which you pretend to be the catholic church) is the church of Rome, and so the Babylonical, and not the catholic church; of that church I am not.

As touching your second objection, which is, that I should speak against the sacrifice of the mass; I do say, that I have not spoken against the true sacrifice, but I have spoken against your private masses that you use in corners, which is blasphemy to the true sacrifice; for your daily sacrifice is reiterated blasphemy against Christ's death, and it is a lie of your own invention: and that abominable sacrifice which you set upon the altar, and use in your private masses, instead of the living sacrifice, is idolatry, and you shall never prove it by God's word; therefore you have deceived the people with that your sacrifice of the mass, which you make a masking.

Thirdly, where you lay to my charge, that I deny the body and blood of Christ to be in the sacrament of the altar, I cannot tell what altar you mean, whether it be the altar of the cross, or the altar of stone: and if you call it the sacrament of the altar in respect of the altar of stone, then I defy your Christ, for it is a rotten Christ.

And as touching your transubstantiation, I utterly deny it, for it was first brought up by a pope. Now as concerning your offer made from the synod, which is gathered together in Antichrist's name; prove to me that you be of the catholic church (which you never can), and I will follow you, and do as you would have me to do. But you are idolaters, and daily do commit idolatry. You be also traitors; for in your pulpits ye rail against good kings, as king Henry, and king Edward his son, who have stood against the usurped power of the bishop of Rome; against whom I have also taken an oath, which, if you can shew me by God's law that I have taken unjustly, I will then yield unto you: but I pray God turn the king and queen's heart from your synagogue and church, for you do abuse that good queen.

Here the bishop of Coventry and Litchfield began to shew where the true church was, saying:

Coventry. The true catholic church is set upon a high hill.

Philpot. Yea, at Rome, which is the Babylonical church.

Coventry. No, in our true catholic church are the apostles, evangelists, and martyrs; but before Martin Luther there was no apostle, evangelist, or martyr of your church.

Philpot. Will you know the cause why? Christ did prophesy that in the latter days there should come false prophets and hypocrites, as you be.

Coventry. Your church of Geneva, which you call the catholic church, is that which Christ prophesied of.

Philpot. I allow the church of Geneva, and the doctrine of the same, for it is catholic and apostolic, and doth follow the doctrine the apostles did teach, and the doctrine taught and preached in king Edward's days, was also according to the same. And are you ashamed to persecute me for your church's sake, which is Babylonical, and contrary to the true catholic church?

Bonner. My lord, this man had a roasted pig brought unto him, and this knife was put secretly between the skin and the flesh thereof, and so it was sent to him in the prison. And also this powder was sent unto him, under pretence that it was good and comfortable for him to eat and drink; which powder was only to make ink to write withal. For when his keeper did perceive it, he took it and brought it unto me: which when I did see, I thought it had been gunpowder, and thereupon I put fire to it, but it would not burn. Then I took it for poison, and so gave it to a dog, but it was not so. Then I took a little water, and it made as fair ink as ever I did write withal. Therefore, my lord, you may understand what a naughty fellow this is.

Philpot. Ah, my lord, have you nothing else to charge me withal, but these trifles, seeing I stand upon life and death? Doth the knife in the pig prove the church of Rome to be the catholic church? &c.

Then the bishop brought forth a certain instrument, containing articles and questions, agreed upon both in Oxford and Cambridge. Also he exhibited two books in print; the one was the catechism made in king Edward's days, in the year 1552, the other concerning the report of the disputation in the convocation-house, mention whereof is above expressed.

Moreover he brought forth two letters, and laid them to Mr. Philpot's charge; the one touching Bartlet Green, the other containing godly exhortations and comforts; which were both written to him by some of his friends; the tenor whereof is above expressed.

A L E T T E R,

Produced by BONNER, written by some FRIEND of Mr.

PHILPOT's, and sent to him, concerning the Usage

Mr. GREEN, in BONNER's House at London.

YOU shall understand that Mr. Green came unto the bishop of London on Sunday last, where he was courteously received; for what policy the sequel declareth. His entertainment for one day or two was to dine at my lord's own table, or else to have his meat from thence. During those days he lay in Dr. Chedsey's chamber, and was examined. Albeit in very deed, the bishop earnestly and faithfully promised many right worshipful men (who were suiters for him, but to him unknown) that he in no case should be examined; before which Mr. Fecknam would have had him in his friendly custody, if he would have desired to have conferred with him, which he utterly refused. And in that the bishop objected against him singularity and obstinacy; his answer thereunto was thus, To avoid all suspicion thereof, although I myself am young and utterly unlearned in respect of the learned, (and yet I understand, I thank my Lord) yet let me have such books as I shall require, and if I, by God's Spirit, do not thereby answer all your books and objections contrary thereto, I will assent to you. Whereunto the bishop and the rest assented, permitting him at the first to have such books. They at sundry times have reasoned with him, and have found him so strong and ripe in the scriptures and godly fathers, that since they have not only taken from him the liberty of those books, but all other books, not leaving him so much as the New Testament. Since, they have beat and used him most cruelly. This Mr. Fecknam reported; saying farther, that he never heard the like young man, and so perfect. What shall become farther of him, God knoweth; but death I think, for he remaineth more and more willing to die, as I understand. Concerning your bill, I shall confer with others therein, knowing that the same court is able to redress the same: and yet I think it will not be reformed, for that I know few or none that dare or will speak therein, or prefer the same, because it concerneth spiritual things. Notwithstanding, I will ascertain you thereof; committing you to the Holy Ghost, who keep you and us all as his.

Your own, &c.

A L E T T E R

Written by the Lady VANE to Mr. PHILPOT, exhibited likewise by Bishop BONNER.

HEARTY thanks I render unto you, my well beloved in Christ, for the book you sent me, wherein I find great consolations, and according to the doctrine thereof do prepare my cheeks to the strikers, and my womanish back to the burdens of reproof, and so in the strength of my God I trust to leap over the wall; for his sweetness overcometh me daily, and maketh all these apothecary's drugs of the world even medicinal like in my mouth. For the continuance whereof, I beseech thee (my dear fellow-soldier) make thy faithful prayer for me, that I may with a strong and glad some conscience finish my course, and obtain the reward, though it be no whit due to my work. I am not content that you so often gratify me with thanks for that which is none worthy, but duty on my part, and small relief to you. But if you would love me so much, that I might supply your wants, then would I think you believed my offers to be such as agreed with my heart. And for the short charges you speak of, the means are not so pleasant if God (whom my trust is in) will otherwise prepare; but Solomon saith, "All things here have their time;" you to-day, and I to-morrow, and so the end of Adam's line is soon run out. The mighty God give us his grace, that during this time his glory be not defaced through our weakness. Because you desire to shew yourself a worthy soldier, if need so require, I will supply your request for the scarf you wrote of, that you may present it before your captain, that I be not forgotten in the odours of incense, which our beloved Christ offered for his own; to whom I bequeath both our bodies and souls.

Your own in the Lord.

Besides these letters, the bishops did also bring forth a supplication, made by Mr. Philpot unto the high court of parliament, whereof mention is made in the first of the two letters last mentioned; the copy whereof here follows.

To the KING and QUEEN's MAJESTIES HIGHNESS, the LORDS Spiritual and Temporal, and the COMMONS of this present PARLIAMENT assembled.

IN the most humble wise complaineth unto this honourable court of parliament John Philpot, clerk,

No. 36.

that whereas by the queen's highness a parliament was called in the first year of her gracious reign, and after the old custom a convocation of the clergy, your suppliant then being one of the said convocation-house, and matters there arising upon the using of the sacraments, did dispute in the same, knowing that there all men had and have free speech, and ought not to be after-troubled for any thing there spoken; and yet that notwithstanding, not long after the said parliament, your said suppliant (without any act or matter) was commanded to prison in the King's-Bench by the late lord-chancellor, where he hath remained ever since, until now of late that my lord the bishop of London hath sent for your said suppliant, to examine him (being none of his diocese) upon certain matters, wherein they would have your suppliant to declare his conscience, which the said bishop said he hath authority to do, by reason of an act of parliament made in the first and second years of the king and queen's majesties reign, for the reviving of three statutes made against them that hold any opinion against the catholic faith: whereby he affirmeth, that every ordinary may, Ex officio, examine every man's conscience: and for that your said suppliant hath and doth refuse, that the said bishop of London hath any authority over your said suppliant, because he is neither his diocesan, nor hath published, preached, or held any opinion against the catholic faith (notwithstanding the said bishop of London detained him in the stocks in the coal-house, without a bed, or any other thing to lie upon but straw), and for that your said suppliant cannot appeal for his relief from the same bishop to any other judge, but the same bishop may refuse the same by their law, and therefore hath no succour and help but by this high court of parliament, for the explanation of the said act; therefore may it please you, that it may be enacted by the king and queen's majesties, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons of this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that no bishop or ordinary shall commit or detain in prison any suspected person or persons for the catholic faith, except he or they have spoken, written, or done some manifest act against the catholic faith; and the same to be lawfully proved against every such person or persons, by the testimony of two lawful witnesses, to be brought before the said person or persons so accused, before he or they shall either be committed to prison or convicted for any such offence or offences; the said former statute, made in the said first and second year of our said sovereign lord and lady notwithstanding: whereby your said suppliant shall not only be set at liberty, and divers other more remaining in prison; but also the blood of divers of the queen's majesty's true and faithful subjects preserved.

The CONDEMNATION of the worthy MARTYR of God, JOHN PHILPOT.

THESE books, letters, supplications, and other matters being thus read, the bishop demanded of him, if the book intitled, "The true report of the disputation, &c." were of his penning, or not? Whereupon Philpot answered, That it was a good and true book, and of his own penning and setting forth.

The bishops growing weary, and not being able by any sufficient ground, either of God's word, or of the true ancient catholic fathers, to convince and overcome him, fell with fair and flattering speech to persuade with him; promising, that if he would revoke his opinions, and come home again to their Romish and Babylonical church, he would not only be pardoned that which was past, but also they would, with all favour and cheerfulness of heart, receive him again as a true member thereof. Which words when Bonner saw would take no place, he demanded of Mr. Philpot (and that with a charitable affection, I warrant you), whether he had any just cause to alledge why he should not condemn him as an heretic. Well, quoth Mr. Philpot, your idolatrous sacrament; which you have found out, you would fain defend, but you cannot, nor ever shall.

In the end the bishop, seeing his unmoveable steadfastness ness in the truth, did openly pronounce the sentence of condemnation against him. In the reading whereof, when he came to these words, And you an obstinate, pernicious, and impenitent heretic, &c. Mr. Philpot said, I thank God that I am an heretic out of your cursed church; I am no heretic before God. But God bless you, and give you once grace to repent your wicked doings, and let all men beware of your bloody church.

5 K

Moreover, whilst Bonner was about the midst of the sentence, the bishop of Bath pulled him by the sleeve, and said, My lord, my lord, know of him first whether he will recant or not. Then Bonner said, (full like himself) O let him alone, and so read forth the sentence.

And, when he had done, he delivered him to the sheriffs; and so two officers brought him through the bishop's house into Paternoster-row, and there his servant met him, and when he saw him, he said, Ah, dear master.

Then Mr. Philpot said to his man, Content thyself, I shall do well enough; for thou shalt see me again.

And so the officers thrust him away, and took him to Newgate; and as he went, he said to the people, Ah, good people, blessed be God for this day; and so the officers delivered him to the keeper. Then his man pushed to go in after his master, and one of the officers said unto him, Hence fellow, what wouldst thou have? And he said, I would go speak with my master. Mr. Philpot then turned him about, and said to him, Tomorrow thou shalt speak with me.

Then the under keeper said to Mr. Philpot, Is this your man? and he said, Yea. So he gave his man leave to go in with him. And Mr. Philpot and his man were turned into a little chamber on the right hand, and there remained a short time, until Alexander, the chief keeper, came unto him; who, at his entering, greeted him in these words, Ah, said he, hast thou not done well to bring thyself hither? Well, said Mr. Philpot, I must be content, for it is God's appointment; and I shall desire you to let me have your gentle favour, for you and I have been of old acquaintance. Well, said Alexander, I will shew thee gentleness and favour, so thou wilt be ruled by me. Then said Mr. Philpot, I pray you shew me what you would have me to do.

He said, If you will recant, I will shew you any pleasure I can. Nay, said Mr. Philpot, I will never recant that which I have spoken, whilst I have my life, for it is most certain truth, and in witness hereof I will seal it with my blood. Then Alexander said, This is the saying of the whole pack of you heretics. Whereupon he commanded him to be set upon the block, and as many irons upon his legs as he could bear, because he would not follow his wicked mind.

Then the clerk told Alexander in his ear, that Mr. Philpot had given his man money. And Alexander said to his man, What money hath thy master given thee? He answered, My master hath given me none. No, said Alexander, hath he given thee none? That will I know, for I will search thee.

Do with me as you like, and search me all that you can, quoth his servant; he hath given me a token or two to send to his friends, to his brothers and sisters. Ah, said Alexander unto Mr. Philpot, thou art a maintainer of heretics, thy man should have gone to some of thine affinity, but he shall be known well enough. Nay, said Mr. Philpot, I do send it to my friends; there he is, let him make answer to it. But, good Mr. Alexander, be so much my friend, that these irons may be taken off. Well, said Alexander, give me my fees, and I will take them off; if not, thou shalt wear them still.

Then said Mr. Philpot, Sir, what is your fee? He said, Four pound was his fees. Ah, said Mr. Philpot, I have not so much; I am but a poor man, and I have been long in prison. What wilt thou give me then? said Alexander. Sir, said he, I will give thee twenty shillings, and that I will send my man for, or else I will give you my gown in pledge; for the time is not long I am sure, that I shall be with you; for the bishop said unto me that I should be soon dispatched.

Then Alexander said unto him, What is that to me? And with that he departed from him, and commanded him to be had into limbo, and so his command was fulfilled; but before he could be taken from the block, the clerk would have a groat.

Then one Witterence, steward of the house, took him on his back, and carried him down, his man knew not whither. Wherefore Mr. Philpot said to his man, Go to Mr. Sheriff, and shew him how I am used, and desire Mr. Sheriff to be good unto me; and so his servant went straightway, and took an honest man with him.

And when they came to Mr. Sheriff, (which was Mr. Macham) and shewed him how Mr. Philpot was handled in Newgate, the sheriff hearing this, took his ring from off his finger, and delivered it to that honest man, that came with Mr. Philpot's man, and bade him go unto Alexander the keeper, and commanded him to take off his irons, and to handle him more gently, and to give his man again that which he had taken from him.

And when they came again to the said Alexander, and delivered their message from the sheriff, Alexander took the ring and said, Ah, I perceive that Mr. Sheriff is a bearer with him, and all such heretics as he is, therefore to-morrow I will shew it to his betters: yet at ten o'clock he went into Mr. Philpot where he lay, and took off his irons, and gave him such things as he had taken before from his servant.

Upon Tuesday at supper, being the 17th of December, there came a messenger from the sheriffs, and bade Mr. Philpot make ready, for the next day he should suffer, and be burned at a stake with fire. Mr. Philpot answered and said, I am ready; God grant me strength, and a joyful resurrection. And so he went into his chamber, and poured out his spirit unto the Lord God, giving him most hearty thanks, that he of his mercy had made him worthy to suffer for his truth.

In the morning the sheriffs came according to order, about eight o'clock, and calling for him, he most joyfully came down to them. And there his man met him, and said, Ah, dear master, farewell. His master said unto him, Serve God, and he will help thee. And so he went with the sheriffs to the place of execution; and when he was entering into Smithfield, the way was foul, and two officers took him up to bear him to the stake. Then he said merrily, What, will you make me a pope? I am content to go to my journey's end on foot. But first coming into Smithfield, he kneeled down there, saying these words, "I will pay my vows in thee, O Smithfield."

And when he was come to the place of suffering, he kissed the stake, and said, Shall I disdain to suffer at this stake, seeing my Redeemer did not refuse to suffer the most vile death upon the cross for me? And then with an obedient heart, full meekly he said the cvi. and cviii. Psalms: and when he had made an end of all his prayers, he said to the officers, What have you done for me? And every one of them declared what they had done, and he gave money to them.

Then they bound him to the stake, and set fire to that constant martyr; who, the 18th day of December, in the midst of the fiery flames, yielded his soul into the hands of Almighty God, and like a lamb gave up his breath, his body being consumed to ashes.

Thus have we presented the reader with the life and actions of this learned and worthy soldier of the Lord, John Philpot, with all his examinations that came to our hands, being marvellously preserved from the sight and hand of his enemies; who, by all manner of means, sought not only to stop him from all writing, but also to spoil and deprive him of that which he had written. For which cause he was many times stripped and searched in the prison by his keeper: but yet so happily these his writings were conveyed and hid in places about him, or else his keeper's eyes so blinded, that notwithstanding all this malicious purpose of

of the bishops, they are yet remaining and come to light.

LETTER I.

From Mr. PHILPOT to a CHRISTIAN CONGREGATION, exhorting them to refrain from IDOLATRY, and to serve GOD after his WORD.

It is a lamentable thing to behold, at this time in England, the faithless departing, both of men and women, from the true knowledge and use of Christ's sincere religion, which so plentifully they have been taught, and do know, their own consciences bearing witness to the verity thereof. If that earth be accursed of God, which soon receiving moisture and pleasant dews from heaven, doth not bring forth fruit accordingly; how much more grievous judgment shall such persons receive, who having received from the Father of heaven the perfect knowledge of his word by the ministry thereof, do not shew forth God's worship after the same? If the Lord will require, in the day of judgment, a godly usury of all manner of talents which he lendeth unto men and women, how much more will he require the same of his pure religion revealed unto us (which is of all other talents the chief, and most pertaining to our exercise in life), if we hide the same in a napkin, and set it not forth to the usury of God's glory, and edifying of his church by true confession? God hath kindled the bright light of his gospel, which in times past was suppressed, and hid under the vile ashes of man's traditions, and hath caused the brightness thereof to shine in our hearts, to the end that the same might shine before men to the honour of his name. It is not only given to us to believe, but also to confess and declare what we believe in our outward conversation. For as St. Paul writeth to the Romans, "The belief of the heart justifieth, and to acknowledge with the mouth maketh a man safe." It is all one before God, not to believe at all, and not to shew forth the lively works of our belief. For Christ saith, "either make the tree good, and it's fruits good; or else make the tree evil, and the fruits evil; because a good tree bringeth forth good fruits, and an evil tree bringeth forth evil fruits." So that the person who knoweth his master's will, and doth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes. And not all they who say, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of God, but he that doth the will of the Father. And, "Whosoever in the time of trial is ashamed of me, (saith Christ) and of my words, of him the Son of man will be ashamed before his Father." After we have built ourselves into the true church of God, it hath pleased him, by giving us over into the hands of the wicked synagogues, to prove our building, and to have it known as well to the world as to ourselves, that we have been wise builders into the true church of God upon the rock, and not on the sand, and therefore now the tempest is risen, and the storms do mightily blow against us, that we might notwithstanding stand upright and be firm in the Lord, to his honour and glory, and to our eternal felicity. There is no new thing happened unto us, for with such tempests and dangerous weathers the church of God hath been continually exercised. Now once again, as the prophet Haggai tells us, "The Lord shaketh the earth, that those might abide for ever, which be not overcome." Therefore, my dearly beloved, be stable and immovable in the word of God, and in the faithful observation thereof, and let no man deceive you with vain words, saying, that you may keep your faith to yourselves, and dissemble with Antichrist, and to live at rest and quietness in the world, as most men do, yielding to necessity. This is the wisdom of the flesh, but the wisdom of the flesh is death and enmity to God, as our Saviour, for example, did aptly declare in Peter, who exhorteth Christ not to go to Jerusalem to celebrate the passover, and there to be slain, but counselled him to look better to himself.

Likewise the world would not have us to forsake it, neither to associate ourselves to the true church, which is the body of Christ, whereof we are lively members, and to use the sacraments after God's word with the danger of our lives. But we must learn to answer the world as Christ did Peter, and say, "Go behind me, Satan, thou savourest not the things of God. Shall I not drink of the cup which the Father giveth me?" For it is better to be afflicted and to be slain in the church of God; than to be counted the son of a king, in the synagogue of false religion. Death for righteousness is not to be abhorred, but rather to be desired, which assuredly bringeth with it the crown of everlasting glory. These bloody executioners not only persecute Christ's martyrs, but crown them with everlasting felicity; we were born into this world to be witnesses unto the truth, both learned and unlearned.

Now since the time is come, that we must shew our faith, and declare whether we will be God's servants in righteousness and holiness, as we have been taught, and are bound to follow, or else with hypocrisy to serve unrighteousness: let us take good heed that we be found faithful in the Lord's covenant, and true members of his church, in which through knowledge we are ingrafted; from which if we fall by transgression with the common sort of people, it will be more straightly required of us, than many yet do make account thereof. We cannot serve two masters: we may not halt on both sides, and think to please God; we must be fervent in God's cause, or else he will cast us out from him. For by the first commandment, we are commanded to love God with all our heart, with all our mind, with all our power and strength. But they are manifest transgressors of this commandment, which with their heart, mind, or bodily power, do communicate with a strange religion, contrary to the word of God, in the papistical synagogue, which calleth itself the church, and is not. As greatly do they offend God now which do so, as the Israelites did in times past, by forsaking Jerusalem, the true church of God, and by going to Bethel to serve God in a congregation of their own setting up, and after their own imaginations and traditions; for which doing, God utterly destroyed all Israel, as all the prophets almost do testify. This happened unto them for our example, that we might beware to have any fellowship with any like congregation to our destruction.

God hath one catholic church dispersed throughout the world, and therefore we are taught in our creed to believe one catholic church, and to have communion therewith: which catholick church is grounded upon the foundation of the prophets and of the apostles, and upon none other, as St. Paul witnesseth to the Ephesians. Therefore whosoever we perceive any people to worship God truly after his word, there we may be certain the church of Christ to be; unto which we ought to associate ourselves, and to desire with the prophet David, to praise God in the midst of his church. But if we behold through the iniquity of the time, separations to be made with counterfeit religion, otherwise than the word of God doth teach, we ought then, if we be required to be companions thereof, to say again with David, "I have hated the synagogue of the malignant, and will not sit with the wicked." In the Revelations the church of Ephesus is highly commended, because she tried such as said they were apostles, and were not indeed, and therefore would not abide the company of them. Further, God commanded his people, that they should not seek Bethel, neither enter into Gilgal, where idolatry was used, by the mouth of his prophet Amos. Also, we must consider that our bodies be the temple of God, and whosoever (as St. Paul teacheth) doth prophane the temple of God, him the Lord will destroy. May we then raze the temple of Christ, and make it the member of an harlot? All strange religion and idolatry is accounted whoredom with the prophets, and more detestable in the sight of God, than the adventurous abuse of the body.

Therefore

Therefore the princes of the earth, in the Revelations of St. John, are said to go a whoring, when they are in love with false religion, and follow the same. How then by any means may a christian man think it tolerable to be present at the popish private mass (which is the very prophanation of the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ) and at other idolatrous worshipings and rites, which are not after the word of God, but rather to the derogation thereof, in setting man's traditions above God's precepts, since God by his word judgeth all strange religion, which is not according to his institution, for whoredom and adultery?

Some fondly think that the presence of the body is not material, so that the heart do not consent to their wicked doings. But such persons little consider what St. Paul writeth to the Corinthians, commanding them to glorify God as well in body as in soul.

Moreover, we can do no greater injury to the true church of Christ, than to seem to have forsaken her, and disallow her by cleaving to her adversary: whereby it appeareth to others which are weak, that we allow the same; and so contrary to the word, do give a great offence to the church of God, and do outwardly slander, as much as men may, the truth of Christ. But woe be unto him by whom any such offence cometh. Better it were for him to have a mill-stone tied about his neck, and to be cast into the sea. Such are traitors to the truth, like unto Judas, who with a kiss betrayed Christ. Our God is a jealous God, and cannot be content that we should be of any other than of that unspotted church, whereof he is the head only, and wherein he hath planted us by baptism. This jealousy which God hath towards us, will cry for vengeance in the day of vengeance, against all such as have now such large consciences to do that which is contrary to God's glory, and the sincerity of his word, except they do in time repent, and cleave inseparably to the gospel of Christ, how much soever at this present both men and women otherwise in their own corrupt judgment do flatter themselves. God willeth us to judge uprightly, and to allow and follow that which is holy and acceptable in his sight, and to abstain from all manner of evil, and therefore Christ commandeth us in the gospel to beware of the leaven of the pharisees, which is hypocrisy.

St. Paul to the Hebrews saith, "If any man withdraw himself from the faith, his soul shall have no pleasure in him;" therefore he saith also, "That we are not such as do withdraw ourselves unto perdition, but we belong unto faith, for the attainment of life." St. John in the Revelations telleth us plainly, that none of those who are written in the book of life, do receive the mark of the beast, which is of the papistical synagogue, either in their foreheads, or else in their hands, that is, apparently or obediently.

St. Paul to the Philippians affirmeth, that we may not have any fellowship with the works of darkness, but in the midst of this wicked and froward generation we ought to shine like lights upholding the word of truth. Further he saith, that we may not touch any unclean thing; which signifieth, that our outward conversation in foreign things ought to be pure and undefiled as well as the inward, that with a clean spirit and rectified body we might serve God justly in holiness and righteousness all the days of our life.

Finally, in the 18th of the Revelations, God biddeth us plainly to depart from the Babylonical synagogue, and not to be partakers of her trespass. St. Paul to the Thessalonians commandeth us in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, to withdraw ourselves from every brother that walketh inordinately, and not according to the institution which he hath received of him.

Ponder ye therefore well, good brethren and sisters, these scriptures which are written for your erudition and reformation, whercof one jot is not written in vain: which be utterly against all counterfeit illusion to be used by us with the papists in their fantastical religion, and be adversaries to all them that have so light consciences in so doing: and if they do not agree with this adversary (I mean the word of God) which is contrary to their attempts, he will (as is signified in the gospel) deliver them to the judge, which is Christ; and the judge will deliver them to the executioner, that is, to the devil: and the devil shall commit them to the horrible prison of hell-fire (where is the portion of all hypocrites) with sulphur and brimstone, with wailing and gnashing of teeth, world without end. But yet many will say for their vain excuse, God is merciful, and his mercy is over all. But the scripture teacheth us, That cursed is he that sinneth upon hope of forgiveness. Truth it is, that the mercy of God is over all his works, and yet upon such as fear him: for it is written in the Psalms, "The mercy of God is on them that fear him, and on such as put their trust in him." Where we may learn, that they only put their trust in God, that serve him; and to fear God, is to turn from evil and do what is good. So that such as do look to be partakers in God's mercy, may not abide in that which is known to be manifest evil, and detestable in the sight of God.

Another sort of persons do make them a cloak for the rain, under the pretence of obedience to the magistrates, whom we ought to obey although they are wicked. But such must learn of Christ to give to Cæsar that that is Cæsar's, and to God that which is due to God, and with St. Peter to obey the higher powers in the Lord, although they be evil, if they command nothing contrary to God's word, otherwise we ought not to obey their commandments, although we should suffer death for it, as we have the apostles for our examples herein to follow, who answered the magistrates as we ought to do in this case, not obeying their wicked precepts, saying, "Judge you whether it be more righteous that we should obey man rather than God."

Also Daniel chose rather to be cast into the den of lions to be devoured, than to obey the king's wicked commandments. If the blind lead the blind, both fall into the ditch. There is no excuse for the transgression of God's word, whether a man doth it voluntarily or by commandment, although great damnation is to them, by whom the offence cometh. Some others there are, that for an extreme refuge in their evil-doing, do run to God's predestination and election, saying, that if I be elected of God to salvation, I shall be saved whatsoever I do. But such are great tempters of God, and abominable blasphemers of God's holy election, and cast themselves down from the pinnacle of the temple in presumption, that God may preserve them by his angels through predestination. Such verily may reckon themselves to be none of God's elect children, that will do evil that good may ensue; whose damnation is just, as St. Paul saith. God's predestination and election ought to be with a simple eye considered, to make us more warily to walk in good and godly conversation according to God's word, and not to sit down in idleness, and put all upon God's back to do wickedly at large: for the elect children of God must walk in righteousness and holiness after they are once called to the true knowledge. For saith St. Paul to the Ephesians, "That God hath chosen us before the foundations of the world were laid, that we should be holy and blameless in his sight."

Therefore St. Peter willeth us through good works to make our vocation and election certain to ourselves, which we know not but by the good working of God's Spirit in us, according to the rule of the gospel; and he that conformeth not himself to the same in godly conversation, may justly tremble, and doubt that he is none of the elect children of God, but of the viperous generation, and a child of darkness. For the children of light will walk in the works of light and not of darkness; though they fall, they do not lie still.

Let all vain excuses be set apart; and whilst you have light, as Christ commandeth, believe the light, and abide in the same, lest eternal darkness overtake you unawares. The light is come into the world, but (alas) men love darkness more than light. God give us his pure eye-salve to heal our blindness in this behalf. O that both men and women would be healed, and not seek to be wilfully blinded. The Lord open their eyes, that they may see how dangerous a thing it is to decline from the knowledge of truth, contrary to their conscience. But

But what said I, conscience? Many affirm their conscience will bear them well enough to do all that they do, and to go to the idolatrous church to service; whose conscience is very large to satisfy man more than God. And although their conscience can bear them so to do, yet I am sure that a good conscience will not permit them so to do, which cannot be good, unless it be directed after the knowledge of God's word; and therefore in Latin this feeling mind is called Conscientia, which soundeth by interpretation, as much as with knowledge.

And therefore if our conscience be led of herself, and not after true knowledge, yet we are not so to be excused as St. Paul beareth witness, saying, "Although my conscience accuseth me not, yet in this I am not justified." And he joineth a good conscience with these three sisters, charity, a pure heart, and unfeigned faith. Charity keepeth God's commandments, a pure heart loveth and feareth God above all, and unfeigned faith is never ashamed of the profession of the gospel, whatsoever damage he shall suffer in body thereby. The Lord, who hath revealed his holy will unto us by his word, grant us never to be ashamed of it, and give us grace so earnestly to cleave to his holy word, and the true church, that for no manner of worldly respect we become partakers of the works of hypocrisy, which God doth abhor; so that we may be found faithful in the Lord's testament to the end, both in heart, word, and deed, to the glory of God and our everlasting salvation. Amen.

Prisoner in the King's-Bench for the testimony of the truth. 1555.

JOHN PHILPOT.

LETTER II.

From Mr. PHILPOT to Mr. JOHN CARELESS,
PRISONER in the KING'S-BENCH.

MY dearly beloved brother Careless, I have received your loving letters, full of love and compassion, insomuch that they made my hard heart to weep, to see you so careful for one that hath been so unprofitable a member as I have been, and am in Christ's church. God make me worthy of that I am called unto, and I pray you cease not to pray for me, but cease to weep for him which hath not deserved such gentle tears: and praise God with me, for that I now approach to the company of them, whose want you may worthily lament; God give your pitiful heart his inward consolation. Indeed, my dear Careless, I am in this world in hell, and in the shadow of death; but he that brought me for my deserts down into hell, shall shortly lift me up to heaven, where I shall look continually for your coming, and other my faithful brethren in the King's-Bench. And though I tell you that I am in hell in the judgment of this world, yet assuredly I feel in the same the consolation of heaven, I praise God; and this loathsome and horrible prison is as pleasant to me, as the walk in the garden of the King's-Bench.

You know, brother Careless, that the way to heaven out of this life is very narrow, and we must strive to enter in at a narrow gate. If God doth mitigate the ugliness of my imprisonment, what will he do in the rage of the fire whereunto I am appointed? And this hath happened unto me, that I might be hereafter an example of comfort, if the like happen unto you, or to any other of my dear brethren with you in these cruel days, in which the devil so rageth at the faithful flock of Christ, but in vain (I trust) against any of us, who are persuaded that neither life nor death is able to separate us from the love of Christ's gospel, which is God's high treasure committed to our brittle vessels to glorify us by the same. God of his mercy make us faithful stewards to the end, and give us grace to fear nothing whatsoever in his good pleasure we shall suffer for the same. That I have not written unto you before this, the cause is, our strait keeping and the want of light by night; for the day serveth us but a while in our dark closet. This is the first letter that I have written since

No. 36.

I came to this prison, besides the report of mine examinations; and I am fain to scribble it out in haste.

Commend me to all my faithful brethren, and bid them with a good courage look for their redemption, and frame themselves to be hearty soldiers in Christ. They have taken his prest money a great while, and now let them shew themselves ready to serve him faithfully, and not to fly out of the Lord's camp into the world, as many do. Let them remember, that in the Revelations the fearful be excluded the kingdom. Let us be of good cheer, for our Lord overcame the world, that we should do the like. Blessed is the servant, whom when the Lord cometh, he findeth watching. O let us watch and pray earnestly one for another, that we are not led into temptation. Be joyful under the cross, and praise the Lord continually, for this is the whole burnt sacrifice which the Lord delighteth in. Commend me to my father Hunt, and desire him to love and continue in the unity of Christ's true church, which he hath begun, and then will he make me more and more to joy under my cross with him. Tell my brother Clements, that he hath comforted me much by his loving token in signification of unfeigned unity with us; let him increase my joy unto the end perfectly. The Lord of peace be with you all. Salute my loving friends, Mr. Mering, Mr. Crooch, with the rest, and especially Mr. Marshal, and his wife, with great thanks for his kindness shewed unto me. Farewel, my dear Careless. I have dallied with the devil a while, but I am over the shoes: God send me well out.

Out of the Coal-house, by your brother,
JOHN PHILPOT.

LETTER III.

From Mr. PHILPOT to Mr. JOHN CARELESS, profitable to be read by all those who mourn for, and repent of their Sins.

THE God of all comfort, and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, send unto thee, my dear brother Careless, the inward consolation of his Holy Spirit, in all the malicious assaults and troublesome temptations of our common adversary the devil, Amen.

That God giveth you so contrite a heart for your sins, I cannot but rejoice to behold the lively mark of the children of God, whose property is to think more lowly and meanly of themselves than of any other, and oftentimes do set their sins before them, that they might the more be stirred to bring forth the fruits of repentance, and learn to mourn in this world, that in another they might be glad and rejoice. Such a broken heart is a pleasant sacrifice unto God: O that I had the like contrite heart. God mollify my stony heart, which lamenteth not in such wise my former detestable iniquities. Praised be God that he hath given you this sorrowful heart in respect of righteousness, and I pray you let me be partaker of these godly sorrows for sin, which be the testimony of the presence of the Holy Ghost. Did not the sword of sorrow pierce the heart of the elect and blessed mother of our Lord? Did not Peter weep bitterly for his sins, which was so beloved of Christ? Did not Mary Magdalen wash the feet of our Saviour with her tears, and received therewithal remission of her seven-fold sins?

Be of good comfort therefore, mine own dear heart, in this thy sorrow, for it is the earnest penny of eternal consolation. In thy sorrow laugh, for the Spirit of God is with thee: blessed be they (saith Christ) that mourn, for they shall be comforted. They went forth and wept, saith the prophet, such shall come again having their sorrow turned into gladness. And although a painful heart, in consideration of his sins, be an acceptable sacrifice before God, whereby we are stirred up to more thankfulness unto God, knowing that much is forgiven us that we might love the more, yet the man of God must keep a measure in the same, lest he be swallowed up by much sorrow. St. Paul would not that the Thessalonians should be sorry as other men without hope: such a sorrow is not commendable, but worketh damnation

tion, and is far from the children of God, who are continually sorrowful in God when they look upon their own unworthiness, with hope of forgiveness. For God to this end by his Spirit setteth forth the sins of his elect still before them, that where they perceive sin to abound, there they might be assured that grace shall super-abound: and bring them down into hell, that he might lift them up with greater joy into heaven. Wherefore, mine own bowels in Christ, as long as you are not void altogether of hope, be not dismayed through your penitive heart for your sins, how huge soever they have been, for God is able to forgive more than you are able to sin: yea, and he will forgive him who with hope is sorry for his sins.

But know, brother, that as oft as we do go about, by the help of God's Spirit to do that which is good, the evil spirit Satan layeth hard wait to turn the good into evil, and goeth about to dung the detestable weeds of desperation with the godly sorrow of a pure penitent heart. You are not ignorant of his malicious subtilty, and how that continually he assaulteth that good which the grace of God planteth. I see the battle between you and him, but the victory is your's, yea, and that daily: for you have laid hold upon the anchor of salvation, which is hope in Christ, which will not suffer you to be made ashamed.

Be not discontented that you have this conflict; but be glad that God hath given you the same to try your faith, and that you might appear daily worthy of the kingdom of God, for which you strive. God beholdeth your striving faith against Satan, and is pleased with your mighty resistance. The Spirit which is in you, is mightier than all the adversary's power. Tempt he may, and lying in wait at your heels, give you a fall unawares; but overcome he shall not; yea, he cannot, for you are sealed up already with a lively faith to be the child of God for ever: and whom God hath once sealed for his own, him he never utterly forsaketh.

The just falleth seven times, but he riseth again. It is man's frailty to fall, but it is the property of the devil's child to lie still.

This strife against sin is a sufficient testimony that you are the child of God: for if you were not, you would feel no such malice as he now troubleth you with. When this strong Goliath hath the hold, all things are in peace which he possesseth: and because he hath you not, he will not suffer you unassaulted. But stand fast, and hold out the buckler of faith, and with the sword of God's promises smite him on the scalp: that he may receive a deadly wound, and never be able to stand against you any more. St. James telleth you that he is but a coward, saying, "Resist the devil, and he will fly from thee." It is the will of God that he should thus long tempt you, and not go away as yet, or else he had done with you long ere this. He knoweth already that he shall receive the soil at your hands, and increase the crown of your glory: for he that overcometh shall be crowned. Therefore glory in your temptations, since they shall turn to your felicity. Be not afraid of your continual assaults, which are occasions of your daily victory. The word of God abideth for ever. In what hour soever a sinner repenteth him of his sins, they be forgiven. Who can lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? Do you not perceive the manifest tokens of your own election? First, your vocation to the gospel, and after your vocation, the manifest gifts of the Spirit of God given unto you above many other of your condition, with godliness which believeth and yieldeth to the authority of the scriptures, and is zealous for the same? Seeing you are God's own dearlings, who can hurt you? Be not of a dejected mind for these temptations, neither make your unfeigned friends to be more sorrowful for you than need doth require.

Since God hath willed you at your baptism in Christ to be careless, why do you make yourself careful? Cast all your care on him. Set the Lord before your eyes always, for he is on your right side, that you should not be then moved. Behold the goodness of God towards me. I am careless, being fast inclosed in a pair of stocks, which pinch me for very straitness; and will you be careful? I would not have that unseemly addition to your name. Be as your name pretendeth, for doubtless you have no other cause but so to be. Pray, I beseech you, that I may be still careless in my careful estate, as you have cause to be careless in your easier condition. Be thankful, and put away all care, and then I shall be joyful in my present strait case. Commend me to all our brethren, and desire them to pray for me, that I may overcome my temptations: for the devil rageth against me: I am put in the stocks in a place alone, because I would not answer to such articles as they would charge me with in a corner at the bishop's appointment, and because I did not come to mass when the bishop sent for me. By God's grace, I will lay all the days of my life in the stocks, rather than I will consent to the wicked generation. Praise God, and be joyful, that it hath pleased him to make us worthy to suffer somewhat for his name's sake. The devil must rage for ten days. Commend me to Mr. F—, and thank him for his law-books: but neither law nor equity will take any place among these blood-thirsty. I wish for your sake the unjust dealing were noted unto the parliament-house, if it might avail. God shorten these evil days. I have answered the bishop meetly plain already, and I said to him, if he will call me in open judgment, I will answer him as plainly as he shall require; otherwise I have refused, because I fear they will condemn me in private. The peace of God be with you, my dear brother. I can write no more for want of light, and that which I have written I cannot read myself, and God knoweth it is written very uneasily. I pray God you may pick out some understanding of my mind towards you. Written in a coal-house of darkness, out of a pair of painful stocks, by thine own in Christ,

JOHN PHILPOT.

LETTER IV.

From Mr. PHILPOT to certain godly Women, who forsake their own Country for the Gospel, full of fruitful Precepts.

THE Spirit of truth, revealed unto you, my dearly beloved, by the gospel of our Saviour Jesus Christ, be continually abiding with you, and augmented into a perfect building of you into the lively temple of God, through the mighty operation of his holy power. Amen.

I read in the Evangelists, of certain godly women that ministered unto Christ; following him in the days of his passion, and never forsook him, but being dead in his grave, brought oil to anoint him, until he had shewed himself unto them after his resurrection, and bidding them shew unto his disciples, which at his passion were dispersed, and tell them that he was risen, and that they should see him in Galilee. To whom I may justly compare you (my loving sisters in Christ) who of late have seen him suffer in his members, and have ministered to their necessity, anointing them with the comfortable oil of your charitable assistance, even to the death: and now since you have seen Christ to live in the ashes of them whom the tyrants have slain, he willed you to go away upon just occasion offered you, and to declare to our dispersed brethren and sisters that he is risen, and liveth in his elect members in England, and by death doth overcome infidelity, and that they shall see him in Galilee, which is by forsaking this world, and by a faithful desire to pass out of this world by those ways, which he with his holy martyrs hath gone on before.

God therefore (intire sisters) direct your way, as he did Abraham and Tobias unto a strange land. God give you health both of body and soul, that you may go from virtue to virtue, and grow from strength to strength, until you may see face to face the God of Sion in his holy hill, with the innumerable company of his blessed martyrs and saints. Let there be no decrease of any virtue, which is already planted in you. Be as the light of the just, such as Solomon faith increaseth to the perfect day of the Lord. Let the strength of God be commended in your weak vessels, as it is. Be examples of faith and sobriety to all that you shall come in company withal.

withal. Let your godly conversation speak where your tongue may not, in the congregation. Be swift to hear, and slow to speak, after the counsel of St. James. Be not curious about other men's doings, but be occupied in prayer and continual meditation, with reverent talking of the word of God, without contentions among the saints. Let your faith shine in a strange country, as it hath done in your own, that your Father which is in heaven may be glorified by you unto the end.

This farewell I send you, not as a thing needful (which know already what your duty is, and be desirous to perform the same) but as one that would have you understand that he is mindful of your godly conversation, whereof he hath had good experience, and therefore writeth this to be a perpetual memorial betwixt you and him, until our meeting together before God, where we shall joy that we have here lovingly put one another in memory of our duty to perform it.

Farewel again, mine own bowels in Christ, and take me with you wheresoever you go, and leave yourselves with me, that in spirit we may be present one with another. Commend me to the whole congregation of Christ, willing them not to leave their country without witness of the gospel, after that we are all slain which already be stalled up and appointed to the slaughter; and in the mean season pray earnestly for our constancy, that Christ may be glorified in us and in them, both by life and death. Farewel in the Lord.

Yours for ever,

JOHN PHILPOT.

LETTER V.

Containing an Exhortation to his own Sister, constantly to stick to the Truth, which she had fruitfully professed.

GOD the eternal Father, who hath justified you by the blood of his Son Jesus Christ, and called you to hallow his name through a good conversation and profession of life, sanctify you with daily increase of virtue and faith by his Holy Spirit, that you may appear a vessel of sanctification, in the midst of this wicked and perverse generation, to the laud and praise of the gospel. Amen.

I have occasion (my own dear sister) to praise God in you for two causes; the one, that to your ability you are ready to shew yourself a natural and loving sister to me your poor afflicted brother, as by your gentle tokens you have often testified being absent, and also present in visiting me; which well declareth that you be a very natural sister indeed, and to be praised in this behalf. But in the other, that you be also a sister to me in faith, after Christ's gospel, I have occasion to thank God so much the more, how much the one excelleth the other, and the spiritual consanguinity is more perdurable than that which is of flesh and blood, and is a worker of that which is by nature: for commonly such as be ungodly, be unnatural, and only lovers of themselves, as daily experience teacheth us. The living Lord, which through the incorruptible seed of his word hath begotten you to be my liege sister, give you grace to grow in that generation, that you may increase to a perfect age in the Lord, to be my sister with Christ for ever.

Look therefore that you continue a faithful sister, as you are called and are godly entered, not only to me, but to all the church of Christ, yea to Christ himself, who voucheth you, in this your unfeigned faith, worthy to be his sister. Consider this dignity to surmount all the vain dignities of the world, and let it accordingly prevail more with you than all earthly delights: for thereby you are called to an equal proportion of the everlasting inheritance of Christ, if in no wise you do shew yourself an unnatural sister to him in forsaking him in trouble, which I trust you never will do for any kind of worldly respect. You are under dangerous temptations to be turned from that natural love you owe unto Christ, and you shall be tried with God's people through a sieve of great affliction: for so Satan desireth us to be sifted, that through fear of sharp troubles we might fall from the stableness of our faith, and so be deprived of that honour, joy, and reward, which is prepared for such as continue faithful brothers and sisters in the Lord's covenant to the end. Therefore the wise man, in the book of Ecclesiasticus, biddeth them that come to the service of the Lord, "To prepare themselves to suffer temptations."

Since then that for the glory of God and our faith, we are called now to abide the brunt of them, and that when our adversary hath done all that he can, yet we may be stable and stand; this Christ, our first-begotten brother, looketh for at our hands, and all our brethren and sisters in heaven desire to see our faith through afflictions to be perfect, that we might fulfil their number: and the universal church here militant rejoiceth at our constancy, all whom by the contrary we should make sorry, to the danger of the loss both of body and soul. Fear not therefore, whatsoever be threatened of the wicked; prepare your back, and see it be ready to carry Christ's cross. And if you see any unwillingness in you, (as the flesh is continually repugnant to the will of God) ask with faithful prayer, that the good Spirit of God may lead your sinful flesh whither it would not: for if we will dwell in the flesh and follow the counsel thereof, we shall never do the will of God, neither work that which tendeth to our salvation.

You are at this present in the confines and borders of Babylon, where you are in danger to drink of the whore's cup, unless you be vigilant in prayer. Take heed the serpent seduce you not from the simplicity of your faith, as he did our first mother Eve. Let not worldly fellowship make you partaker of iniquity. He that toucheth tar, cannot but be defiled thereby. With such as be perverse, a man shall soon be perverted; with the holy you shall be holy. Therefore say continually with the prophet David, Psalm 35. "Unto the saints that be on the earth, all my will is on them." You have been sanctified, and made pure through the truth: take heed you be not unholy and defiled, lest the last be worse than the worst. I write not this because I stand in any doubt of your sincere continuance, of which I have had so good experience; but because the days be evil, and in the same it is the duty of each of us to exhort and stir up one another; I am bold to put you (my good sister) in remembrance of that which doth not a little comfort me to remember, in my troubles and daily temptations. Wherefore I doubt not but you will take that in good part, which cometh from your brother both in spirit and body, who tendereth your salvation as earnestly as his own, that we might joy together eternally with such joy as the world shall never be able to take from us. Thanks be unto God, you have begun to run a good and a great time well in the ways of the Lord: run out the race to the end which you have begun, and then shall you receive the crown of glory. None shall be crowned, but such as lawfully strive. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good, and the Lord will make you one of those faithful virgins that shall follow the Lamb wheresoever he goeth; which Christ grant both to you and me. Amen.

Commend me to all them that love me in the Lord unfeignedly. God increase our faith, and give us never to be ashamed of his gospel. That same request which I have made to my brother Thomas, I make also to you, desiring you by all means you can to accomplish my request, that my sureties might be satisfied with what is mine own, to the content of my mind, which cannot be quiet until they be discharged: therefore I pray you help to purchase my quietness, that I may depart out of this world in peace. My dissolution I look for daily, but the Lord knoweth how unworthy I am of so high an honour, as to die for the testimony of his truth. Pray that God would make me worthy, as he hath done of long imprisonment, for which his name be praised for ever. Pray and look for the coming of the Lord, whose wrath is great over us, and I will pray for you as long as I live. The 9th of July, in the King's Bench.

Your own loving brother, as well in faith as in body,

JOHN PHILPOT.
LET-

LETTER VI.

From Mr. PHILPOT to certain godly Brethren.

THE grace of God the Father, and the peace of our Saviour Jesus Christ his eternal Son, and the consolation of the Holy Ghost our comforter, strengthen your hearts, and comfort your minds, that you may rejoice and live in the truth of Christ's gospel to the end, Amen.

I do much rejoice, dearly beloved in the Lord, to hear of your constant faith in the word of God, which you have so purely received; which does not with the worldlings decline from the purity thereof, albeit you suffer grief and trouble thereby; for which I praise God most heartily: and the Lord of all strength, who hath begun this good work in you, make it perfect to the end, as I doubt not but he will, for the faithful zeal you have to his truth, and to his afflicted church. Therefore that you may the better stand and bear the brunt of many temptations you are like to be assaulted withal, in these wicked and stormy days; I thought it good, as it is the duty of one christian man to exhort another in the time of trouble, to put you in remembrance thereof, and to will you with the wise man to prepare yourselves to temptations; and to beware that you, which yet do stand by the goodness of God, may not fall from your lively knowledge and hope. It is an easy thing to begin to do well, but to continue out in well-doing, is the only property of the children of God, and such as assuredly shall be saved. For so saith our Saviour in his gospel, "Blessed are they that persevere to the end."

Let not therefore this certainty of your salvation, which is continuance in the sincerity of faith, slide from you. Esteem it more than all the riches and pleasures of this world, for it is the most acceptable treasure of eternal life. This is that precious stone, for which the wise merchant-man, after the gospel, doth sell all that he hath and buyeth the same. God, in Revelations iii. doth signify to the church, that there shall come a time of temptation upon the whole world, to try the dwellers upon earth. From the danger of which temptation all such shall be delivered as observe his word: which word is there called the word of patience; to give us to understand, that we must be ready to suffer all kind of injuries and slanders for the profession thereof.

Therefore God commandeth us there to hold it fast, that no man might bereave us of our crown of glory; and St. Peter telleth us, now we are afflicted with divers trials, as it is need it should be so, That the trial of our faith being much more precious than gold that perisheth, and yet is tried by fire, might redound to the laud, glory, and honour of Jesus Christ. St. Paul to the Hebrews sheweth us, that Christ our Saviour was in his humanity made perfect by afflictions, that we being called to perfection in him, might more willingly sustain the troubles of the world, by which God giveth all them, that be exercised in the same for his sake, his holiness. And in the 12th chapter of the said epistle is written, My son, refuse not the correction of the Lord, nor shrink when thou art rebuked of him: for the Lord doth chastise every son whom he receiveth, &c. Christ, in the gospel of St. John, biddeth his disciples to look for afflictions, saying, In the world you shall have trouble, but in me ye shall have joy. And therefore in the midst of their trouble, in the 21st of St. Luke, he biddeth them look up and lift up their heads, for your redemption, saith he, is at hand. And in the 22d he saith to all such as be afflicted for him, You are those that have continued with me in my temptations, and therefore I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed for me, to eat and drink upon my table in my kingdom.

Oh how glorious be the crosses of Christ, which bring the bearers of them unto so blessed an end! Shall we not be glad to be partakers of such shame as may bring us to so high a dignity? God open our eyes to see all things as they be, and to judge uprightly. Then doubtless we would think with Moses, that it is better to be afflicted with the people of God, than to be counted the king of Egypt's son. Then should we joyfully say with David, in all our adversities and troubles, It is good, O Lord, thou hast brought me low, to the end I might learn thy righteousness. Therefore St. Paul would not glory in any other thing of the world, but in the cross of Christ, and in other his infirmities: we have the commandment of Christ, daily to take up his cross and follow him. We have the godly examples of all his apostles and holy martyrs, who with great joy and exultation have suffered the loss of all lands, goods, and life, for the hope of a better reward, which is laid up for all those in heaven, that unfeignedly cleave to the gospel, and never be ashamed thereof.

Great is the felicity of the world to the outward man, and very pleasant are the transitory delights thereof: but the reward of the righteous after the word of God, doth incomparably excel them all, in so much that St. Paul to the Romans doth plainly affirm, that all the tribulations of this world cannot deserve that glory which shall be shewed unto us.

Let us therefore (good brethren and sisters) be merry and glad in these troublesome days, which be sent of God to declare our faith, and to bring to the end and fruition of that which we hope for. If we would enter into the Lord's sanctuary, and behold what is prepared for us, we could not but desire the Lord to hasten the day of our death, in which we might set forth, by true confession, his glory. Neither should we be afraid to meet our adversaries, who so earnestly seek our spoil and death, as Christ did Judas and that wicked rout, which came to apprehend him, saying, I am he whom ye seek. It is commanded us by the gospel, not to fear them that kill the body, but to fear God, who can cast both body and soul into hell-fire. So much we are bound to observe this commandment as any other which God hath given us. The Lord increase our faith, that we fear God more than man. The Lord give us such love towards him and his truth, that we may be content to forsake all and follow him. Now will it appear what we love best; for to what we love best we shall stick. There is none worthy to be counted a christian, except he can find in his heart, for Christ's sake, if the confession of his truth doth require it, to renounce all that he hath, and follow him; and in so doing he gaineth an hundred fold more in this life (as our Saviour said to Peter) and hereafter is assured of eternal life. Behold, I pray you, what he loseth who in this life receiveth an hundred for one, with assurance of eternal life. Oh happy exchange! Perchance your outward man will say, If I were sure of this great recompence here, I could be glad to forsake all; but where is this hundred fold in this life to be found? Yes, truly; for instead of the worldly riches which thou dost forsake, which be but temporal, thou hast found the everlasting riches of heaven, which be glory, honour, and praise, both before God, angels, and men; and for an earthly habitation, hast an eternal mansion with Christ in heaven; for even now thou art of the city and household of the saints with God, as it is verified in the fourth to the Philippians. For worldly peace, which can last but a while, thou dost possess the peace of God, which passeth all understanding; and for the loss of a few friends, thou art made a fellow of the innumerable company of heaven, and a perpetual friend of all those that have died in the Lord, from the beginning of the world. Is not this more than an hundred fold? Is not the peace of God which we in this world have through faithful imitation of Christ (which the world cannot take from us) ten thousand fold more, than those things that most highly be esteemed in the world, without the peace of God? All the peace of the world is no peace, but a mere anguish, and a gnawing fury of hell: as of late God hath set example before our eyes, to teach us how horrible an evil it is to forsake the peace of Christ's truth, which breedeth a worm in the conscience that never shall rest.

O that we would weigh this with indifferent balances! Then should we not be dismayed at this troublesome time, neither sorrow after a worldly manner for the loss which we are now like to sustain, as weak faithless persons do, which love their goods more than God, and the things visible above those which be invisible; but rather rather would heartily rejoyce and be thankful, that it pleased God to call us to be soldiers in his cause against the works of hypocrisie, and to make us like unto our Saviour Christ in suffering, whereby we may assure ourselves of his eternal glory: For blessed are they, saith Christ, that suffer persecution for righteousness' sake. And as St. Paul witnesseth to Timothy, If we die with Christ, we shall live with Christ, and if we deny him, he will deny us.

O that we would enter into the vail of God's promises. Then should we with St. Paul to the Philippians, reject all, and count all things but for dross, so that we may gain Christ. God, which is the enlightener of all darkness, and putter away of all blindness, anoint our eyes with the true eye-salve, that we may behold his glory, and our eternal felicity, which is hidden with Christ, and prepared for us that do abide in his testament: for blessed is that servant, whom the master when he cometh (as Christ said) doth find faithful. Let us therefore watch and pray one for another, that we yield not in any point of our religion to the antichristian synagoge, and that we be not overthrown by these temptations. Stand therefore, and be no cowards in the cause of your salvation; for his Spirit that is in us, is stronger than he which in the world doth now rage against us. Let us not put out the Spirit of God from us, by whose might we shall overcome our enemies, and then death shall be as great a pain to us as it was to the blessed apostle St. Paul. Why then do ye mourn? Why do ye weep? Why are ye so careful, as though God hath forsaken you? He is never more present with us, than when we are in trouble, if we do not forsake him. We are in his hands, and no body can do us any injury or wrong without his good will and pleasure. He hath commanded his angels to keep us, that we stumble not at a stone without his divine providence. The devil cannot hurt any of us, and much less any of his ministers, without the good will of our eternal Father.

Therefore let us be of good comfort, and continually give thanks unto God for our estate, whatsoever it be; for if we murmur against the same, we murmur against God, who sendeth the same: which if we do, we kick but against the pricks, and provoke more the wrath of God against us; which by patient suffering otherwise would sooner be turned into our favour through faithful prayer.

I beseech you with St. Paul, to give your bodies pure and holy sacrifices unto God. He hath given us bodies to bestow unto his glory, and not after our own concupiscence. If many years God hath suffered us to use our bodies, which be his temples, after the lust of the flesh, in vain delights, not according to his glory; is it not our duty in the latter end of our life, the more willingly to yield unto God's glory our bodies, with all that we have, in demonstration of true repentance of that we have evil spent before? Cannot the example of the blessed man Job, horribly afflicted, cause us to say, "The Lord hath given it, the Lord hath taken it: blessed be the name of the Lord, so is it come to pass?" If we cast our whole care likewise upon God, he will turn our misery into felicity, as well as he did to Job. God tempteth us now as he did our father Abraham, commanding him to slay his son Isaac in sacrifice to him; which Isaac, by interpretation, doth signify mirth and joy. Who by his obedience preserved Isaac unto long life, and offered in his stead a ram that was tied by the horns in the brambles. So likewise we are all commanded to sacrifice unto God our Isaac, which is our joy and consolation: which if we be ready to do, as Abraham was, our joy shall not perish, but live and be increased, although our ram be sacrificed for our Isaac: which doth signify, that the pride and concupiscence of our flesh, entangled through sin with the cares of this stinging world, must be mortified for the preservation and perfect augmentation of our mirth and joy, which is sealed up for us in Christ.

And to withstand these present temptations wherewith we are now encumbered, you cannot have a better remedy than to set before your eyes how our Saviour Christ overcame them in the desert, and to follow his example. That if the devil himself, or any other by him, willeth you to make stones bread, that is, to take such a worldly-wise way, that you may have your fair houses, lands and goods to live on still; you must say, that every man liveth not only by bread, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God.

Again, if the devil counselleth you to cast yourselves down to the earth, as to revoke your sincere belief and godly conversation, and to be conformable to the learned men of the world, pretending that God will be well enough content therewith; you must answer that it is written, that a man shall not tempt his Lord God.

Further, if the devil offer you large promises of honour, dignity, and possessions, so that you will worship idols in his synagoge, you must say, Get behind me, Satan, for it is otherwise written, that a man must worship his Lord God, and serve him only.

Finally, if your mother, brother, sister, wife, child, kinsman, or friend, do require you to do otherwise than the word of God hath taught you, you must say with Christ, that they are your mothers, brothers, sisters, wives, children, kinsmen, which do the will of God the Father. To which will the Lord for his mercy conform us all unfeignedly to the end, Amen.

Your loving and faithful brother in Christ, in captivity,

JOHN PHILPOT.

L E T T E R VII.

From Mr. PHILPOT to Mr. ROBERT HARRINGTON.

GENTLE Mr. Harrington, I cannot tell what condign thanks I may give unto God for you, in respect of the great gentleness and pains which you have taken for the relief of me and of our other afflicted brethren in Christ. God be praised for his mercy, whose loving providence we have seen towards us by such faithful stewards as you have been towards a great many. Blessed be you of God for the loving care which you have taken for his poor flock. God hath reserved your reward of thanks in heaven, and therefore I go not about to render you any, lest I might seem to judge that you looked for that here, which is reserved for a better place. I thank God for that which I have found by your faithful and diligent industry, and God forgive me my unworthiness of so great benefits. God give me grace to serve him faithfully, and to run out my race with joy. Glorious is the course of the martyrs of Christ at this day. Never had the elect of God a better time for their glory than this is. Now may they be assured under the cross, that they are Christ's disciples for ever.

Methinks I see you desiring to be under the same. The flesh draweth back, but the spirit saith, It must be brought whither it would not. Here is the victory of the world: here is the true faith, and everlasting glory. Who is he which desireth not to be found faithful to his master? And now is the time that every faithful servant of Christ hath just opportunity to shew himself a glorious soldier in the Lord's fight. Now do the Amalekites invade the true Israelites, that the Israelites might with speed be glorified; I need not for want of understanding to admonish you hereof, but as a willing soldier in Christ, to exhort you so to run as you may get the victory, and that speedily with us. A man that is invited to a glorious feast, desireth his friend may go with him, and be partaker thereof. God doth call me, most unworthy, among others, to drink of the bride-cup of his Son, whereby we shall be made worthy (as many of our brethren have been before us) to sit at the right hand and at the left hand of Christ. O what unspeakable condition is that? May any worldly thing hinder us from the desire thereof? Since we seek the kingdom of God, why do we not apprehend it, being so near offered unto us?

Let us approach near unto God, and God will draw near unto us. God draw us after him, that we may all run after the favour of his sweet ointments. Christ anoint us, that we may be supplied in these evil days to run lightly unto the glory of the Lord. Shame, imprisonment sonment, loss of goods, and shedding of our blood, be the just price which we must willingly bestow for the same. Wherefore (dearly beloved in the Lord) let not the great charges keep you back from buying this glory: for the reward is ten thousand fold greater than the price.

That you have married a wife, whom God blest, I cannot excuse you from this mart, but you must bring your wife for an usury to the Lord, whose pleasure is in godly yoke-fellows. I wish you to be as I am, except these horrible bands, but yet most comfortable to the spirit, assuring you, that we are made worthy, through Christ, of the kingdom for which we suffer. Praised be the Lord for the affliction which we suffer, and may he give us strength to continue to the end.

Commend me to Mr. Heath, and tell him that I would wish him with me, to prove how apt he is to carry the cross of Christ. I pray for his continuance in Christ, as for mine own. Commend me to his wife, and to Mrs. Hall, certifying them that I am brought to the gates of hell, that I might never enter into the same, but be raised up from hell to heaven, through the word that sanctifieth us. Commend me to Mr. Elsing and his wife, and thank them that they remembered to provide for me some ease in prison; and tell them, that though my lord's coal-house be but very black, yet it is more to be desired by the faithful than the queen's palace. God make her a joyful mother, and preserve them both to the comfort of God's people. Thus for this time farewell, dear brother. Written in post-haste because of strait keeping.

This day I expect to be called before the commissioners again. Pray, dear brother, for the Spirit of wisdom to remain with me. Commend me to your wife, and I thank you both for your tokens. Your token I have sent to your wife; and my token unto you, is my faithful heart with this letter. Commend me to all my friends, and tell them that I am cheerful in Christ, wishing them to fear God more than man, and to learn to despise earnestly the vanities of this world; desiring you all to pray for me, that I may end my journey with fidelity. Amen.

JOHN PHILPOT.

L E T T E R VIII.

From Mr. PHILPOT to the Lady VANE.

THE principal Spirit of God the Father, given unto us by Christ our merciful Saviour, confirm, strengthen, and establish you in the true knowledge of the gospel, that your faithful heart (worshipful and dear sister in the Lord) may attain and taste with all the saints what is the height, the depth, the length, and breadth of the sweet cross of Christ. Amen.

Oh, happy are you amongst all other women, that have found this precious stone which is hidden in the gospel; for which we ought to sell all other things; and to purchase the same. Oh, happy woman, whose heart God hath moved and enlarged to be in the profession thereof. Others seek worldly goods, honours, and delights; but you seek with a good understanding to serve God in spirit and in truth. This is the gate that leadeth to heaven, this is your portion for ever. By this you shall see God face to face (which sight is unspeakable joy), and by this shall you have a full sight of all the beautiful heavenly bowers, and of all the celestial paradise. By this you shall know them that you never knew, and be glad and joyful with those which you have known here in God, world without end.

Ah, I lament the infidelity of England, that after so great light, is steeped into such huge darkness again. The servant who knoweth his master's will and doth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes. Ah, great are the plagues that hang over England, yea, though the gospel should be restored again. Happy shall that person be whom the Lord shall take out of this world, not to see them. Ah, the great perjury which men have run so wilfully against God by receiving Antichrist again, and his wicked laws; which do threaten a great ruin unto England. O that the Lord would turn his just judgments upon the authors of the truce-breakers (as Nebuchadonozor was) that his people might be delivered, and his glory exalted. God grant that that good luck which you hope shortly to come upon the house of God, be a true prophecy, and not a well-wishing only. Ah, Lord, take away thy heavy hand from us, and stretch it out upon thine enemies, those hypocrites, as thou hast begun, that they may be confounded. O let not the weak perish for want of knowledge through our sin. Although thou kill us, yet we will put our trust in thee.

Thus (dear heart) you teach me to pray with you in writing. God hear our prayers, and give us the spirit of effectual prayer, to pour out our hearts continually together before God, that we may find mercy both for ourselves, and for our afflicted brethren and sisters. I cannot but praise God in you, for that pitiful heart that taketh other folks' calamities to heart as your own. Blessed be they that mourn, for such shall be comforted. God wipe away all tears from your pitiful eyes, and sorrow from your merciful heart, that you may (as doubtless you shall do shortly) rejoice with his elect for ever. You have so armed me to the Lord's battle both inwardly and outwardly, that except I be a very coward, I cannot faint, but overcome by death. You have appointed me to so good and gracious a general of the field, to so victorious a captain, and to so favourable a marshal, that if I should not go on lustily, there were no spark of heavenly manhood in me. I will present your coat-armour before my captain, and in the same I trust by him to overcome. The scarf I desire as an outward sign to shew our enemies, who see not our glorious end, neither what God worketh inwardly in us, through the blindness of their hearts, that they persecute Christ's cross in us, whereby he hath sealed up the truth of his gospel by his death unto us, that we by our death (if need be) might confirm the same, and never be ashamed whatsoever torment we do suffer for his name's sake; and our weak brethren seeing the same, might be more encouraged to take up Christ's cross, and to follow him. God give us grace to do all things to his glory. Amen.

The world wondereth how we can be merry in such extreme misery, but our God is omnipotent who turneth misery into felicity. Believe me (dear sister) there is no such joy in the world as the people of Christ have under the cross. I speak by experience; therefore believe me, and fear nothing that the world can do unto you. For when they imprison our bodies, they set our souls at liberty with God. When they cast us down, they lift us up; yea, when they kill us, then do they bring us to everlasting life. And what greater glory can there be, than to be in conformity to Christ? which afflictions do work in us.

God open our eyes to see more and more his glory in the cross of Jesus Christ, and make us worthy partakers of the same. Let us rejoice with St. Paul in the cross of Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto us, and we to the world. The cross of Christ be our standard to fight under for ever. While I am talking with you of our common consolation, I forget how I trouble you with my rude and inordinate tediousness: but you must impute it to love which cannot quickly depart from them whom he loveth, but desireth to pour himself into their bosoms.

Therefore though your flesh would be offended (as it might justly be) at such rudeness, yet your spirit will say nay, which taketh all things in good part that cometh of love. And now I am departing, yet will I take my leave ere I go, and would fain speak somewhat that might declare my sincere love to you for ever. Farewell, O elect vessel of the Lord, to the comfort of his afflicted flock, farewell on earth, whom in heaven I am sure I shall not forget. Farewell under the cross most joyfully, and until we meet, always remember what Christ saith, "Be of good cheer, for I have overcome the world," &c.

God pour his Spirit abundantly upon you, mine own dear bowels in Christ, until you may come to see the God of all gods with his elect in the everlasting Sion. I send you the kiss of peace, with which I do most inwardly take my leave of you at this present. It is necessarily we depart hence, or else we could not be glorified. Your heart is heavy because I say I must depart from you: it is the calling of the merciful Father, wherewithal you are content, and so am I. Be of good comfort, hold but your buckler of faith: for by the strength thereof we shall shortly meet in eternal glory: to which Christ bring us both. Amen, Amen. The 10th of December, 1555.

Death, why should I fear thee? Since thou canst not hurt me, but rid me from misery unto eternal glory.

Dead to the world, and living to Christ, your own brother, sealed up in the verity of the gospel for ever.

JOHN PHILPOT.

LETTER IX.

From Mr. PHILPOT to the same Lady, being a great Supporter of him.

I cannot but most heartily give God thanks for these his gifts in you, whose brightness many beholding that are weak, are much encouraged to seek God likewise, and to cleave to him, having the example of so faithful and constant a gentlewoman before their eyes. If the queen of the south shall rise with the men of Christ's generation, and condemn them, for that she came from the end of the world to hear the wisdom of Solomon: then shall your sincere and godly conversation, thus shining in this dangerous time of the trial of God's people, (being a woman of a worshipful estate and wealthy condition) condemn in the latter day a great many of these faint-hearted gospellers, which so soon be gone back and turned from the truth, at the voice of a handmaiden; seeing that neither the fear of imprisonment, neither the possession of the world, (wherewithal you are sufficiently endued above a great many) can separate you from the love of the truth, which God hath revealed unto you; whereby it appeareth that the seed of God's word which was sown in you, fell neither in the highway, nor among the thorns, nor upon the stones, but upon good ground, which is blessed of God, and bringeth forth fruit with great affliction, an hundred fold to the glory of God, and the increase of his church, &c.

In consideration whereof St. James biddeth us highly to rejoice, whensoever we fall into many temptations, knowing that it is but the trial of our faith, that we might bring forth that excellent virtue patience, by which we are made alike to our Redeemer Christ, with whom we here being like in suffering, assuredly shall hereafter be partakers of his eternal glory. Therefore St. Paul saith, "God forbid that I should glory in any thing but in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ." I that am under the cross with you (thanks be given to God therefore) have felt in the same more true joy and consolation, than ever I did by any benefit that God hath given me in my life before. For the more the world doth hate us, the nigher God is unto us, and there is no perfect joy but in God. Wherefore Christ said, "In me ye shall have joy, but in the world affliction." Blessed be God which sendeth us this affliction, that we might perfectly joy in him. For this cause in the ripest time of iniquity, and in the most fervent season of persecution of the true church, which Christ in the 21st of Luke prophesied to come, he willeth us to be of good cheer, and to lift up our heads, for our redemption is at hand.

O that the Lord would come and deliver us from this world, which is a vale of misery, unto his own kingdom, where floweth perpetual joy and consolation. And verily that is the true and only joy that is conceived, not of the creature, but of the Creator, which when we do possess, nobody can take it away from us. To which joy all other joys being compared, are but mournings, all delights sorrow, all sweetnesssour, all beauty filth, and finally, all other things that be counted pleasant, are tediousness. Your own self is better witness of this than I: ask yourself, with whom you are best acquainted. Doth not the Holy Ghost speak the same in your heart? Have you not persuaded yourself this to be true, before I wrote thereof? For how should you, being a woman, and a young gentlewoman, beautiful, and at your own liberty, have overcome this your frail kind and age, and despised your excellent beauty and estate, unless all those things which are subject to the senses, had been counted of you vile, and little to be esteemed in comparison of those things which inwardly do comfort you to overcome the flesh, the world, and the devil?

God increase your joy in all spiritual things, and establish your hope to the day of eternal rest. You have forsaken darkness, and are entered into light, God grant the same may shine still in you, until the perfect day come of the Lord, in which is all our consolation. Here we must be darkened, that there we may appear as bright as the sun in the face of the whole world, and of all them that now condemn us for our well doing; whose judges then we shall be, to their horrible grief, though now they wrongfully judge us. Pray heartily, and that often, that God once again for his Christ's sake would be merciful to his afflicted church in England. Faithful prayer is the only remedy that we have against the fiery darts of the devil, that are kindled against us. By prayer the Amalekites shall be overcome, and the roarings of the lion, which seeketh still to devour us, shall be stopped and put to silence. The Lord stop Leviathan's mouth, that he swallow not up God's silly people, according to his expectation.

Praise the Lord for the faithful testimony and sacrifice which two of our brethren of late have through fire rendered to the truth of the gospel, which now triumpheth by the death of godly martyrs. The Lord is at hand, therefore watch and pray. The last day of May, 1555. Captive in the King's-Bench.

Your's with heart in Christ, JOHN PHILPOT.

LETTER X.

From the Same to the Same.

GOD the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ increase in your godly heart the faith of the gospel, which is your eternal inheritance, and the Holy Ghost comfort your spirit with all spiritual consolation to the day of the Lord. Amen.

I cannot but praise God most highly and earnestly (my dear and faithful lady) for the great and unfeigned love which you bear unto me in Christ, declared oftentimes, as well now as of late, by manifest and liberal tokens. Blessed be God that made you so worthy a member in his kingdom. For it cannot be but such shall reap with abundance in time of reward, that here do sow so plenteously in well-doing; although I am most unworthy to receive any such benefits at your hands as in respect of a pillar of Christ's church, which am scarce a shadow thereof. But the zeal of Christ's church in you wisheth me to be such an one as the time doth require. God fulfil your desire of me, that I may be found constant, and no wandering star. I am not worthy of the name of a prophet, or of a minister of God's word, for that I have (being hindered by the iniquity of the time) little or nothing laboured therein. I am a friend of our common spouse Jesus, and do rejoice in the verity of his word; for which (praised be his name) he hath counted me worthy to suffer: and indeed whosoever giveth a draught of water in the name of a disciple (as Christ promised), shall not lose his reward. Therefore that your gentleness doth in the name of him, which which I am not, the Lord recompense unto you in all his blessings, which he is accustomed to pour on them who love his flock unfeignedly.

Good lady, you have to joy that the kingdom of God is thus continually before your eyes, and that you are not ashamed of the bands of Christ, which you with his people in part do suffer. They may be assured of the glory everlasting, who here are not ashamed to take up the cross of Christ, and to follow him. Here we must weep and lament, while the world laugheth and triumpheth over us; but our tears shall shortly be turned to unspeakable joy, and we shall eternally be merry together, when the world shall lament their infidelity without end.

I would I were able to do any thing that might shew condign thanks for that sincere love you bear unto me in Christ: you adjure me (as it were) by your gentle letters to be bold on you in all my needs. I thank God who ceaseth not to provide for his, I lack nothing at present, but only ability to thank your faithful heart for your goodness towards me. I love you and not your's, as it is meet for christians to love one another in God; and your faith which I behold in you, is more worth unto me than all your possessions. And I think I shall not need long to be chargeable unto you, for that this week I look for some commissioners to sit on me, and my fellow-prisoners in prison, lest the spirit of your breath might blow further abroad. The will of God be done. We are not so good as John the Baptist, who was beheaded in prison. We must not fear the fire, for our Lord is a consuming fire, who will put out the fierceness of raging torments from us. Be not afraid of them that can kill the body, but fear him that can cast both body and soul into hell-fire. God forbid that we should rejoice otherwise than in the cross of Christ, and pray that he would make us worthy to suffer for his sake. God will have our faith tried and known; and therefore let us willingly humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God, that he may gloriously lift us up in his good time. There is none perfectly faithful indeed, till he can say with St. Paul, "I am persuaded that neither death nor life, nor principalities nor powers, nor things present nor things to come, nor height nor depth, nor any other creature is able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord." This faith God plant both in you and me unmoveably. In this faith we have to rejoice, and in none other.

All the tribulations of the world are not worthy of the eternal weight of glory which is prepared for them, that do with patience abide the cross. Wherefore let us be strong with the strength in him, that is able to make us strong, and lament the weakness, I might say, the infidelity of our faint-hearted gospellers. Christ, whom we would pretend to have put upon us, is the strength of God, and how then can they be weak where Christ is? We have more cause to be glad, touching ourselves, of this time, than we have had of any time before, in which we have so ready a way to go unto God, and so good an occasion to shew our duty in glorifying his holy name. For if we be imprisoned in his cause, we are blessed. If we lose all that we have, we are blessed an hundred fold. If we die, we are blessed eternally; so that in suffering persecutions, all is full of blessings. Be blessed therefore (O elect lady) of God, with the blessed of God, and flee (as you do) the concupiscence of the world. Embrace that which is perfect, and joyfully look for the coming and cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c. Thus desiring God to preserve you to his true peace, and to give you victory of that temptation which now is come to try our faith; Christ be with you, and bless you both in body and soul; and my prayer shall follow you wheresoever you go, as I desire that your's may be with me. The last week I sent your beneficence to Oxford; I could not have a convenient messenger before. As soon as I have word, you shall be satisfied of your request. Love me as you do, and the God of love be with you. The 20th day of August,

By yours, with all his power in the Lord,

JOHN PHILPOT.

LETTER XI.

To the same Lady.

THE mercy of God the Father, and the consolation of the Holy Ghost through Jesus Christ, be with you, and strengthen you, my dear mother and sister in the Lord, in these dangerous days, to the crown of eternal glory, which is now offered to all faithful soldiers in the gospel, Amen.

As your good ladyship doth desire to hear from me, so am I desirous to write, as your gentleness and daily goodness bind me. But Satan of late hath hindered me, who envying all good exercises which I have had and received by mine easy imprisonment in times past, hath brought me out of the King's-Bench into the bishop of London's coal-house, a dark and an ugly prison as any about London, (but my dark body of sin hath well deserved the same, and the Lord hath now brought me into outward darkness, that I might the more be enlightened by him, as he is most present with his children in the midst of darkness) where I cannot be suffered to have any candle-light, neither ink nor paper, but by stealth. Wherefore I cannot write to you as I would, neither as my duty is. As Christ, my master, was sent from Annas to Caiaphas, so am I sent from Winchester diocese to London, I trust to make a speedy end of my course; God give me grace and patience to be a faithful follower of my master. I have been already a week in this coal-house, and have of late been four times called to mine answer, but hitherto not called to judgment, which I do daily look for; but I fear they will prolong me, and try me by strait imprisonment a while, in which God's will be done.

Pray (dear lady) that my faith faint not, which I praise God is now more lively with me than it hath been in times past, I taste and feel the faithfulness of God in his promise, who hath promised to be with his in their trouble, and to deliver them. I thank the Lord I am not alone, but have six other faithful companions; who in our darkness do faithfully sing hymns and praises unto God for his great goodness. We are so joyful, that I wish you part of my joy; but rather be glad and thankful unto God with me, that it hath pleased him to make me, most wretched sinner, worthy to suffer any thing for his sake. Hitherto we have not resisted unto blood. God make us never to count our blood more precious in our eyes than his truth.

Ah, my dear sister, I thank you again for the last letter you sent me; it is a singular comfort unto me, as oft as I read the same. I have it in my bosom, and will carry the same even to the stake with me, in witness that Christ hath so constant and faithful a lady in England. God succour and keep that spirit in you; for it is the very spirit of adoption of the child of God. Such cheerful and holy spirits under the cross are acceptable sacrifices in the sight of God; for Christ came to cast fire into the earth, and looketh that it should be kindled. Be you fervent in spirit in our Christ's cause, as you have begun, for that is the principal spirit wherewithal David desired to be confirmed. O, how do I rejoice, your ladyship to go arm in arm with me unto Christ, or rather before me! I cannot but joy of such a worshipful fellow. Methinks I see you mourn, and desire to be loosed out of the earthly and frail habitation of this body. O how amiable and pleasant is it to dwell in God's tabernacle! Our Christ and his heavenly company look for us; let us haste and run thereto, for behold the Lord is ready to embrace us. Mine own bowels in the Lord, be merry in the Lord with your afflicted brother, who daily offereth your merciful alms, which most unworthily I do receive still of you, unto the Lord. But now (dear mother) you need not burden yourself so much (as my last letters did signify) for that my chargeable imprisonment is cut off, and a little now serveth me; wherefore I pray you send no more until I send to you, for I have sufficient, and do abound. God's peace be with you for ever. Out of my lord of London's coal-house, the last of October.

Your own,

JOHN PHILPOT.

LETTER XII.

From Mr. PHILPOT to the said Lady, wherein he partly complains of the Dissimulation and Perjury of Englishmen falling again to the Pope, and partly expresses his joy in his Afflictions.

I Cannot but joy with you (my heartily beloved in Christ) of the fall of Sennacherib: since it is to the glory of God, and to the consolation of his church, to see the fall of their enemies before their face, according as it is written, "The just shall rejoice, when he seeth the vengeance of the wicked." God make this joy perfect: for as concerning myself I count not to see those good days whereof you have a glimmering in this life. For although the cockatrice be dead, yet his pestilent chickens, with the whore of Babylon, still live. But a great hope there is of their short confusion, because God doth not prosper their doings according to their expectation. Most happy shall he be, whom the Lord shall soonest take out of this life, that he may not see the plagues which the manifest perjury, and the manifold idolatry and detestable dissimulation, and that of such as do know the truth, do threaten to come.

The Lord is just, and all unrighteousness displeaseth him, and either here or else in another world he will punish this gross infidelity of the world: but his elect, and such as he loveth, will he punish here, that they should not be condemned hereafter with the world eternally: we have nothing so much to rejoice in, as in the cross of Jesus Christ, and in that we are partakers of his afflictions, which are the earnest-penny of that eternal kingdom which he upon the cross for us hath purchased. For as Paul, his faithful witness, saith, "If we suffer with him, we shall reign with him. If we die with him, we shall live with him."

Wherefore (mine own dear bowels) praise God with me most intirely, that it hath pleased him now mercifully to visit the sins of my youth, and my huge unthankfulness, and by the same doth give me much consolation, that he assureth me of his great goodness and mercy, and turneth his fatherly chastisement into my crown of glory. O good God, what am I on whom he should shew this great mercy? To him that is immortal, invincible, and only wise, be all honour, praise and glory therefore, Amen.

This is the day which the Lord hath made, let us rejoice and be glad in the same. This is the way, though it be narrow, which is full of the peace of God, and leadeth to eternal bliss. O how my heart leapeth for joy, that I am so near the apprehension thereof! God forgive me mine unthankfulness and unworthiness of so great glory. The swords which pierced Mary's heart in the passion of our Saviour, which daily also goes through your faithful heart, be more glorious and to be desired than the golden scepters of this world. O blessed be they that mourn in this world to God-ward, for they shall eternally be comforted: God make my stony heart to mourn more than it doth. I have so much joy of the reward that is prepared for thee, most wretched sinner, that though I be in a place of darkness and mourning, yet I cannot lament; but both night and day I am so joyful, as though I were under no cross at all: yea, in all the days of my life I was never so merry, the name of the Lord be praised therefore for ever and ever, and may he pardon mine unthankfulness. Our enemies do fret, fume, and gnash their teeth, to see and hear that we, under this grievous affliction in the world, can be so merry. We are by them counted as desperate persons, for the certain hope and feeling which we have of our everlasting salvation: and it is no marvel, for the worldly men cannot perceive the things of God, they being mere foolishness and abomination to them.

Be thankful unto our God, (mine own dear helper) for his wondrous working in his chosen people. Pray instantly that this joy be never taken from us, for it passeth all the delights of this world. This is the peace of God which surmounteth all understanding: this peace, the more his chosen be afflicted, the more they feel, and therefore cannot faint, neither for fire, nor for water.

Let us pray for our weak brethren and sisters' sake, that it may please God to alleviate the grievous and intolerable burden of these cruel days. But touching ourselves, let us heartily beseech our Saviour to vouchsafe to give us this glorious gift to suffer for his gospel's sake, and that we may think the shame of the world to be our glory, as it is indeed. God increase our faith, and open our eyes to behold what is prepared for us. I lack nothing, praise be to God. I trust my marriage-garment is ready. I will send you my examinations as soon as I can get them written, if you be desirous of them.

God of his mercy fill your merciful heart with all joy and consolation of the hope to come. Out of the coal-house, the 19th of November.

JOHN PHILPOT.

LETTER XIII.

From Mr. PHILPOT to a Friend of his, Prisoner the same time in Newgate, wherein is debated and discussed the Matter or Question of the Baptizing of Infants.

THE God of all light and understanding enlighten your heart with all true knowledge of his word, and make you perfect to the day of our Lord Jesus Christ, whereunto you are now called, through the mighty operation of his Holy Spirit, Amen.

I received yesternight from you (dear brother, saint, and fellow-prisoner for the truth of Christ's gospel) a letter, wherein you gently require my judgment concerning the baptism of infants, which is the effect thereof. And before I do shew you what I have learned out of God's word, and of his true and infallible church touching the same, I think it not out of the matter first to declare what vision I had the same night while musing on your letter I fell fast asleep, knowing that God doth not without cause reveal to his people, who have their minds fixed on him, special and spiritual revelation to their comfort, as a taste of their joy and kingdom to come, which flesh and blood cannot comprehend.

Being in the midst of my sweet rest, it seemed as if I saw a great beautiful city, of the colour of azure and white, four-square, in a beautiful composition in the midst of the sky, the sight whereof so inwardly comforted me, that I am not able to express the consolation I had thereof, yea the remembrance thereof causeth as yet my heart to leap for joy: and as charity is no churl, but would wish others to be partakers of his delight, so methought I called to others (I cannot tell whom), and while they came and we together beheld the same, by and by, to my great grief, it faded away.

This dream I think not to have come of the illusion of the senses, because it brought with it so much spiritual joy, and I take it to be of the working of God's Spirit for the contentation of your request, as he wrought in Peter to satisfy Cornelius. Therefore I interpret this beautiful city to be the glorious church of Christ; and the appearance of it in the sky, signifieth the heavenly state thereof, whose conversation is in heaven; and that according to the primitive church which is now in heaven, men ought to measure and judge the church of Christ now on earth: for as the prophet David saith, "The foundations thereof be in the holy hills, and glorious things be spoken of the city of God." And the marvellous quadrature of the same, I take to signify the universal agreement of the same, and that all the church here militant ought to consent to the primitive church throughout the four parts of the world; as the prophet affirmeth, saying, "God maketh us to dwell after one manner in one house." And that I conceived so wonderful joy at the contemplation thereof, I understand the unspeakable joy which they have that be at unity with Christ's primitive church: for there is joy in the Holy Ghost, and peace, which passeth all understanding; as it is written in the Psalms, as of joyful persons is the dwelling of all them that be in thee. And that I called others to the fruition of this vision, and to behold this wonderful city, I construe it by the will of God this vision to have come upon me musing on your letter, to the end that under this figure I might have occasion to move you with many others, to behold the primitive church in all your opinions concerning faith, and to conform yourself in all points to the same, which is the pillar and establishment of the truth, and teacheth the true use of the sacraments, and having with a greater fulness than we have now, the first fruits of the Holy Ghost, did declare the true interpretation of the scriptures, according to all verity, even as our Saviour promised to send them another Comforter, which should teach them all truth.

And since all truth was taught and revealed to the primitive church, which is our mother, let us all, that be obedient children of God, submit ourselves to the judgment of the church, for the better understanding of the articles of our faith, and of the doubtful sentences of the scripture. Let us not go about to shew in us (by following any private man's interpretation upon the word) another spirit than they of the primitive church had, lest we deceive ourselves. For there is but one faith and one Spirit, which is not contrary to himself, neither otherwise now teacheth us than he did them. Therefore let us believe as they have taught us of the scriptures, and be at peace with them, according as the true catholic church is at this day: and the God of peace will assuredly be with us, and deliver us out of all our worldly troubles and miseries, and make us partakers of their joy and bliss, through our obedience to faith with them.

Therefore God commandeth us in Job, to ask of the elder generation, and to search diligently the memory of the fathers. For we are but yesterday's children, and are ignorant, and our days are like a shadow, and they shall teach thee, faith the Lord, and speak to thee, and shall utter words from their hearts. And by Solomon we are commanded, not to reject the direction of our mother. The Lord grant you to direct your steps in all things after her, and to abhor contention with her. For as St. Paul writeth, "If any man be contentious, neither we, neither the church of God hath any such custom."

Hitherto I have shewed you (good brother) my judgment generally of that you stand in doubt and dissent from others, to which I wish you as mine own heart to be conformable, and then doubtless you cannot err, but boldly may be glad in your troubles, and triumph at the hour of your death, that you shall die in the church of God a faithful martyr, and receive the crown of eternal glory. And thus much have I written upon the occasion of a vision before God unfeigned. But that you may not think that I go about to satisfy you with uncertain visions only, and not after God's word, I will take the ground of your letter, and especially answer to the same by scriptures, and by infallible reasons deduced out of the same, will prove the baptism of infants to be lawful, commendable, and necessary, whereof you seem to stand in doubt.

Indeed if you look upon the papistical synagogue only, which had corrupted God's word by false interpretations, and hath perverted the true use of Christ's sacraments, you might seem to have good handfast of your opinion against the baptism of infants. But forasmuch as it is of more antiquity, and hath it's beginning from God's word, and from the use of the primitive church, it must not in respect of the abuse in the popish church be neglected, or thought not expedient to be used in Christ's church. Auxentius, one of the Arian sect, with his adherents, was one of the first that denied the baptism of children, and next after him Pelagius the heretic, and some others there were in St. Bernard's time, as it doth appear by his writings, and in our days the Anabaptists, an inordinate kind of men stirred up by the devil, to the destruction of the gospel. But the catholic truth delivered unto us by the scriptures, plainly determineth, that all such are to be baptized, whom God acknowledgeth for his people, and voucheth them worthy of sanctification or remission of their sins. Therefore since that infants be in the number or scroll of God's people, and be partakers of the promise by their purification in Christ, it must needs follow thereby, that they ought to be baptized as well as those that can pro-feels their faith. For we judge the people of God as well by the free and liberal promise of God, as by the confession of faith. For to whomsoever God promiseth himself to be their God, and whom he acknowledgeth for his, those no man without great impiety may exclude from the number of the faithful. But God promiseth that he will not only be the God of such as do profess him, but also of infants, promising them his grace and remission of sins, as it appeareth by the words of the covenant made unto Abraham. "I will set my covenant between thee and me, faith the Lord, and between thy seed after thee in their generations, with an everlasting covenant, to be thy God, and the God of thy seed after thee." To which covenant circumcision was added, to be a sign of sanctification as well in children as in men; and no man may think that this promise is abrogated with circumcision and other ceremonial laws. For Christ came to fulfil the promises, and not to dissolve them. Therefore in the gospel he saith of infants, that is, of such as yet believed not, "Let the little ones come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Again, "It is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that any of these little ones do perish." Also, "He that receiveth one of these little ones receiveth me. Take heed therefore that ye despise not one of these babes, for I tell you their angels do continually see in heaven my Father's face." And what may be said more plain than this? It is not the will of the heavenly Father that the infants should perish, whereby we may gather, that he receiveth them freely unto his grace, although as yet they confess not their faith. Since then that the word of the promises, which is contained in baptism, pertaineth as well to children as to men, why should the sign of the promise, which is baptism in water, be withdrawn from children, when Christ himself commandeth them to be received of us, and promiseth the reward of a prophet to those that receive such a little infant, as he for an example did put before his disciples?

Now will I prove with manifest arguments that children ought to be baptized, and that the apostles of Christ did baptize children. The Lord commanded his apostles to baptize all nations; therefore also children ought to be baptized, for they are comprehended under this word, All nations.

Further, whom God doth account among the faithful, they are faithful, for it was said to Peter, "That thing which God hath purified, thou shalt not say to be common or unclean." But God doth repute children among the faithful: therefore, they are faithful, except we had rather to resist God, and seem stronger and wiser than he.

And without all doubt the apostles baptized those which Christ commanded: but he commanded the faithful to be baptized, among which infants are reckoned: the apostles then baptized infants.

The gospel is more than baptism, for Paul said, "The Lord sent me to preach the gospel, and not to baptize:" not that he denied absolutely that he was sent to baptize, but that he preferred doctrine before baptism, for the Lord commanded both to the apostles: but children be received by the doctrine of the gospel of God, and not refused: therefore what person being of reason may deny them baptism, which is a thing less than the gospel? For in the sacraments be two things to be considered, the thing signified, and the sign, and the thing signified is greater than the sign; and from the thing signified in baptism, children are not excluded; who therefore may deny them the sign, which is baptism in water?

St. Peter could not deny them to be baptized in water, to whom he saw the Holy Ghost given, which is the certain sign of God's people: for he saith in the Acts, "May any body forbid them to be baptized in water who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we?" Therefore St. Peter denied not baptism to infants, for he knew certainly both by the doctrine of Christ, and by the covenant which is everlasting, that the kingdom of heaven pertaineth to infants.

None are received into the kingdom of heaven but such such as God loveth, and which are indued with the Spirit: for who so hath not the Spirit of God, he is none of his. But infants are beloved of God, and therefore of his. But infants are beloved of God, and therefore want not the Spirit of God: wherefore if they have the Spirit of God as well as men, if they be numbered among the people of God as well as we that be of age, who (I pray you) may well withstand children to be baptized with water, in the name of the Lord?

The apostles in times past, being yet not sufficiently instructed, did murmur against those which brought their children unto the Lord, but the Lord rebuked them, and said, "Let the babes come unto me." Why then do not these rebellious Anabaptists obey the commandment of the Lord? For what do they now-a-days else that bring their children to baptism, than that they did in times past which brought their children unto the Lord, and our Lord received them, and putting his hands on them, blessed them, and both by words and by gentle behaviour towards them, declared manifestly that children be the people of God, and intirely beloved by him. But some will say, Why then did not Christ baptize them? Because it is written, Jesus himself baptized not, but his disciples.

Moreover, circumcision in the old law was administered to infants: therefore baptism ought to be administered in the new law unto children. For baptism is come in the stead of circumcision, as St. Paul witnesseth, saying to the Colossians, "By Christ ye are circumcised with a circumcision which is without hands, when ye put off the body of sin of the flesh, by the circumcision of Christ, being buried together with him through baptism." Behold, Paul calleth baptism the circumcision of a christian man, which is done without hands, but that with hands no man any longer ought to be circumcised, although the mystery of circumcision do still remain in faithful people.

To this I may add, that the servants of God were always ready to administer the sacraments to them for whom they were instituted. As for an example, we may behold Joshua, who most diligently procured the people of Israel to be circumcised before they entered into the land of promise; but since the apostles were the preachers of the word, and the very faithful servants of Jesus Christ, who may hereafter doubt that they baptized infants, since baptism is in the place of circumcision.

Item, The apostles did temperate all their doings to the shadows and figures of the Old Testament: therefore it is certain that they did temperate baptism accordingly to circumcision, and baptized children because they were under the figure of baptism; for the people of Israel passed through the Red Sea, and the bottom of the water of Jordan, with their children. And although the children be not always expressed, neither the women in the holy scriptures, yet they are comprehended and understood in the same.

Also the scripture evidently telleth us, that the apostles baptized whole families or households: but the children are comprehended in a family or household, as the chiefest and dearest part thereof: therefore we may conclude, the apostles did baptize infants or children, and not only men of lawful age. And that the house or household is taken for man, woman, and child, it is manifest in the 17th of Genesis; and also in that Joseph doth call Jacob with all his house, to come out of the land of Canaan into Egypt.

Finally, I can declare out of ancient writers, that the baptism of infants hath continued from the apostles' time unto ours, neither was it instituted by any councils, neither of the pope, nor of other men, but commanded from the scripture by the apostles themselves. Origen, upon the declaration of St. Paul's epistle to the Romans, expounding the 6th chapter saith, "That the church of Christ received the baptism of infants from the very apostles." St. Jerom maketh mention of the baptism of infants in the third book against the Pelagians, and in his epistle to Leta. St. Augustine reciteth, for this purpose, a place out of John, bishop of Constantinople, in his first book against Julian, chap. 2. and he again writing to St. Jerom, epist. 28. saith, "That St. Cyprian, not making any new decree, but firmly observing the faith of the church, judged with his fellow bishops, that as soon as one was born, he might be lawfully baptized." The place of Cyprian is to be seen in his epistle to Fidus.

Also St. Augustine, in writing against the Donatists, in the fourth book, chap. 23 and 24, saith, That the baptism of infants was not derived from the authority of man, neither of councils, but from the tradition or doctrine of the apostles.

Cyril, upon Leviticus, chap. 8, approveth the baptism of children and condemneth the iteration of baptism. These authorities of men I do alledge, not to tie the baptism of children unto the testimonies of men, but to shew how men's testimonies do agree with God's word, and that the verity of antiquity is on our side, and that the Anabaptists have nothing but lies for them, and new imaginations, which feign the baptism of children to be the pope's commandment.

After this will I answer to the sum of your arguments for the contrary. The first, which includeth all the rest, is, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the glad tidings to all creatures. He that believeth and is baptized, shall be saved: but he that believeth not, shall be damned," &c.

To this I answer, That nothing is added to God's word by baptism of children, as you pretend, but that is done which the same word doth require, for that children are accounted of Christ in the gospel among the number of such as believe, as it appeareth by these words, "He that offendeth one of these little babes which believe in me, it were better for him to have a mill-stone tied about his neck, and to be cast into the bottom of the sea." Where plainly Christ calleth such as be not able to confess their faith, Believers, because of his mere grace he reputeth them for believers. And this is no wonder so to be taken, since God imputeth faith for righteousness unto men that be of riper age: for both in men and children, righteousness, acceptation, sanctification, is of mere grace, and by imputation, that the glory of God's grace might be praised.

And that children of faithful parents are sanctified, and that among such as do believe, is apparent in the seventh chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians. And whereas you do gather by the order of the words in the said commandment of Christ, that children ought to be taught before they be baptized, and to this end you alledge many places out of the Acts, proving that such as confessed their faith first, were baptized: I answer, that if the order of words might weigh any thing in this cause, we have the scripture that maketh as well for us. For in St. Mark we read that John did baptize in the desert, preaching the baptism of repentance. In which place we see baptizing go before, and preaching to follow after.

And also I will declare this place of Matthew, exactly considered, to make for the use of baptism in children; for St. Matthew hath it written in this wise, "All power is given me (saith the Lord) in heaven and in earth," therefore going forth MATTHEW saith, that is, Disciple ye, (as I may express the signification of the word) or, Make or gather to me disciples of all nations. And following, he declareth the way how they should gather to him disciples out of all nations, "Baptizing them and teaching;" by baptizing and teaching ye shall procure a church to me. And both these aptly and briefly severally he setteth forth, saying, "Baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." Now then, baptism goeth before doctrine.

But hereby I do not gather, that the Gentiles who never heard any thing before of God, and of the Son of God, and of the Holy Ghost, ought to be baptized, neither would they permit themselves to be baptized before they knew to what end. But this I have declared to shew you upon how feeble foundation the Anabaptists be grounded. And plainly it is not true which they imagine of this text, that the Lord did only command such to be baptized whom the apostles had first of all taught taught. Neither here verily is signified who only are to be baptized, but he speaketh of such as be at perfect age; and of the first foundations of faith, and of the church to be planted among the Gentiles, which were as yet rude and ignorant of religion.

Such as be of age may hear, believe, and confess that which is preached and taught, but infants cannot: therefore we may justly collect, that he speaketh nothing here of infants or children. But for all this they ought not to be excluded from baptism.

It is a general rule, "He that doth not labour must not eat." But who is so barbarous as to think hereby, that children should be famished?

The Lord sent his apostles, at the beginning of his setting up his true religion, unto all nations, unto such as were both ignorant of God, and were out of the covenant of God; and truly such persons it behoved not first to be baptized, and afterward taught; but first to be taught, and after baptized. If at this day we should go to the Turks to convert them to the faith of Christ, verily first we ought to teach them, and afterwards baptize such as would yield to be the servants of Christ. Likewise the Lord himself in time past did, when first he renewed the covenant with Abraham, and ordained circumcision to be a seal of the covenant after that Abraham was circumcised. But he, when he perceived the infants also to pertain to the covenant, and that circumcision was the sealing up of the covenant, did not only circumcise Ishmael his son, that was 13 years of age, but all other infants that were born in his house, among whom we reckon Isaac.

Even so, faithful people who were converted from heathen idolatry by the preaching of the gospel, and confessing the faith, were baptized; when they understood their children to be counted among the people of God, and that baptism was the token of the children of God, they procured also their children to be baptized. Therefore, it is written, "Abraham circumcised all the male children in his house." In like manner we read in the Acts and writings of the apostles, that after the master of the house was turned to the faith, all the whole house was baptized. And as concerning those which of old time were compelled to confess their faith before they received baptism, which were called Catechumens, they were such as with our fore-fathers came from the Gentiles into the church, who being yet rude of faith, they did instruct in the principles of their belief, and afterward they did baptize them; but the same ancient fathers notwithstanding did baptize the children of faithful men, as I have already partly declared.

And because you do require a hasty answer of your letter of one that is but a dull writer, I am here enforced to cease particularly to go through your letter in answering thereto, knowing that I have fully answered every part thereof, in that I have already written, although not in such order as it had been meet, and as I purposed. But forasmuch as I understand that you will be no contentious man, neither in this matter, nor in any other contrary to the judgment of Christ's primitive church, which is the body and fulness of Christ, I desire you in the fulness of him, or rather Christ desireth you by me (that your joy may be perfect, whereto you are now called) to submit your judgment to that church, and to be at peace and unity in the same; that the coat of Christ, which ought to be without seam, but now, alas, most miserably is torn in pieces by many dangerous sects and damnable opinions, may appear to you in no part to have been rent, neither that any giddy head in these dog-days, might take an example by you to dissent from Christ's true church: I beseech thee, dear brother in the gospel, follow the steps of the faith of the glorious in the primitive church, and of such as at this day follow the same; decline from them neither to the right hand nor to the left. Then shall death, be it ever so bitter, be more sweet than this life: then shall Christ with all the heavenly Jerusalem triumphantly embrace your spirit with unspeakable gladness and exultation, who in this earth was content to join your spirit with their spirits, according as it is commanded by the word, that the spirit of the prophets should be subject to the prophets. One thing ask with David ere you depart, and require the same, that you may dwell with a full accord in his house, for there is glory and worship: and so with Simeon in the temple embracing Christ, depart in peace: to which peace Christ bring both you and me, and all our loving brethren that love God in the unity of faith, by such ways as shall please him, to his glory. Let the bitter passion of Christ, which he suffered for your sake, and the horrible torments which the good martyrs of Christ have endured before us, and also the inestimable reward of your life to come, which is hid-den yet a little while from you with Christ, strengthen, comfort, and encourage you to the end of that glorious race which you are in, Amen.

Your yoke-fellow in captivity for the verity of Christ's gospel, to live and die with you in the unity of faith.

JOHN PHILPOT.

Other letters were written by Mr. Philpot to divers persons, but these, as most principal, I have inserted. Amongst which I thought here not much impertinent to the place, to adjoin another certain letter of a godly and zealous gospeller (whose name in her writing doth not appear), who in defending and commending the quarrel of Mr. John Philpot, the famous and worthy martyr of Christ, was therefore troubled and brought before bishop Bonner. And therefore being appointed by the said bishop to appear upon a certain day to answer for herself: indeed kept not her day with the bishop, but instead of her appearance, sent him this letter here following.

"Woe be unto the idolatrous shepherds of England, that feed themselves. Should not the shepherds feed the flock? but ye have eaten the fat, ye have cloathed you with the wool; the best fed have ye slain, but the flock have ye not nourished, the weak have ye not holden up, the sick have ye not healed, the broken have ye not bound together, the outcasts have ye not brought again, the lost have ye not sought, but churlishly and cruelly have ye used them," Ezekiel xxxiv.

FORASMUCH (my lord) as my business is such that I cannot come to your lordship, according to my promise, I have been so bold to write these few words unto you, partly to excuse mine absence, and partly to answer your lordship's demands at my last most happy departure from you. As touching the breach of my promise with you in not coming again at the hour appointed, your lordship shall understand that I take the counsel of the angel, which warned the wise men not to come again to Herod according to their promise, but to return home again another way. Now, my lord, I perceive your lordship to be a more cruel tyrant than ever was Herod, and more desirous to destroy Christ in his poor members than ever he was, who to destroy Christ killed his own son, I thought good to take the angel's counsel, and to come no more to you; for I see that you are set all in a rage like a ravening wolf against the poor lambs of Christ, appointed to the slaughter for the testimony of the truth. Indeed you are called the common cut-throat, and general slaughter-slayer to all the bishops in England; and therefore it is wisdom for me and all other simple sheep of the Lord; to keep us out of your butcher's stall as long as we can: especially seeing that you have such store already, that you are not able to drink all their blood, lest you should break your belly; and therefore let them lie still and die with hunger. Therefore (my lord) I thought it good to tarry a while until your lordship's stomach were come to you a little better; for I do perceive by your great fat cheeks, that you lack no lamb's flesh yet, and belike you are almost glutted with supping so much blood, and therefore you will let some of the leanest die in prison, which will then be meat good enough for your barking beagles, Harpsfield and his fellows: but yet, my lord, it were a great deal more for your lordship's honour, if your chaplains chaplains might have the meat roasted in Smithfield at the fire of the stake, yea, and when it is something fat and fair liking; for now they have nothing but skin and bones, and if the dogs come hastily to it, they may chance shortly to be choaked, and then your hunting will be greatly hindered, if it be not altogether marred. I hear say, my lord, that some of the butcherly curs came of late to my house to seek their prey, and that they go round about the city (as David saith) grinning and grudging that they have not meat enough: therefore belike they have killed my poor brethren and sisters that have lain so long upon the butcherly stall, and eaten them up: for I hear say their friends could not be suffered to see them these three days and more; therefore I perceive now that if I had come again according to my promise, your lordship, like a ravening wolf, or else some of your hell-hounds, would quickly have worried me: but I see well my appointed time is not yet come, therefore I will yet live and thank God for my deliverance with continual songs of laud and praise. Thus have I been bold to trouble your lordship with telling you the truth, and the very cause that I came not to you again according to my unpurposed promise. I trust your lordship will take this in good part, and accept it as a lawful excuse, and not doubting but your lordship would have done the like if you had been in my case.

Now concerning the second part that caused me to write unto your lordship, which is to answer unto your subtle or rather cruel demand of my judgment of the death of that blessed martyr of Christ Jesus, good Mr. Philpot, I will answer your lordship simply and plainly, what peril soever shall come thereof. Truly, my lord, I do not only think, but I am also most certain and sure, that he was a very man of God, died a true martyr, and constant confessor of his dear Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to whom he did most faithfully commit his dear soul, who will surely keep the same with him in joy for evermore. Also, my lord, I do verily believe and know, that your lordship hath committed a most cruel murder in the unjust condemning and killing of him, and that you shall make as heavy an account for his blood, which shortly shall be required at your hand, as ever your great grandfather, cruel Cain, did or shall do for his innocent brother Abel. Moreover, because I am credibly informed, that your lordship doth believe, and have in secret said, that there is no hell, I certify you, that your lordship never did any thing in all your life that did so much redound to your lordship's dishonour, and perpetual shame and infamy, as your killing the body of this blessed prophet doth; especially seeing that he was none of your diocese, nor had offended any of your lordship's devilish and cruel laws. Verily I hear almost every body say in all places where I come, that your lordship is made the common slaughter-flave to all your fellows, bite-sheep bishops I would say; yea, the very papists themselves begin now to abhor your blood-thirstiness, and speak shame of your tyranny and cruelty. Believe me, my lord, every child that can any whit speak, can call upon your name and say, Bloody Bonner is bishop of London; and every man hath it as perfectly upon his finger ends as his Pater-noster, how many have you for your part burned with fire, and famished in prison; they say the whole sum amounteth to forty persons within this three quarters of a year. Therefore, my lord, though your lordship believeth that there is neither heaven nor hell, nor God nor devil; yet if your lordship loves your own honesty, which was lost long ago, you were best to cease from this cruel burning of true christian men, and also from murdering of some in prison; for that indeed offendeth men's minds most; yea, even your old friends, the rankest papists that be. For, say they, Felix the heathen ruler did not forbid Paul's friends to visit him in prison, and to bring him necessary relief; and therefore it is a very great shame and sin, to see a bishop that beareth the name of a christian, to be more cruel upon his poor brethren, than an Heathen, Turk, or Infidel.

These are men's sayings in every place, not only of this realm, but also of the most part of the world, and the common talk they have of your lordship; therefore I thought to be so bold with your lordship, as to tell you of it, though perchance you will give me but small thanks for my labour. Well, as for that, I put it to your lordship's choice, for I have as much already as I look for: finally, my lord, I will give you to understand, that the death of this constant martyr and valiant soldier of Jesus Christ, hath given a greater shake towards the overthrowing of your papistical kingdom, than you shall ever be able to recover again these seven years, do the best you can, and set as many crafty daubers to patch it up with untempered clay as you will; yea, though prating Pentleton, that wicked apostate, apply all his wily wits to help them. Verily, my lord, by all men's reports, his blessed life could never have done the like sorrow to Satan's synagogue, whereof some say your lordship is a mighty member, as his happy death hath done. You have broken a pot indeed, but the precious word contained therein is so notably therewith shed abroad, that the sweet savour thereof hath wonderfully well refreshed all the true household or congregation of Christ, that they cannot abide any more the stinking savour of your filthy ware that came from the dunghill of Rome, though your lordship's Judases do set them to sale every where to fill your bags. I put your lordship out of doubt, that if you do break any more such pots, you will marr your own market altogether: for I promise you, most men begin to mislike your devilish doings, and wonderfully to loathe your popish pedlary wares.

Thus have I (according to your lordship's command) shewed you simply what I think of that good man's death, whose blood crieth for vengeance against your lordship's butcherly bloody proceedings in the ears of the Lord of Hosts, who will shortly revenge the same upon your pilled pate, and upon the rest of your poll-shorn brethren, the very marked cattle of the great Antichrist of Rome. The measure of his iniquity is filled up to the brim, therefore God will shortly pour in double unto your deserved destruction. And then your new made profelytes will be glad to cover their crowns with filth and dirt (saving your lordship's reverence I should have said first). Well, I rather desire their conversion than confusion, the Lord send one of them shortly, as may be most to his glory, Amen.

I signify also unto your lordship, that the railing words which your lying preacher shewed forth of his filthy fountain upon Sunday, against the dear servant of God, good Mr. Philpot, do greatly redound to your lordship's dishonesty, and much deface your spiritual honour. Verily I see that the great wrath of God hath so blinded your eyes, that you see not what is with you, nor what is against you, but still you vomit out your own shame, and make all the world to wonder at you. Was it not enough for you to condemn him most unjustly, yea, contrary to your own laws, and to kill his innocent body most tyrannously, but you must also set a lying limb of the devil to blaspheme, slander, and belie him, now he is dead? O viperous generation, seed of the serpent, and right children of the devil: full well do you counterfeit your father's steps, whom Christ calleth a murderer, and a liar from the beginning; which two things are the only weapons of your war, wherewith you maintain all your mischief, that is to say, lying and murder; for those whom you cannot overcome with your lying persuasions, them you kill most cruelly, and then blaspheme and belie them with railing sentences when they are dead. But all this will not blind the people of God, nor yet make them any whit the less believe the truth, nor abate their love from the true preachers thereof, yea, it is a true sign and a token that they are the very disciples of Christ; for he hath said, "Blessed are ye when men revile you, and say all manner of evil sayings against you for my name's sake. Rejoice and be glad, for great is your reward in heaven." And doubtless great is that good man's reward in heaven by this time, as your lordship's damnation shall be great in hell, except you repent and cease from shedding innocent blood. But it is to be feared your heart is hardened as Pharaoh's was, seeing that with Judas you have sold and betrayed betrayed your master. Take heed, my lord, lest you come to the same end, or a worse than he did: for verily I cannot perceive how you should escape it long; therefore say not but that a woman gave you warning, if you like to take it. And as for the obtaining your popish purpose in suppressing the truth, I put you out of doubt, you shall not obtain it so long as you go the way to work as you do; for verily I believe that you have lost the hearts of twenty thousand that were rank papists within these twelve months.

It is found very true what one holy doctor saith, The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the gospel; when one is put to death, a thousand do rise for him. And that this is true, you may well perceive by the hearty love that the people shewed unto good Mr. Philpot at his going to his death. They went not about to make an idol of him, as your adders' brood would have men imagine; but they worshipped God who gave such strength to his dear child, to die so constantly for the testimony of his truth, to the utter destruction of that detestable idolatry which your lordship doth most devilishly maintain with the force of fire, faggots, and sword: yea, and rather than fail, to furnish men in prison again, as you have done already. It is reported by your own tormentors, that the six prisoners which you have in your prison, are put in six several places all the day, and every night brought together, and set in the stocks. Forsooth, my lord, this doth get you a foul name all about the country, and yet all will not help your lordship's pestilent purpose, but every way hinder the same. For Zorobabel will be found no liar; who said, The truth shall have victory. You do but strive against the stream, and kick against the pricks; the Lord doth laugh your doings to scorn, and will bring all your counsels and devices to nought (as knoweth the Lord God), who of his great mercy shortly convert your lordship, or utterly confound you, and get his name a glory over you, Amen.

Your lordship's suppliant, who prayeth daily to God that he may reward you according to your deeds, Anno 1556.

The History of SEVEN MARTYRS suffering together at London for the Testimony of Christ's Gospel.

THE catholic prelates of the pope's band being as yet not satisfied with this their one year's murdering of the reverend, learned, and principal members of Christ's church (whereof now there are but very few, who either were not cruelly consumed by fire, or else, to avoid their popish rage, compelled to flee their natural country), continued still this next year also, which was Anno 1556, in no less cruelty towards the poor, simple, and inferior sort of people (I mean in degree, though God be praised, not in steadfastness), having yet sometimes amongst them such as were both learned and of good estimation, as in the continuance of this story shall appear.

Wherefore (as the first fruits thereof) to begin this year with, about the 27th day of January, were burned in Smithfield at London these seven persons hereafter following, to wit:

Thomas Whittle, priest. Bartlet Green, gentleman. John Tudson, artificer. John Went, artificer. Thomas Browne. Isabel Foster, wife. Joan Warne, alias Lashford, maid.

All which seven, as they were burned together in one fire, so were they likewise all upon one sort and form of articles condemned in one day. However, forasmuch as the gifts of God in them were diverse (some more abounding in knowledge than others), their dealing withal were so diverse, as shall be more plainly perceived in the discoursing of their several processes hereafter following. And therefore for the better understanding hereof, I will first, (by the leave of the Lord) passing over their private articles and examinations had at sundry times in the bishop's house, set forth their general examinations in the public consistory, upon the bishop's articles there administered unto them, with their answers also to the same, according as they all agreed after one manner and sort together, as here by the words, both of the articles and their answers underwritten, may appear.

The Form and Words of Bishop BONNER's Articles administered to the Seven Persons above-mentioned, in his Consistory.

AND first to behold the manner of speech in these bishops, sitting in their majesty to terrify the ears of the simple with, let us hear the pontifical phrase of this bishop, beginning in this sort.

The within written articles, and every of them, and every part and parcel of them, we Edmund, by the permission of God, bishop of London, do object and administer to thee Thomas Whittle, &c. of our mere office, for thy soul's health, and for the reformation of thine offences and misdemeanors, admonishing thee in the virtue of obedience, and under the pains of both censures of the church, and also of other pains of the law, to answer fully, plainly, and truly to all the same.

FIRST, that thou N. hast firmly, steadfastly, and constantly believed in times past, and so dost now believe at this present, that there is here in earth a catholic church, in which catholic church the faith and religion of Christ is truly professed, allowed, received, kept and retained by all faithful and true christian people.

2. Item, That thou the said N. in times past hast also believed, and so dost believe at this present, that there are in the catholic church seven sacraments, instituted and ordained by God, and by the consent of the holy church allowed; approved, received, kept, and retained.

3. Item, That thou the said N. wast in times past baptized in the faith of the said catholic church, professing by thy godfathers and godmother, the faith and religion of Christ and the observation thereof, renouncing there the devil and all his pomps and works, and was by the said sacrament of baptism incorporated to the catholic church, and made a faithful member thereof.

4. Item, That thou the said N. coming to the age of fourteen years, and so to the age of discretion, didst not depart from the said profession and faith, nor didst mislike any part of the same faith or doings, but didst like a faithful christian person abide and continue in all the same for the space of certain years, ratifying and confirming all the same.

5. Item, That thou the said N. notwithstanding the premises, hast of late, that is to say, within these two years last past, within the city and diocese of London, swerved at the least way from some part of the said catholic faith and religion; and amongst other things thou hast misliked and earnestly spoken against the sacrifice of the mass, the sacrament of the altar, and the unity of the church, railing and maligning the authority of the see of Rome, and the faith observed in the same.

6. Item, That thou the said N. hast heretofore refused, and dost refuse at this present to be reconciled again to the unity of the church, not acknowledging and confessing the authority of the said see of Rome to be lawful.

7. Item, That thou the said N. misliking the sacrifice of the mass, and the sacrament of the altar, hast refused to come to thy parish-church to hear mass, and to receive the said sacrament, and hast expressly said, that in the said sacrament of the altar there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour Christ, really, substantially, and truly, but hast affirmed expressly, that the mass is idolatry and abomination, and that in the sacrament of the altar there is none other substance but only material bread and material wine, which are tokens of Christ's body and blood only, and that the substance of Christ's Christ's body and blood is no wife in the said sacrament of the altar.

8. Item, That thou the said N. being convented before certain judges or commissioners, for thy disorder herein, and being found obstinate, wilful, and heady, was by their commandment sent unto me, and my prison, to be examined by me, and process to be made against thee for thy offence herein.

9. Item, That all and singular the premises have been, and be true and manifest, and thyself not only suspected and accused thereof, but also culpable therein; and by reason of the same, you was and are of the jurisdiction of me, Edmund, bishop of London, and before me, according to the order of the ecclesiastical laws, are to be convented, and also by me to be punished and reformed.

Their Answers to the foregoing Articles.

TO the first article they altogether agreed, affirming the same to be true: John Tudson, and Thomas Brown, further adding, that the church of England, as it was at that present used, was no part of the true catholic church.

To the second article they answered, that they acknowledged but only two sacraments in Christ's catholic church, that is to say, baptism, and the supper of the Lord; John Went, and Tudson affirmed, that the sacrament of the altar, as it was then used, was an idol, and no sacrament at all.

To the third article they all agreed, and confessed it to be true, that they were baptized in the faith of Christ, and the church then taught; and afterwards during the time of king Edward the Sixth, they hearing the gospel preached, and the truth opened, followed the order of the religion and doctrine then used and set forth in the reign of the said king Edward.

To the fourth article they also agreed: but John Went added, that about seven years past, he then being about twenty years of age, began to mislike certain things used in the church of England, as the administration of the sacrament of the altar; likewise all the ceremonies of the said church, and did likewise at that present time mislike the same as they were used, although his godfathers and godmother promised for him the contrary.

John Tudson also said, that when he came to the years of discretion, that is, about nine years past, being about eighteen years of age, he did mislike the doctrine and religion then taught and set forth in the church of England, except in the time of king Edward, in whose reign the gospel was truly set forth: and he further said, that the doctrine set forth in the queen's reign was not agreeable to God's word, nor yet to the true catholic church that Christ speaketh of, &c.

Isabel Foster, with others, granted, adding likewise, and saying to the said four articles, that she continued in the same faith and religion which she was baptized in; after she came to the years of discretion as other common people did; however, blindly and without knowledge, till the reign of king Edward the Sixth: at which time she hearing the gospel truly preached and opened to the people, received thereupon the faith and religion then taught and set forth, &c.

To the fifth article, they answered and agreed the same to be true, according to the contents thereof: Thomas Whittle adding moreover, that he had swerved and gone away, and not in whole but in part, not from the whole catholic church, but from the church of Rome, in speaking against the mass, the sacrifice thereof, and the see of Rome.

Joan Lashford, alias Joan Warne, granted with the others the said article, added moreover, that she never hitherto swerved or went away, nor yet doth, from any part of Christ's catholic faith and religion; but said, that from the time she was eleven years of age, she had misliked the sacrifice of the mass, the sacrament of the altar, and the authority of the see of Rome, with the doctrine thereof, because they are against Christ's catholic church, and the right faith of the same.

Bartlet Green, answering to this article, said, that he swerved not from the catholic faith, but only from the church of Rome, &c.

To the sixth article they answered, and confessed the same to be true, rendering the cause thereof, because (said they) the same church and doctrine therein set forth and taught, disagreeeth from the unity of Christ's word, and the true catholic faith, &c.

Whereunto Bartlet Green answered, that he was contented to be reconciled to the unity of Christ's catholic church, but not to the church of Rome.

In like manner added also John Went.

To the seventh article they answered, and confessed the contents thereof to be true, giving withal the reason and cause of this their so doing, for that the mass with the sacrament thereof, as it was then used and set forth in the church of England, was dissonant to the word and teaching of the people, &c.

John Went furthermore said, as concerning the mass, that he believeth no less, but the mass which he calleth the supper of the Lord, as it is now used in the realm of England, is naught, full of idolatry, and against God's word so far as he seeth it; however, he saith, that since the queen's coronation by chance he hath been present where the mass hath been said, whereof he is sorry.

Isabel Foster also answering to the said articles, with the other before, confessed moreover, that since queen Mary's reign she had not heard mass, nor received the sacrament, but had refused to be in the place where it was administered: for she knew no such sacrament to be. And being demanded of her belief in the same, she said, that there was but one only material bread, and material wine, and not the real substance of the body of Christ in the same sacrament: for so she had been taught to believe by the preachers in the time of king Edward, whom she believed to have preached the truth in that behalf.

To the eighth article they grant the same, and the contents thereof to be so.

Thomas Whittle adding and affirming, that the lord chancellor that then was, sent him up to the bishop there present.

Bartlet Green added, that he was sent up to the said bishop, but for no offence herein mentioned.

John Went said, that Dr. Story, queen Mary's commissioner, examined him upon the sacrament, and because he denied the real presence, he presented this examinant to the bishop.

John Tudson, likewise examined by Mr. Cholmley, and Dr. Story upon the same matters, and for not coming to the church, and accused by the same, because he would not agree to them, was sent to the bishop.

Thomas Brown also said, that he for not coming to the church of St. Bride's, was brought by the constable to the bishop, &c.

Joan Warne confessed, that she was sent by Dr. Story to the bishop of London, about twelve weeks ago, since which time she hath continued with the said bishop.

To the ninth article they confess and say, that as they believe the premises before by them confessed to be true, so they deny not the same to be manifest, and that they are of the jurisdiction of London.

And thus having expressed their articles, with their answers jointly made unto the same, it remaineth further more fully to discourse the stories, and handling of all the seven aforesaid martyrs severally and particularly by themselves, first beginning with Thomas Whittle.

The History of THOMAS WHITTLE, Martyr.

MENTION was made before, in Mr. Philpot's story, of a married priest, whom he found in bishop Bonner's coal-house at his first going thither, in heaviness of mind and great sorrow, for recanting the doctrine which he had taught in king Edward's days, whose whose name was Thomas Whittle, of Essex; and thus lieth his story. This Thomas Whittle, after he had been expelled from the place in Essex where he served, went abroad where he might, now here and there, as occasion offered, preaching and sowing the gospel of Christ. At length being apprehended by one Edmund Alabaster, in hope of reward and promotion, which he miserably gaped after, he was brought first as prisoner before the bishop of Winchester, who then was lately fallen sick of his disease, whereof not long after he died most strangely. But the apprehender for his proffered service was highly checked by the bishop, asking if there were no man unto whom he might bring such rascals, but to him? Hence, (quoth he) out of my sight, thou varlet, why dost thou trouble me with such matters? The greedy cormorant being thus defeated of his desired prey, yet thinking to seek and to hunt further, carried his prisoner to the bishop of London, with whom what ill-usage this Whittle had, and how he was by the bishop beaten and buffeted about the face, by this his own narration in a letter sent to his friend, manifestly may appear.

Upon Thursday, which was the tenth of January, the bishop of London sent for me, Thomas Whittle, minister, out of the porter's lodge, where I had been all night, lying on the earth, on a little low bed, where I had as painful a night of sickness as ever I had. And when I came before him, he talked with me many things of the sacrament so grossly, as is not worthy to be rehearsed. And amongst other things, he asked me, if I would have come to mass that morning if he had sent for me. Whereunto I answered, that I would have come to him at his commandment, but to your mass (said I) I have small affection. At which answer he was sore displeased, and said, I should be fed with bread and water. And as I followed him through the great hall, he turned back, and beat me with his fist, first on the one cheek, and then on the other, as the sign of my beating did many days appear. And then he led me to a little salt-house, where I had neither straw nor bed, but lay two nights on a table, and slept soundly, I thank God.

Then, upon the Friday next after, I was brought to my lord, and he then gave me many fair words, and said he would be good to me. And so he going to Fulham, committed me to Dr. Harpsfield, that he and I, in that afternoon, should commune together, and draw out certain articles, whereunto if I would subscribe, I should be dismissed. But Dr. Harpsfield sent not for me till night, and then persuaded me very much to forsake my opinions. I answered, I held nothing but the truth, and therefore I could not so lightly turn therefrom. So I thought I should at that time have had no more ado: but he had made a certain bill, which the register pulled out of his bosom, and read it. The bill indeed was very easily made, and therefore more dangerous; for the effect thereof was to detest all errors and heresies against the sacrament of the altar, and other sacraments, and believe the faith of the catholic church, and live accordingly.

The copy of this bill here mentioned, if it please the gentle reader to peruse, so as it came to our hands, we have hereunto adjoined, written in their own words, as followeth.

The BILL of Submission, offered to THOMAS WHITTLE to subscribe.

I Thomas Whittle, priest, of the diocese of London, acknowledge and confess with my mouth, agreeing with my heart before you, reverend father in God, Edmund, bishop of London, my ordinary, that I do detest and abhor all manner of heresies and errors against the sacrament of the altar, or any of the sacraments of the church, which heresies and errors have heretofore been condemned in any wise by the catholic church: and I do protest and declare by these presents, that I do both now hold, and also intend by God's grace always hereafter to hold, observe, and keep, in all points the catholic faith and belief of Christ's church, according as this church of England, being a member of the said catholic church, doth now profess and keep, and in no wise to swerve, decline, or go from the said faith, during my natural life, submitting myself fully and wholly to you, reverend father, my said ordinary, in all things concerning my reformation and amendment at all times. In witness whereof I, the said Thomas Whittle, priest, have hereunto subscribed my name, written, &c.

To this bill I did also set my hand, being much desired and counselled so to do; and the flesh being always desirous to have liberty, I considered not thoroughly the inconvenience that might come thereupon; and respite I desired to have had, but earnestly they desired me to subscribe. Now when I had so done, I had little joy thereof; for by and by my mind and conscience told me by God's word that I had done evil, by such a slight means to shake off the sweet cross of Christ: and yet it was not my seeking, as God knoweth, but altogether came of them. O the crafty subtilty of Satan in his members! Let every man that God shall deliver into their hands take good heed, and cleave fast to Christ: for they will leave no corner of his conscience unsought, but will attempt all guileful and subtil means to corrupt him, to fall both from God and his truth. But yet let no man despair of God's help, for Peter did fall and rise again. And David saith, "A righteous man though he fall, he shall not be cast away: for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand." For I for my part have felt my infirmities, and yet I found God's present help and comfort in time of need, I thank him therefore.

The night after I had subscribed I was sore grieved, and for sorrow of conscience could not sleep. For in the deliverance of my body out of bonds, which I might have had, I could find no joy nor comfort, but still was in my conscience tormented more and more, being assured by God's Spirit and his word, that I through evil counsel and advice had done amiss. And both with disquietude of mind, and with my other cruel handling, I was sickly, lying upon the ground when the keeper came; and so I desired him to pray Dr. Harpsfield to come to me, and so he did.

And when he came, and the register with him, I told him that I was not well at ease, but especially I told him I was grieved very much in my conscience and mind because I had subscribed. And I said that my conscience had so accused me, through the just judgment of God and his word, that I had felt hell in my conscience, and Satan ready to devour me: and therefore I pray you, Mr. Harpsfield, (said I) let me have the bill again, for I will not stand to it. So he gently commanded it to be fetched, and gave it me, and suffered me to put out my name, whereof I was right glad when I had so done, although death should follow. And hereby I had experience of God's providence and mercy towards me, who trieth his people, and suffereth them to fall, but not to be lost: for in the midst of this temptation and trouble, he gave me warning of my deed, and also delivered me; his name be praised for evermore, Amen.

Neither devil nor cruel tyrant can pluck any of Christ's sheep out of his hand. Of which flock of Christ's sheep I trust undoubtedly I am one, by means of his death and blood-shedding, which shall at the last day stand at his right-hand, and receive with others his blessed benediction. And now, being condemned to die, my conscience and mind, I praise God, is quiet in Christ, and I by his grace am very willing and content to give over this body to the death, for the testimony of his truth and pure religion, against Antichrist and all his false religion and doctrine. They that report otherwise of me, speak not truly. And as for Fountain, I saw him not all this while.

By me THOMAS WHITTLE, Minister.

Concerning

Concerning the troubled mind of this good man, and tearing his name out of the bill, here followeth the report of the same, written in the letters both of the said Mr. Harpsfield, and also of Johnson the register, being then present thereat, and reporters of the same unto the bishop, as in their letters hereto annexed is to be seen.

Mr. HARPSFIELD's Letter to BONNER, Bishop of London, concerning Mr. WHITTLE.

PLEASE your good lordship to understand, that yesterday I dined with my lord of Exeter, who soon after my first coming to him, asked me, what news? I answered, none but good that I had heard. No? said he: why, it is a rumour in the city, that tomorrow the queen's grace will take her journey towards the king. I answered, that I thought it not to be any whit true, but an invention of heretics: yea, and further, said he, there is a report made abroad of my lord your master, that he is in discomfort, and therefore will suffer no man to come unto him. When I heard thus much, I began to laugh, and to declare how untrue this report was: so that my lord (who before was very sad) afterward, knowing the truth, rejoiced very much to hear that all was well with your lordship, and desired me to have his hearty commendations to your lordship.

One of my lord of Pembroke's retinue, a very handsome man, and, as far as I can yet learn, a catholic, is a suitor to your lordship to have license to erect a school: the order which he intendeth to use, is contained in this printed paper, which I send here inclosed to your lordship. I would be glad for my lord of Pembroke's sake, that he understood, that upon my motion your lordship were content he should teach as he intendeth. Mr. Johnson and I have travailed with the priest, and he hath subscribed his name to this draught which is here inclosed, and hath promised he will stand to the same before your lordship.

When I had written thus much, suddenly came tidings to me, that he was turned the other side of Jordan. Cluney coming to the priest, found him lying prostrate, and groaning as though he should have died forthwith. Then Cluney took him up, and set him upon a stool, and came to me, and told me of the matter. It happened that Mr. Johnson was with me, and we went to this fond heretic, and found him lying all along, holding his hands up, and looking hypocritically towards heaven. I caused Thomas More and Cluney to set him on the stool, and with much ado at length he told me, that Satan had been with him in the night, and told him that he was damned, and, weeping, he prayed Mr. Johnson and me to see the bill whereunto he subscribed, and when he saw it, he tore his name, to wit, out of the book of the living. Methinks by him he will needs burn a faggot, neither is there any other likelihood of the young woman. I have inquired of the two persons who sue to have a license to eat flesh. And the woman of Christ-church is indeed very much diseased, and hath been long diseased, and she and her husband both catholics. Of the other yet I can learn nothing. Thus Jesus evermore preserve your good lordship, and my mistress, your lordship's sister, with all yours. This present Saturday.

Your lordship's most bounden servant,

NICHOLAS HARPSFIELD.

Another Letter of ROBERT JOHNSON, Register, touching THOMAS WHITTLE, written to BONNER, Bishop of London.

MY bounden duty premised, pleaseth your lordship to understand, that this last Friday in the afternoon, Mr. Archdeacon of London did diligently travail with Sir Thomas Whittle, priest. I being present, and perceiving his conformity, as outwardly appeared, desired this submission, and he being content therewith, did subscribe the same. But now this Saturday morning Mr. Archdeacon and I, upon Cluney's report, declaring that he feigned himself to be distracted of his senses, went unto him, to whom he declared, that Satan, in the night-time, appeared unto him, and said that he was damned, for what he had done against his conscience in subscribing to the said submission, with other like words. And then Mr. Archdeacon, at his earnest request, delivered unto him the submission. And thereupon the said Whittle did tear out his subscription, made in the foot of the same, as your lordship shall perceive by the submission sent now unto your lordship by Mr. Archdeacon; wherewith the said Whittle was somewhat quieted.

No. 37.

And as touching Joan Lashford, Mr. Archdeacon did likewise travail with her, and shewing her Sir Thomas Whittle's submission, which I read unto her twice, demanded if she could be content to make the like submission; and she desired respite until this morning. And being now immediately demanded, in like wise faith, that she will not make any thing in writing, nor put any sign thereunto. Mr. Archdeacon and I intend this afternoon to examine the said Sir Thomas upon articles: for as yet there appeareth nothing in writing against him, as knoweth Almighty God, who preserve your good lordship in prosperity with honour long to endure.

From London this Saturday.

By your lordship's daily beads-man,
and bounden servant,

ROBERT JOHNSON.

The Condemnation and Martyrdom of Mr. THOMAS WHITTLE.

AT his last examination before the bishop upon the 14th day of January, 1556, bishop Bonner, with others sitting in his consistory in the afternoon, first called forth Thomas Whittle, with whom he began in effect as followeth: Because you be a priest (said he) as I and other bishops here be, and did receive the order of priesthood after the right and form of the catholic church, you shall not think but I will administer justice as well unto you as unto others. And then the said Bonner, in further communication, did charge him, that where in times past he said mass according to the order then used, the same Whittle now of late had spoken and railed against the same, saying, that it was idolatry and abomination. Whereunto Thomas Whittle answering again, said, That at such a time as he so said mass, he was then ignorant, &c. adding moreover, that the elevation of the sacrament at the mass, giveth occasion of idolatry to them that be ignorant and unlearned.

After this the bishop making haste to the articles (which in all his examinations he ever harped upon) came to this article, That thou wast in times past baptized in the faith of the catholic church.

To this the said Whittle inferred again, I was baptized in the faith of the catholic church, although I did forsake the church of Rome. And you, my lord, do call these heresies which are no heresies, and do charge me therewith as heresies, and you ground yourself upon that religion which is not agreeable to God's word, &c.

Then the said Thomas Whittle was again admonished, and with persuasions intreated by the bishop; who because he would not agree unto the same, the bishop forthwith proceeded first to his degradation. The order and manner of which their popish and most vain degradation, may be seen before in the history of bishop Hooper.

Then Whittle, in the midst of the ceremonies, when he saw them so busy in degrading him, after their father the pope's pontifical fashion, said unto them, Paul and Titus had not so much to do with their priests and bishops. And farther, speaking to the bishop, he said unto him, My lord, your religion standeth most with the church of Rome, and not with the catholic church of Christ.

The bishop after this, according to his accustomed formal proceedings, tried him yet again with words, rather than with substantial arguments, to conform him to his religion. Who then refusing so to do, said, As for your religion, I cannot be persuaded that it is according to God's word.

The bishop then asked, what fault he found in the administration of the sacrament of the altar?

Whittle answered and said, It is not used according to Christ's institution, in that it is privately and not openly done. And also because it is administered but in one kind to the lay-people, which is against Christ's ordinance. Farther, Christ commanded it not to be elevated nor adored: for the adoration and elevation cannot be proved by scripture.

Well, said Bonner, my lords here and other learned men have shewed great learning for thy conversion, wherefore if thou wilt yet return to the faith and religion of the catholic church, I will receive thee thereunto, and not commit thee to the secular power, &c. To make short, Whittle, strengthened with the grace of the Lord, stood strong and immovable in what he had affirmed. Wherefore the sentence being read, the next day following he was committed to the secular power, and so in a few days after brought to the fire with the other six above-named, sealing up the testimony of his doctrine with his blood, which he willingly and cheerfully gave for witness of the truth.

LETTER I.

From THOMAS WHITTLE to Mr. JOHN CARELESS, Prisoner in the King's-Bench.

THE peace of God in Christ be with you continually, dearly beloved brother in Christ, with the assistance of God's grace and Holy Spirit, to the working and performing of those things which may comfort and edify his church (as you daily do) to the glory of his name, and the increase of your joy and solace of soul in this life, and also your reward in heaven with Christ our captain, whose faithful soldier you are, in the life to come, Amen.

I have greatly rejoiced (my dear heart) with thanks to God for you, since I have heard of your faith and love which you bear towards God and his saints, with a most godly ardent zeal to the virtue of Christ's doctrine and religion, which I have heard by the report of many, but especially by the declaration of that valiant captain in Christ's church, that stout champion in God's cause, that spectacle to the world, I mean our good brother Philpot, who now lieth under the altar, and sweetly enjoyeth the promised reward. And especially I and my condemned fellows give thanks to God for your loving and comfortable letter in the deepness of our trouble (after the flesh) sent unto us to the consolation of us all, but especially to me, most sinful wretch on my own behalf, but happy, I hope through God's loving-kindness in Christ shewed unto me; who suffered me to faint and fall through human infirmity, by the working of the arch-enemy in his sworn soldiers the bishops and priests. In whom so lively appeareth the very visage and shape of Satan, that a man (if it were not prejudice to God's word) might well affirm them to be devils incarnate, as I by experience do speak. Wherefore, whosoever shall for conscience-matter come into their hands, had need of the wiliness of the serpent to save his head, though it be with the wounding of his body, and to take diligent heed how he consenteth to their wicked writings, or setteth his hand to their conveyances.

So did they assault me and craftily tempt me to their wicked ways, or at least to a denial of my faith and true opinions, though it were but by colour and dissimulation. And (alas) something they did prevail. Not that I did any thing at all like their opinions and false papistical religion, or else doubted of the truth wherein I stand, but only the infirmity of the flesh beguiled me, desiring liberty by an unlawful means; God lay it not to my charge at that day, and so I heartily desire you to pray. However, uncertain I am whether more profit came thereby: profit to me, in that God suffered Satan to buffet me by his aforesaid minister of mischief, shewing me mine infirmity, that I should not boast nor rejoice in myself, but only in the Lord. Who, when he had led me to hell in my conscience, through the respect of his fearful judgments against me for my fearfulness, mistrust, and crafty cloaking in such spiritual and weighty matters, yet brought me from thence again to the magnifying of his name, suspecting of flesh and blood, and consolation of mine own soul, or else that I might feel disprofit in offending the congregation of God, which peradventure will rather adjudge my fall to come of doubtfulness in my doctrine and religion, than of human imbecility.

Well, of the heavy burden of a troubled conscience for denying or dissembling the known verity, I by experience could say very much more, which perhaps I may declare by writing, to the warning of others, if God grant time: for now am I and my fellows ready to go hence even for Christ's cause; God's name be praised who hath hereto called us. Pray, I beg you, that we may end our course with joy, and at your appointed time you shall come after. But as the Lord hath kept you, so will he preserve your life still, to the intent you should labour (as you do) to appease and convince these ungodly contentions and controversies, which now do too much reign, brawling about terms to no edification. God is dishonoured, the church disquieted, and occasion to speak evil of the gospel ministered to our adversaries. But such is the subtlety of Satan, that whom he cannot win with gross idolatry in open religion, then he seeketh to corrupt and deceive in opinions, in a private profession. But here I will abruptly leave, lest with my rude and simple vein I should be tedious unto you, desiring you, (my loving brother) if it shall not seem grievous unto you, to write unto me and my fellows yet once again, if you have leisure, and we time to the same.

Provide me Mr. Philpot's nine examinations for a friend of mine, and I shall pay you therefore, by the leave of Almighty God our heavenly Father, who correcteth all his dear children in this world, and trieth the faith of his saints through many tribulations, that being found constant to the end, he may crown his own gifts in them, and in heaven highly reward them; whither I trust to go before, looking for you to follow (my faithful friend) that we may sing perpetual praise to our loving Lord God for victory over Satan and sin, won for us by Jesus Christ God and man, our only and sufficient Saviour and advocate, Amen.

Farewel, and pray in faith.

Your's, THOMAS WHITTLE, minister, and now condemned to die for the gospel's sake, Jan. 21, 1556.

All my fellows salute you. Salute all our faithful brethren with you.

LETTER II.

From Mr. WHITTLE to his dear Friend and Brother JOHN WENT, and other his Fellow-Prisoners in Lollards'-Tower.

HE that preserved Joseph, prisoner in Egypt, fed Daniel in the lion's den, and delivered Paul, Peter, and the apostles out of prison, vouchsafe of his goodness to keep, feed, and deliver you, my good brother Went, with the other our fellow-soldiers your prison-fellows, as may be most to his glory, to your consolation, and the edification of his church.

I cannot but praise God most earnestly, when I hear of your constancy in the faith, and joy in the cross of Christ, which you now bear and suffer together, with many other good members of Christ, which is a token that by Christ you are counted worthy of the kingdom of God, as St. Paul saith. And though the world counteth the yoke and cross of Christ as a most pernicious and hurtful thing, yet we which have tasted how friendly friendly the Lord is, cannot but rejoice in this persecution as touching ourselves; inasmuch as the cause for which we suffer is the Lord's cause and not our's, at whose hand, if we endure to the end, we shall receive through his liberal promise in Christ, not only a great reward in heaven, but also in the mean season be sure to be defended and cared for, so that we shall lack no necessary things, neither a hair of our heads shall perish without his knowledge. O what is he that would mistrust, or not gladly serve so loving a Father! O how unhappy are they that forsake him, and put their trust in man; but how blessed are they that for his love and his holy word's sake, in these troublesome days do commit their souls and bodies into his hands with well-doing, counting it greater happiness and riches to suffer rebuke with Christ and his church, than to enjoy the pleasures of this life for a short season? This cross that we now bear hath been common to all the faithful from Abel hitherto, and shall be to the end, because the devil having great wrath against God and his Christ, cannot abide that he should for his manifold mercies be lauded and magnified, and Christ to be taken and believed upon for our only sufficient Redeemer, Saviour, and Advocate: and therefore because we will not deny Christ, nor dissemble with our faith, but openly protest and profess the same before the world, he seeketh by all means to stir up his wicked members to persecute and kill the bodies of the true christians; as St. John saith, "The devil shall cast some of you into prison." And David saith, "I believed, and therefore have I spoken, but I was sore troubled." Notwithstanding this, go forward, dear brethren, as ye have begun, to fight the Lord's battle, considering Christ the captain of your war, who will both fight for you, give you victory, and also highly reward your pains. Consider to your comfort the notable and chief shepherds and soldiers of Christ, which are gone before us in these days, I mean those learned and godly bishops, doctors, and other ministers of God's word; whose faith and examples we that are inferiors ought to follow; as St. Paul saith, "Remember them that have declared unto you the word of God, the end of whose conversation see that you look upon, and follow their faith." The grace and blessing of God, with the ministry of his holy angels, be with you for ever, Amen. All my prison-fellows greet you. From the Coal-house, this 4th of December.

By your poor brother, THOMAS WHITTLE, an unworthy minister of Christ, now his prisoner for the gospel's sake, Amen.

LETTER III.

From Mr. WHITTLE to all the true Professors and Lovers of GOD's Holy Gospel, within the City of London.

THE same faith for which Abraham was counted righteous, and Mary blessed, the Lord God increase and make stable in your hearts, my dear and faithful brethren and sisters of London, for ever and ever, Amen.

Dearly beloved, be not troubled in this heat which is now come amongst you to try you, as though some strange thing had happened unto you, but rejoice inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's passions, that when his glory appeareth, ye may be merry and glad, &c. Out of these words of St. Peter I gather more especially these four notes. First, that persecution happeneth to Christ's church for their trial, that is, for the probation and proof of their faith. Which faith, like as it is known with God in the depth of our hearts, so will he have it made manifest to the whole world through persecution, that so it may evidently appear that he hath such a church and people upon earth, which so trusteth in him and feareth his holy name, that no kind of persecution, pains, nor death, shall be able to separate them from the love of him. And thus was Abraham tried, and Job tempted, that their faith, which before lay hid almost in their hearts, might be made known to the whole world to be so steadfast and strong, that neither the devil, natural love, nor any other enemy could be able to bereave them thereof. Whereby also God was to be magnified, who hath tried his people by many tribulations, and also standeth by them in the midst of their troubles, to deliver them by life or death as he seeth best: like as he assisted Lot and delivered him out of his enemy's hands; Joseph out of the hands of his brethren, and out of prison; Paul from his enemies in Damascus, and the apostles out of the stocks and prison.

These with many more he delivered to life; and also he delivered Abel, Eleazar, Stephen and John Baptist, with many others by death, and hath also by the trial of their faith made them good precedents and examples to us and all that come after, to suffer affliction in the like cause: as St. James saith, Take, my brethren (saith he) the prophets for an example of suffering adversity and of long patience, which spake unto you in the name of the Lord: behold, we count them happy which endure. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have known what end the Lord made with him, for the Lord is very pitiful and merciful. Also the Lord trieth us, to let us see our own hearts and thoughts, that no hypocrisy or ambition deceive us, and that the strong in Christ may pray that he fall not but endure to the end; and that those that fall through fearful infirmity, might speedily repent and rise again with Peter; and also that the weak ones might bewail their weakness, and cry with David, Psal. vi. "Have mercy upon me, O Lord, for I am weak: O Lord, heal me, for all my bones are vexed."

Of this opening of the heart by persecution spake holy Simeon to Mary, Christ's mother, when he said, The sword, that is, the cross of persecution shall pierce thy soul, that the thoughts of many hearts may be opened. For like as a king that should go to battle, is compelled to look in his coffers what treasure he hath, and also what number and puissance of men and weapons he hath, so that if he himself be unready and unarmed to fight with his enemy, he ceaseth and taketh truce for a time: even so we by persecutions have our hearts opened, that we may look therein to see what faith in Christ we have, and what strength to withstand the enemies, and to bear the cross, that if we be rich in these treasures, we might rejoice, and valiantly go to battle; or if we want these things, we might with all speed call and cry upon him who giveth all good gifts to those that ask them. Item, The cross trieth the good people from the bad, the faithful from the worldlings and hypocrites, and also cleanseth and scoureth the faithful hearts from all corruption and filthiness, both of the flesh and the spirit. And even as iron, except it be often scoured, will soon wax rusty; so except our sinful hearts and flesh be often scoured with the whetstone of the cross, they will soon corrupt and overgrow with the rust of filthiness and sin. And therefore it is meet and good for us (as the wise man saith) that as gold and silver is tried in the fire, so should the hearts of acceptable men be tried in the furnace of adversity. Abide the trial (dear friends), that ye may obtain the crown of life. Fight manfully in this the Lord's cause, that ye may obtain a glorious victory here, and receive greater reward in heaven hereafter.

As ye are called christians, and would be angry to be called Jews or Turks, so declare your christianity by following the steps of Christ, whose name ye bear; suffer with him and for his gospel's sake, rather than deny him or defile your faith and conscience with false worshipping of Romish religion.

Take up your cross (my hearts) now when it is offered you, and go up with Christ to Jerusalem amongst the bishops, priests, and rulers, if God call you thereto, and they will anon send you to Calvary: from whence (dying in the cause of the gospel, wherein our good preachers and brethren have given their lives) your souls (I warrant you) through Christ Jesus shall ascend to God that gave them, and that body shall come after at the last day, and so shall ye dwell with the Lord for ever in unspeakable joy and bliss. O blessed are they that that suffer persecution for righteousness' sake, as Christ's people in this Jewish England now doth; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. O my beloved, set your minds on this kingdom, where Christ our head and king is; considering that as the brute beast looketh downwards with the face towards the earth; so man is made contrariwise with his face looking upwards towards the heavens, because his conversation should be in heaven and heavenly things, and not upon the earth and earthly things, as St. Paul saith, Coloss. iii. Set your mind on things that are above, where Christ is. And again he saith, Phil. iii. Our conversation is in heaven, from whence we look for our Saviour, who will change our vile bodies, and make them like to his glorious body. O the glorious estate that we be called unto! The Lord preserve us harmless unto his eternal kingdom through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

The second thing that I note in the aforesaid words of Peter, is, that he calleth persecution no strange thing. And truth it is: for which of the prophets were not persecuted, with Christ and his apostles, and some of them in the end cruelly killed for the truth's sake? Cain killed Abel, Isaac was persecuted of Ishmael, Jacob was hated of Esau, Joseph was imprisoned and set in the stocks, the prophet Isaiah was cut in two with a saw, Jeremiah was stoned, Micaiah was buffeted and fed with bread and water, Elias was sore persecuted, Eleazar, and the woman with her seven sons, were cruelly killed. What Christ and the apostles suffered is well known. So that by many tribulations (as Paul saith, Acts xiv.) we must enter into the kingdom of heaven. All the holy prophets, Christ and his apostles, suffered such afflictions not for evil doing, but for preaching God's word, for rebuking the world of sin, and for their faith in Jesus Christ.

This is the ordinance of God (my friends), this is the high way to heaven, by corporal death to eternal life, as Christ saith, John v. He that heareth my words, and believeth in him that sent me, hath eternal life, and shall not come into judgment, but is escaped from death to life. Let us never fear death, which is killed by Christ, but believe in him, and live for ever, as St. Paul saith, Rom. viii. There is no damnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, which walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit. And again, Paul saith, 1 Cor. xv. Death, where is thy sting? Hell, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God, which hath given us the victory through Jesus Christ.

Besides this, ye have seen, and daily do see, the blood of your good preachers and brethren, which hath been shed in the gospel's cause in this sinful Sodom, this bloody Jerusalem, this unhappy city of London. Let not their blood be forgotten, nor the blood of your good bishop Ridley, who like a shepherd, to your comfort and example, hath given his life for his sheep. Good St. Paul saith, Heb. xiii. Remember them that have spoken to you the word of God, and look upon the end of their conversation, and follow their faith.

The devil ever stirreth up false teachers, as he hath done now over all England, as Peter, Paul, and Jude prophesied it should be, to poison and kill our souls with the false doctrine. And where he faileth of his purpose that way, then moveth he his members to persecute the silly carcasses of the saints, because they will not deny nor dissemble their pure faith in our living Christ, and confess a dead broadly Christ, and honour the same as Christ God and man, contrary to God's commandment, Exod. xx.

This is the working of Satan, who knowing his own just damnation, would have all mankind to be partakers with him of the same; such a mortal hatred beareth he against God and his people. And therefore when this wicked tempter could not kill Christ, with subtil temptation to fall down and worship him, then he stirred up his servants the bishops and pharisees to kill his body, whereby notwithstanding the devil lost his title and interest which he had to man's soul, and man by his precious passion and death was ransomed from the devil, death and hell, to immortality and life everlasting: and so when Satan thought to have won all in killing of Christ, he lost all: and so shall he do in us, if we abide constant and strong in the faith of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ unto the end. God grant it for his mercy's sake in Christ. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him. Amen.

Wherefore (my hearty beloved brethren and sisters) be of good comfort through Jesus Christ, for he that is in us is stronger than he that is in the world. Therefore draw ye near to God, and he will draw near to you. Resist the devil, and he will (as St. James saith) flee from you. Beware of the leaven of the pharisees. Touch not pitch lest ye be defiled therewith. Eat no swine's flesh, for it is against the law; I mean, defile not yourselves either inwardly or outwardly with this false and wicked religion of Antichrist: for it is nothing else but pitch and swine's flesh. Beware of the beast's mark, lest ye drink of the cup of God's wrath. If God hath given you knowledge and faith, dissemble not therewith. Deny not the known verity before men, lest Christ deny you before his Father. Come away from Babylon, as St. John biddeth you, Rev. xviii. and touch no unclean thing, but separate yourselves from the company of the ungodly, as St. Paul commandeth you. Whatsoever you have done amiss heretofore, now repent ye and amend: for with the Lord there is mercy and plenteous redemption.

The third thing and note which I gather out of the aforesaid words of Peter, is this, that he saith, Rejoice, because ye are partakers of Christ's passion. Our sufferings (my well beloved) are Christ's sufferings, and that injury that is done to us for his sake, he reckoneth it to be done to himself, as he said to St. Paul, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? Therefore we ought to rejoice in our sufferings, as St. Paul writeth, which we suffer with Christ, and one with another, as St. Peter said, and to fulfil that which is behind of the passions of Christ in our flesh; which Christ hath, by his passion, fully redeemed and saved us in his own person: howbeit, his elect must suffer with him and for him unto the world's end, that he may be glorified in them, and they thereby corrected and cleansed from sin in this world, and be made more meet temples for the Holy Ghost, and also obtain a great reward in heaven for their suffering for righteousness' sake, according to his promise. And therefore I say (my brethren) rejoice in the Lord always, and again I say, rejoice. Let us rejoice in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, whereby the world is crucified to us, and we to the world.

And why should we so greatly rejoice in the cross of Christ, which we now suffer? Because (saith St. Peter) when his glory appeareth, we may be merry and glad. And this is the fourth note that I gather out of his words above written. Wherein is set out the reward of suffering, not to be had in this world; but at his coming to judgment when we shall be raised again; and then shall they that have sown in tears reap in joy, as Christ saith, Blessed are they that weep here, for they shall laugh. Blessed are ye when men hate you, thrust you out of their company, railing on you, and abhorring your name as an evil thing for the Son of man's sake: rejoice ye in that day and be glad, for your reward is great in heaven.

Wherefore (my dearly beloved) through the hope of this heavenly joy and reward, which he that cannot lie hath promised (which joy is so great that no ear hath heard, no eye hath seen, nor the heart can think, where we shall dwell for ever in the heavenly city, the celestial Jerusalem, in the presence of God the Father, and Jesus Christ our Mediator, as Paul saith, and in the company of innumerable angels, and with the spirits and souls of all faithful and just men), rejoice and be glad: and seeing ye be called to so great glory, see that you make your election and vocation sure by good works, and especially by suffering adversity for the gospel's sake: for it is given us of God, saith St. Paul, not only to believe in Christ, but also to suffer for his sake. Continue in prayer, and pray for me, that I may end my course with joy. Have brotherly love amongst yourselves, which is a token that ye be Christ's disciples. Edify and comfort one another in the word of

of the Lord, and the God of peace and love be with you always, Amen. For your liberality and kindness shewed upon the prisoners and afflicted people of God in this time of persecution, the Lord will reward you when he cometh to reward every man according to his deeds, and will not leave a cup of cold water bestowed upon his faithful people unrewarded. God make you rich in all grace, that ye always having sufficient, may be rich unto all manner of good works.

The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, be with you always. Amen.

Your brother now in bonds for the gospel,

THOMAS WHITTLE.

LETTER IV.

From Mr. WHITTLE to his loving and faithful Brother, JOHN CARELESS, Prisoner in the King's-Bench.

THE same faith for which Abraham was accounted just, and Mary blessed, whereby also all just men live, the Lord God our loving Father increase and establish in you and me, to the obtaining of eternal life in our alone and sweet Saviour Jesus Christ, Amen.

I cannot worthily and sufficiently praise God (my heartily beloved brother) for the consolation and joy that I have received by reason of your loving letters, repenting me much that I being so long so near you, did not endeavour to stir up familiarity and communication between us by writing, to mutual consolation in Christ. For what is there upon earth wherein to rejoice (where all things are transitory and vain, yea man himself respecting this life) but, as David saith, Psal. xvi. The faints that dwell upon the earth, and such as excel in virtue? But here now I consider, that if the fellowship, love, and joy of faithful men and children of God being as we now be, in double bondage, the body within clay walls, and the soul within these frail earthly bodies, be so great and comfortable; how unspeakable will these joys be, when we shall be delivered from all corruption into the glorious liberty of the sons of God? where we shall be present together continually in our glorified bodies, beholding the face of our heavenly Father (whom now we see but in the glass of faith) with his dear Son Christ our Redeemer and brother, and the blessed company of angels, and all faithful saved souls.

Oh the incomparable good things, and heavenly treasures laid up for us in heaven by Jesus Christ; for the obtaining whereof, we ought to set light by all temporal grief and transitory afflictions, so much the more, in that our good God is faithful, and will not suffer us to be tempted above our strength, and that namely in the end of our life, when the tree where it falleth lieth still, as the preacher saith, Eccles. xi. for else before the end he suffereth his sometimes to fall, but not finally to perish: as Peter sinked upon the sea, but yet was not drowned; and sinned grievously upon the land through infirmity denying his master, but yet found mercy: for the righteous falleth often times. And Christ's holy apostles are taught to say, Forgive us our trespasses. Yea though the righteous fall, saith David, he shall not be cast away, for the Lord upholdeth him with his hand. O the bottomless mercy of God towards us miserable sinners! May he vouchsafe to plant in my heart true repentance and faith, to the obtaining of the remission of all my sins in the mercies of God, and merits of Christ his Son, and thereto I pray you say, Amen.

O my dearly beloved, it grieveth me to see the spoil and havock that Saul maketh with the congregation of Christ: but what remedy? This is God's will and ordinance, that his people shall here both be punished in the flesh, and tried in their faith: as it is written, "Many are the troubles of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth them out of all;" for by a strait path and narrow door must we enter. Whither? Into the joyful kingdom of heaven: therefore blessed are you and others that suffer persecution for Christ's sake, for the profession of the same. Pray for me and my fellows, good brother, that we may fight a good fight, that we may keep the faith, and end our course with joyful gladness, for now the time of our deliverance is at hand. The Lord guide, defend, and keep us and you, and all his people in our journey, that we may safely through a short death pass to that long lasting life.

Farewel, my dear and loving brother and fellow-soldier in Christ; farewel, I say, in him: who receive our souls in peace when they shall depart from these tabernacles, and may he grant us a joyful resurrection, and a merry meeting at the last day, and continual dwelling together in his eternal heavenly kingdom, through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

Your's with my poor prayer; other pleasure can I do you none,

THOMAS WHITTLE, Minister.

LETTER V.

From Mr. WHITTLE to his dear Brethren, Mess. FILLES and CUTBERT.

MY dear and well beloved brethren in Christ, Mess. Filles and Cutbert, I wish you all welfare of soul and body. Welfare to the soul is repentance of sin, faithful assiance in Christ Jesus, and a godly life. Welfare to the body is the health of the same, with all necessary things for this life. The soul of man is immortal, and therefore ought to be well kept, lest immortality of joy should turn to immortality of sorrow. As for the body, be it ever so well kept and made much of, yet shortly by nature will it perish and decay: but those that are ingrafted and incorporated into Christ by true faith, feeling the motion of God's holy Spirit as a pledge of their election and inheritance, exciting and stirring them not only to seek heavenly things, but also to hate vice, and embrace virtue, will not only do these things, but also if need require, will gladly take up their cross and follow their captain, their king and their Saviour Jesus Christ (as his poor afflicted church of England now doth), against that false and antichristian doctrine and religion now used, and especially that blasphemous mass, wherein Christ's supper and holy ordinance is altogether perverted and abused, contrary to his institution, and to Paul's proceedings: so that that which they have in their mass, is neither sacrament of Christ, nor yet sacrifice for sin, as the priests falsely pretend. It is a sacrament, that is, as St. Augustine saith, a visible sign of invisible grace, when it is administered to the communicants according to Christ's example, and as it was of late years in this realm. And as for sacrifice, there is none to be made now for sin: "For Christ with one sacrifice hath perfected forever those that are sanctified."

Beware of false religion, and men's vain traditions, and serve God with reverence and godly fear, according to the doctrine of his gospel, whereto cleave ye that ye may be blessed, though of wicked men ye are hated and accursed. Rather drink of the cup of Christ with his church, than of the cup of that rose-coloured whore of Babylon, which is full of abominations. Rather strive ye to go to heaven by the path which is strait to flesh and blood, with the little flock, than to go in the wide way, following the inticements of the world and the flesh, which leadeth to damnation.

Like as Christ suffered in the flesh, saith St. Peter, so arm ye yourselves with the same mind: for Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example to follow his footsteps. Blessed are they that suffer for his sake, great is their reward in heaven. He that overcometh (saith St. John, Rev. ii. 3.) shall eat of the tree of life; he shall have a crown of life, and shall not be hurt of the second death: he shall be clothed with white array, and not be put out of the book of life; yea, I will confess his name, saith Christ, before my Father and before his angels, and he shall be a pillar in the house of God, and sit with me on my seat. And thus I bid you farewel, mine own brethren and dear fellows in Christ, whose grace and peace be always with you, Amen.

This world I do forsake,
To Christ I me take,

And for his gospel's sake, Patiently death I take.
 My body to the dust,
 Now to return it must:
 My soul I know full well,
 With my God it shall dwell.

THOMAS WHITTLE.

LETTER VI.

From Mr. THOMAS WHITTLE to a godly Woman.

O My dear and loving sister in Christ, be not dismayed in this storm of persecution: for Paul calleth the gospel the word of the cross, because it is never truly taught, but the cross and cruel persecution immediately and necessarily doth follow the same, and therefore it is a manifest token of God's truth, and hath been here and is still abroad, and that is the cause of the rage and cruelty of Satan against Christ and his members, which must be corrected for their sins in this world: their faith must be tried, and after trial and patient suffering the faithful may receive the crown of glory. Fear not therefore, my well-beloved, but proceed in the knowledge and fear of God, and he will keep you from all evil. Call upon his holy name, and he will strengthen you and assist you in all your ways; and if it please him to lay his cross upon you for his gospel's sake, refuse it not, neither shake it off by unlawful means, lest you should (as God forbid) find a more grievous cross and torment of conscience, if you should dissemble and deny the known verity, than is any persecution or death of body. O how happy are they that suffer persecution for righteousness' sake? their reward is great in heaven. The momentary afflictions of this life are not worthy of contrast with the glory that shall be shewed upon us. O remember the godly women of the Old and New Testament, who lived in God's service and fear, and therefore are now in bliss and commended for ever: namely, Judith, Esther, Abigail, the mother of the seven sons, Mary, Elizabeth, Susanna, Lydia, Phebe, and others. Set their examples before your eyes, and fear nothing, for Satan is conquered by our Saviour Christ; sin is put to flight, and the gate of immortality and eternal life is set wide open: God grant we may enter therein through the door Jesus Christ, Amen.

THOMAS WHITTLE.

The History of Mr. BARTLET GREEN.

AFTER the martyrdom of Mr. Whittle, next followeth in order to speak of Bartlet Green, who the next day after the aforesaid Whittle, was likewise condemned. Mr. Green was of a good house, and had such parents, as both favoured learning, and were also willing to bring up this their child in the same. After some entrance in other inferior schools, he was sent to the university of Oxford; where through exercise and diligent study he so profited, that within short time he attained, as well to the knowledge of sundry profane sciences, as also now in his last years unto the godly understanding of divinity. Whereunto through ignorance (in which he was trained up from his youth) he was at the first an utter enemy, until such time as God of his mercy had opened his eyes, by his often repairing unto the common lectures of Peter Martyr, reader of the divinity-lecture in the same university, so that thereby (as by God's instrument) he saw the true light of Christ's gospel.

When he had once tasted of this, it became unto him as the fountain of living water, that our Saviour Christ spake of to the woman of Samaria, so as he never thirsted any more, but had a well springing unto everlasting life. Inasmuch as when he was called by his friends from the university, and was placed in the Temple at London, there to attain to the knowledge of the common laws of the realm, he yet continued still in his former study and earnest profession of the gospel; wherein also he greatly profited. Howbeit (such is the frailty of our corrupt nature, without the special assistance of God's Holy Spirit) through the continual accompanying, and fellowship of such worldly (I will not say youthful and wild) young gentlemen, as are commonly in that and the like houses, he became by little and little a compartner of their fond follies and youthful vanities, as well in his apparel as also in banquetings, and other superfluous excesses: which he afterwards (being again called by God's merciful correction) did fore lament and bewail, as appeareth by his own testimony, notified and left in a book belonging to Mr. Bartram Calthrop, one of his friends, written with his own hand, a little before his death, in manner as followeth:

"Two things have very much troubled me while I was in the Temple, pride and gluttony; which under the colour of glory and good fellowship, drew me almost from God. Against both there is one remedy, by earnest prayer, and without ceasing. And forasmuch as vain-glory is so subtle an adversary, that almost it woundeth deadly, ere ever a man can perceive himself to be smitten, therefore we ought so much the rather by continual prayer to labour for humbleness of mind. Truly, gluttony beginneth under a charitable pretence of mutual love and society, and hath in it most uncharitableness. When we seek to refresh our bodies, that they may be the more apt to serve God, and perform our duties towards our neighbours, then it stealeth in as a privy thief, and murdereth both body and soul, that now it is not apt to pray, or serve God, apt to study or labour for our neighbour. Let us therefore watch and be sober: for our adversary the devil walketh about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour. And remember what Solomon saith, A patient man is better than a strong warrior, and he that conquereth his own stomach is better than he that conquereth towns and cities.

"Agreement of minds joining in unity of faith, and growing up in charity, is true and stedfast amity. Farewel (my Bartram), and remember me, that ever we may be like together. Farewel, at Newgate, Jan. 26, 1556.

Set sober love against hasty wrath,

BARTLET GREEN."

Thus we see the fatherly kindness of our most gracious and merciful God, who never suffereth his elect children so to fall, that they lie still in security of sin, but oftentimes quickeneth them up by some such means, as perhaps they think least of, as he did here this his strayed sheep. And now therefore to return to our history: For the better maintenance of himself in these his studies, and other his affairs, he had a large exhibition of his grandfather, Mr. Doctor Bartlet, who during the time of Green's imprisonment made unto him large offers of great livings, if he would recant, and (forsaking the truth and the gospel of Christ) come home again to the church and synagogue of Rome. But those his persuasions (the Lord be praised) took small effect in his faithful heart, as the sequel did declare. He was a man beloved of all men (except the papists, who love none that love the truth), and so he well deserved: for he was of a meek, humble, discreet, and most gentle behaviour to all. Injurious he was to none, beneficial to many, especially to those who were of the household of faith, as appeareth, amongst others, by his friendly dealing with Mr. Christopher Goodman, at that time a poor exile beyond the seas. With whom this Bartlet Green (as well for his toward learning, as also for his sober and godly behaviour) had often society in Oxford, in the days of good king Edward: who now, notwithstanding his friend's misery and banishment, he did not lightly forget; and that turned, as it happened (not without the providence of Almighty God) to the great grief of both; the one of heart, for the loss of his friend, and

and the other of body, in suffering the cruel and murdering rage of papists.

The cause hereof was a letter which Green wrote unto the said Goodman, containing as well the report of certain demands or questions, which were cast abroad in London (as appeareth hereafter in a letter of his own penning, which he intended to have sent to Mr. Philpot, wherein he fully declareth his usage before the bishop of London, and others), as also an answer to a question made by the said Christopher Goodman, in a letter written unto him, in which he required to have the certainty of the report which was spread amongst them on the other side of the seas, that the queen was dead. Whereunto Mr. Green simply answered, and as the truth then was, that she was not dead.

These letters, with many others, written to divers of the godly exiles, by their friends here in England, being delivered to a messenger to carry over, came, by the apprehension of the said bearer, unto the hands of the king and queen's council. Who, at their convenient leisure (which in those days by some of them was quickly found for such matters) perused the whole number of the said letters, and amongst them espied this letter of Mr. Green's, written to his friend Christopher Goodman; in the contents whereof (amongst other news and private matters) they found these words, The queen is not yet dead. Which words were only written as an answer, to certify Mr. Goodman of the truth of his former demand. Howbeit (to some of the council) they seemed very heinous words, yea treason they would have made them, if the law would have suffered. Which when they could not do (and being yet very loath to let any depart freely whom they suspected to be favourers of the gospel) they then examined him upon his faith in religion, but upon what points it is not certainly known.

Nevertheless (as it seemeth) his answers were such, as little pleased them (especially the anointed sort), and therefore after they had detained him in prison, as well in the Tower of London as elsewhere, they sent him at last to Bonner, bishop of London, to be ordered according to his ecclesiastical law; as appeareth by their letters sent to the bishop, with the said prisoner also: wherein it may appear that Sir John Bourne (then secretary to the queen) was a chief stirrer in such cases, yea, and an enticer of the council: who otherwise (if for fear they durst) would have been content to have let such matters alone. The Lord forgive them their weakness, if it be his good pleasure, and give all such men true repentance, Amen.

A LETTER

Sent to BONNER, Bishop of London, by the Queen's Council, dated 11th day of November, 1555, but not delivered until the 17th Day of the same Month.

AFTER our hearty commendations to your good lordship, we send to the same herewith the body of Bartlet Green, who hath of good time remained in the Tower for his obstinate standing in matters against the catholic religion, whom the king and queen's majesties pleasures are (because he is of your lordship's diocese) ye shall cause to be ordered according to the laws in such cases provided. And thus we bid your lordship heartily farewell. From St. James's, the 11th of November, 1555.

Your lordship's loving friends,

Winchester, William Haward, Pembroke John Bourne,
Tho. Ely, Thomas Wharton.

Postscript. I Sir John Bourne will wait upon your lordship, and signify further the king and queen's majesties pleasure herein.

That ye may the better understand the certainty of the ill usage he met with in Bonner's custody, I have thought it good to put forth his own letter, containing at large an account of the same. Which letter he wrote intending to have sent it to Mr. Philpot, but, either by Mr. Philpot's death, or (more probably) by the watchfulness of his keeper, he was prevented: for it came (by what means I know not) to the bishop's hands, and being delivered to his register, was found in one of his books of record. The copy whereof here followeth.

A LETTER

Of BARTLET GREEN, written to JOHN PHILPOT, containing, besides other particular Matters betwixt him and Mr. PHILPOT, a brief Rehearsal of his Conferences with Bishop BONNER and others, at his first coming before them.

THAT which was wanting in talk (through my default) at your being here, I have supplied by writing in your absence, now at length getting some opportunity and leisure. The 17th day of November, being brought hither by two of the clock in the afternoon, I was presented before my lord of London, and other two bishops, Mr. Deane, Mr. Roper, Mr. Welch, Dr. Harpsfield, archdeacon of London, and two or three others, all sitting at one table. There were present Dr. Dale, Mr. George Mordaunt, Mr. Dec. Then after the bishop of London had read unto himself the letter that came from the council, he spake with more words, but (as I remember) to this effect; that the cause of their assembly was, to hear my examination, whereunto he had authority by the council, and had provided Mr. Welch and another, whose name I know not, (but well I remember, though he obtained it not, yet desired he my lord, that I might hear the council's letters) to be there if any matters of the common law arise, to discuss them, he intreated my lord to determine all controversies of scriptures; and for the civil law, he and Dr. Dale should take on them.

Wherefore he demanded of me the cause of my imprisonment: I said, that the occasion of my apprehension was a letter which I wrote to one Christopher Goodman, wherein (certifying him of such news as happened here) among the rest, I wrote that there were certain printed papers of questions scattered abroad. Whereupon, being suspected to be privy to the devising or publishing of the same, I was committed to the Fleet: but, after the commissioners had received my submission, I heard nothing thereof. The sum whereof was, that as I was sure there neither could be true witnesses, nor probable conjecture against me in that behalf, so refused I no punishment, if they of their consciences would judge me privy to the devising, printing, or publishing of those questions. But my lord affirming that there was another cause of my imprisonment, demanded if I had not after, since I was committed to the Fleet, spoken or written somewhat against the natural presence of Christ in the sacrament of the altar.

Then I desired his lordship to be good unto me, trusting that he would not put to answer to new matters, except I were first discharged of the old. And when I stood long in that, Mr. Welch answered, that it was procured that I should so do, right well. For albeit I were imprisoned for treason, if during the time of my confinement I had maintained heresy, that were no sufficient allegation against the ordinary; neither whether I were before him acquitted or condemned, should it take away the former fault. Then my lord affirming that I was not brought before him but for heresy, and the other gentlemen saying, that doubtless I was discharged of my former matter; my desire was, that I might be charged according to the order of the law, to hear my accusers.

Then Dr. Chedsey was sent for, who reported, that in the presence of Mr. Mosley and the lieutenant of the Tower, I spake against the real presence and the sacrifice of the mass, and that I affirmed their church was the church of Antichrist.

Is not this true? said my lord. I said, Yea. Will you continue therein? said he. Yea, said I. Wilt thou then maintain it by learning? said he. Therein, quoth I, I should shew myself to have little wit, knowing mine mine own youth and ignorance, if I would take on me to maintain any controversy against so many grave and learned men. But my conscience was satisfied in the truth, which was sufficient to my salvation.

Conscience! said Mr. Roper, so shall every Jew and Turk be saved.

We had hereafter much talk to no purpose, and especially on my part, who felt in myself, through cold and open air, much dulness of wit and memory. At length I was asked what conscience was: and I said, the certifying of the truth.

With that Mr. Welch rose up, desiring leave to talk with me alone. So he taking me aside into another chamber, said that he was sorry for my trouble, and would gladly see me at liberty: he marvelled that I being a young man, would stand against all the learned men of the realm, yea and contrary to the whole determination of the catholic church from Christ's time, in a matter wherein I could have no great learning; I must not think mine own wit better than all men's, but I should believe them that were learned. I promise you (quoth he) I have read all Peter Martyr's book, and Cranmer's, and all the rest of them, and have conferred them with the contrary, as the bishop of Winchester, &c. and could not perceive but that there was one continual truth, which from the beginning had been maintained; and those which at any time severed from this unity, were answered and answered again. This was the sum of his tale, which lacked both wit and eloquence.

Mr. Green. Forasmuch as it pleaseth your mastership to use me so familiarly (for so he behaved himself towards me, as though I had been his equal) I shall open my mind freely unto you, desiring you to take it in good part. I consider my youth, lack of wit and learning, which would to God it were but a little under the opinion that some men have of me. But God is not bound to time, wit, or knowledge, but rather chuseth the weak of the world that they may confound the strong; neither can men appoint bounds to God's mercy: For, I will have compassion, saith he, on whom I will shew mercy. There is no respect of persons with God, whether it be old or young, rich or poor, wife or foolish, sisher or basket-maker. God giveth knowledge of his truth, through his free grace, to whom he list, James i. Neither do I think myself only to have the truth, but stedfastly believe that Christ hath his spouse, the catholic and universal church, dispersed in many realms where it pleaseth him, the Spirit blowing where it listeth: no more is he addicted to any one place, than to the person and quality of any one man. Of this church I nothing doubt myself to be a member, trusting to be saved by the faith that is taught in the same. But how this church is known, is in a manner the end of all controversy. And the true marks of Christ's church are the true preaching of his word, and administering of his sacraments. These marks were sealed by the apostles, and confirmed by the ancient fathers, till at length they were, through the wickedness of men and the devil, almost utterly taken away. But God be praised that he hath renewed the print, that his truth may be known in many places. For myself, I call God to witness, I have no hope in mine own wit and learning, which is very small; but I was persuaded thereto by him, as by an instrument, that is excellent in all good learning and living. And God is my record, that chiefly I sought it of him by continual prayer with tears.

Furthermore, what I have done herein, is not needful for me to speak: but one thing, I say, I wish of God with all my heart, that all men which are of contrary judgment, would seek the truth in like manner. Now I am brought hither before a great many bishops and learned men, to be made a fool and a laughing-stock, but I value it not a rush: for God knoweth that my whole study is to please him: beside that, I care not for man's pleasure or displeasure.

Mr. Welch. No, Mr. Green, said he, think not so uncharitably of any man, but judge rather that men labour for your soul's health, as for their own. But, alas, how will you condemn all our forefathers? Or how can you think yourself to be of the catholic church, without any continuance, and contrary to the judgment of all learned men?

Green. Sir, I have no authority to judge any man; nevertheless, I doubt not but that I am of the true catholic church, howsoever our learned men here judge of me.

Welch. Why, then, do you suppose your own wit and learning better than all their's? If you do not give credit only to them, other learned men shall resort unto you, that shall persuade you by the scriptures and doctors.

Green. Sir, God knoweth that I refuse not to learn of any child, but I would embrace the truth from the mouth of a natural fool, in any thing wherein I am ignorant, and that in all things, saving my faith: but concerning the truth, wherein I am thoroughly persuaded, I cannot submit myself to learn, unless it be, as your mastership said, that I perused books on both sides. For so might I make myself an indifferent judge; otherwise I may be seduced.

And here we had a long discourse of the church, wherein his learning and wit was much above mine: but in the end I told him I was persuaded, and that he did but lose his labour.

Welch. Why then, what shall I report to my lord?

Green. Even as it pleaseth you; or else you may say that I would be glad to learn, if I had books on both sides.

So he going in, the bishops (being risen and ready to depart) asked how he liked me? He answered, In faith, my lord, he will be glad to learn. Which words when they were spoken, lest they should mistake his meaning and mine, I said, Yea, my lord, so that I have books on both sides, as Calvin, and my lord of Canterbury's books, and such others. Well, said my lord, I will satisfy thy mind therein also: and they were all in great hopes, that shortly I should become a good catholic, as they call it.

Then was I brought into my lord's inner chamber (where you were) and there was put in a chamber with Mr. Dee, who treated me very friendly. That night I supped at my lord's table, and lay with Mr. Dee in the chamber you did see. On the morrow I was served at dinner from my lord's table, and at night did eat in the hall with his gentleman; where I have been placed ever since, and fared wonderful well. Yea, to say the truth, I had my liberty within the bounds of his lordship's house: for my lodgings and fare, scarce have I been at any time abroad in better case so long together, and have found so much gentleness of my lord and his chaplains, and other servants, that I should easily have forgotten that I was in prison, were it not that this good cheer was often powdered with unfavoury sauces of examinations, exhortations, posings, and disputations.

For shortly after supper, the first Monday at night, I was had into my lord's bed-chamber, and there he would know of me how I came first into these heresies: I said, I was persuaded thereto by the scriptures, and authorities of the doctors, alledged by Peter Martyr in his lectures upon the eleventh chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, while he treated there on that place of the Lord's supper for a month together. But then my lord enforced the plainness of Christ's words, and his almighty power, demanding of me, what reason should move me from the literal sense of the words: but I having no lust to those matters, would have alledged that there were books sufficient of that matter, as Peter Martyr, Cranmer, and Oecolampadius: nevertheless, when this shift would not serve, but I was constrained to say somewhat, I said I was moved from the literal sense by the manner of speaking, by the circumstance, and by conference of other places of the scriptures. It is evident that Christ took bread, and that he shewed them (they seeing it) bread, which he affirmed to be his body.

Christ affirmed that bread was his body.

But that affirmation taken literally, can by no means be true.

Therefore,

Therefore, The words, if they be taken according to the letter, cannot be true.

For this predication, Panis est corpus Christi, or, Corpus Christi est panis, is neither Identica nor Accidentalis, nor Essentialis predication. Wherefore of necessity I must say it was spoken in the same sense, as Christ was a door, a vine, and a way. Neither can it serve to say, that it was not bread that he affirmed to be his body, and that for two causes.

For whatsoever he shewed, that was bread, for nought else was seen.

But that which he shewed he affirmed to be his body.

The second reason is, For that it was not changed before, seeing Benedixit, is Gratias egit, or else Christ affirmed no true proposition, and you are without authority.

In the end of this letter there were noted these sentences following, collected for confirmation of his former assertions, viz.

Eadem locutio pculi, that is, The phrase is used and spoken upon the cup.

Dicitur postea panis. It is called bread in the same place afterwards.

Eadem ratione rejecero corpus, qua tu panem, that is, By the same reason as it may be denied to be bread, it may be denied to be the body.

Ascendit in celum, that is, His body ascended into heaven.

Corpus nobis factus est similis in omnibus post natiuitatem. At unum corpus non potest esse in duobus locis. Therefore, &c. In body he was like to us in all things after his nativity (sin excepted). Seeing then our body cannot be in two places at once: therefore, neither his.

Discipuli non stupebant, &c. His disciples took it as no miracle nor wonder.

The last Examination and Condemnation of Mr. GREEN.

THUS, as it seemeth, for this time they left off. But not long after the bishop perceiving Green's learning and constancy to be such, as neither he, nor any of his doctors and chaplains could by the scriptures refute, began then to object and put in practice his chief and strongest argument against him; which was the rigour of the law, and cruelty of execution: an argument, I assure you, which without the special grace of our God to flesh is insupportable. And therefore using law as a cloak of his tyranny, the 28th day of November, the said bishop examined him upon certain points of christian religion. Whereunto when he had answered, the bishop appointed the register (as their most common manner is) there to draw out an order of confession: which being afterwards read unto Green, was also subscribed by him, as a confirmation of his former assertions: the tenor whereof here ensueth.

The Confession of BARTLET GREEN.

BARTLET GREEN, born in the city of London, in the parish of Basing-hall, of the diocese of London, and of the age of 25 years, being examined in the bishop's palace the 27th day of November, Anno 1555, upon certain articles, answered as followeth, viz. That neither in the time of king Edward, after the mass by him was put down, neither in the time of queen Mary after the mass was restored again, he hath heard any mass at all; but he saith that in the reign of the said queen's majesty, he the said Bartlet, two times, to wit, at two Easter-tides or days, in the chamber of John Pulline, one of the preachers in king Edward's time, within the parish of St. Michael's, Cornhill, of the diocese of London, did receive the communion with the said Pulline, and Christopher Goodman, sometime reader of the divinity lecture in Oxford, now gone beyond the sea; and the second time with the said Pulline, and with one Rimneger, Master of Arts, of Magdalen college, in Oxford: and this examine also saith, that at both the said communions, he and the other before named, did take and receive bread and wine, which bread and wine he called sacramental bread, and sacramental wine, which he saith were used there by them, Pulline only reading the words of the institution, expressed in the book of communion.

In which receiving and using, this examine saith, that the others aforementioned did receive the sacrament of the Lord's-supper, and that they received material bread and material wine, no substance thereof changed, and so no real presence of the body and blood of Christ there being, but only grace added thereto. And further, this examine saith, that he had heretofore, during the reign of the queen's majesty aforesaid, refused, and so now doth refuse to come and hear mass, and to receive the sacrament of the altar, as they are now used and administered in this church of England, because he saith, that concerning the mass, he cannot be persuaded in his conscience, that the sacrifice pretended to be in the same, is agreeable to God's word, or maintainable by the same: and that without deadly offence he cannot worship the body and blood of Christ that is pretended to be there. And as concerning the sacrament of the altar, this examine saith, that he heretofore during the said reign, hath refused, and now doth refuse to receive the same, as is now used in this church of England, because it is not used according to the institution of Christ, but both in a strange tongue, and also ministered in both kinds; and besides that, contrary to God's word it is there taught, that the thing there administered is to be adored, as the real and true body of Christ. And furthermore this examine saith, that during the said reign he hath not been confessed to the priest, nor received absolution at his hands, because he is not bound by God's word to make auricular confession.

BARTLET GREEN.

Many other conferences and examinations they brought him unto. But in the end (seeing his steadiness of faith to be such, against which neither their threatenings, nor yet their flattering promises could prevail) the 15th day of January the bishop caused him with the rest before mentioned, to be brought into the consistory of St. Paul's; where being set in his judgment seat, accompanied by Mr. Fecknam, then dean of the same church, and other his chaplains, after he had condemned the other six, he then calling for Bartlet Green, began with these, or the like words:

Honourable audience, I think it best to open unto you the conversation of this man, called Bartlet Green. And because you shall not charge me, that I go about to seek any man's blood, here you shall hear the council's letters, which they sent with him unto me. The effect whereof is; that whereas he had been a long time confined in the tower of London for heresy, they have now sent him unto me to be ordered, according to the laws therefore provided. And now to thee, Bartlet Green, I propose these nine articles. Then he read the articles before mentioned, which were generally objected to all these seven prisoners, to wit, Thomas Whittle, John Tudson, John Went, Thomas Brown, Isabel Foster, Joan Lashford, Bartlet Green.

But when Mr. Green would have answered them particularly, he was put to silence, with promise that he should have time to answer sufficiently, and therefore the bishop proceeding, said, that when Green came first to his house, he desired to have the books of the ancient doctors of the church to read, which he said he granted him.

Whereunto Green answered, and said, that if the doctors were with indifferent judgment weighed, they made more a great deal with him, than they did with them.

Upon which words, Dr. Fecknam, dean of St. Paul's, stood up, and marvelling why he said so, asked him if he would be content to stand to the judgment of the doctors.

Green then said, that he was content to stand to the doctors' judgment.

I will then propound unto you (said Fecknam) the doctors, and interpret them yourself. So he alledged a place of Chrysostom, Ad popul. Antioch. which was this: Elias ascendens melotam suam post se reliquit: Christus vero ascendens carnem suam assumpsit, & eandem post se reliquit. "Elias going up, left his cloak behind him: but Christ ascending up took his flesh, and also left it behind him." And he demanded of Green how he understood the place.

Then Green desired him that he would confer the doctors' sayings together, and therefore alledged the same doctor again, writing upon 1 Cor. x. "Is not the bread which we bless the communication of the Lord's body?" Whereby he proved that this doctor called this sacrament but a sign of the Lord's body. Many other words of probation and trial were between them.

At last Pecknam demanded of him, how long he had been of this opinion. For, Mr. Green, said he, you confessed once to me, that when you were at Oxford at school, you were called the rankest papist in that house, and being compelled to go to the lecture of Peter Martyr, you were converted from your old doctrine.

And Green confessed the same.

Then Pecknam said, that Green told him the said Peter Martyr was a papist at his first coming to Oxford. Whereupon he made an exclamation, and prayed the people to consider how vain his doctrine was that he professed, which was grounded upon one man, and that upon so inconstant a man as Peter Martyr, who perceiving the wicked intent of the council, was content to please them, and forsake the true and catholic faith.

Green said, that he grounded not his faith upon Peter Martyr nor any other, nor did believe so because Peter Martyr believed the same; but because he had heard the scriptures, and the doctors of the church, truly and wholesomely expounded by him; neither had he any regard of the man, but of the word which he spake. And further he said, that he heard the said Peter Martyr say often, that he had not, while he was a papist, read Chrysostom upon the tenth to the Corinthians, nor many other places of the doctors: but when he had read them, and well considered them, he was content to yield to the doctors, having first humbled himself in prayer, desiring God to illuminate him, and bring him to the true understanding of the scripture. Which thing (said Green) if you, my lord, would do, I do not doubt but God would open your eyes, and shew you his truth, no more than I do doubt his words to be true that faith, "Ask, and it shall be given to you; knock, and it shall be opened unto you," &c.

Then Pecknam asked him what he thought of this article, The holy catholic church.

And Green answered, that he did believe one holy and universal church throughout all the world.

Then Pecknam said, that he would fain have a sure mark and token, whereby he might know this church: and therefore he prayed Green to define unto him this church.

Green answered, that this church did agree in verity with the true doctrine of Christ, and was known by the true administration of his sacraments.

Whereupon Pecknam said, that he would prove the church whereof he was to be never agreeing in doctrine, but always to have been in controversy in their religion. For, said he, Luther and Zuinglius could never agree in their writing or sayings, nor Oecolampadius with Carolostadius, nor Carolostadius with either Zuinglius or Luther, &c. for Luther, writing upon the sacrament of the altar, said, that in this bread, or under this bread we receive the body of the Lord. Zuinglius controuling him, said, Under the sign of the bread we receive the body of the Lord. And the other controuled him in like case.

Then Mr. Green proved their opinions of the sacrament to be one in effect, being rightly weighed; and though their words did not sound all one, yet they meant one thing; and their opinions were all one, as he proved by divers other examples.

Then Pecknam desired him that he would not so wilfully cast himself away, but to be rather conformable to reason, and that my lord bishop there present would be good unto him, and would grant him respite (if he would demand it) for a fortnight or three weeks, and that he should chuse any learned man whom he would, and should go with him home to his house; and that he whom he would chuse would willingly take the pains to read and confer on the doctors with him, and open the doctors' minds and meanings unto him.

Then bishop Bonner said, that he was a proud and an obstinate boy; and therefore he desired Fecknam to hold his peace, and to call him no more Mr. Green: for (said he) you ought not to call an heretic, matter.

After this Dr. Pendleton alledged to him this text out of the xxii of Luke, "I will eat no more of this, until it be fulfilled in my Father's kingdom." Here, said he, you must confess your opinion to be false, else you must say that Christ was a liar: for Christ said, "I will eat no more of this, until it be fulfilled in my Father's kingdom." If Christ did eat no more the bread when he spake these words, then must you say that he was a liar: for he did eat bread after with his disciples, before he ascended. But if you say he did eat his body then, and after but bread, it will not agree with the scriptures, nor with good reason.

Then Green answered, and said, that this was spoken by an anticipation, as one of their own bishops (who is now dead) did say.

Then Dr. Pendleton said, that that was no sufficient discharge, nor no sufficient answer for him in this case; for, said he, it is well known that that bishop was of a contrary opinion to you, and that he died a good christian man.

To which words Green said, I do not call him to witness in this case, as though he were a sufficient man to prove my saying to be true in this matter: but I do alledge him against you, as Paul did the scripture, which he found graven in the altar of the Athenians, against themselves, To the unknown God.

These, with many other words, were between them, which I pass over, because it were too long to stand upon recital of every thing. Last of all the bishop asked him if he would recant. He said nay, he would not. But, my lord, said he, in old time there were no men put to death for their conscience, until such times as bishops found the means to make it death to believe contrary to them; but excommunication, my lord, was the greatest penalty which men had for their conscience; yea, insomuch that St. Augustine wrote, and commanded that no man should be put to death for his opinion.

Then Bonner said, that when Augustine saw what inconveniences followed that commandment, he wrote again to the temporal rulers, commanding them to punish their bodies.

But, said Green, he ordered not to put them to death.

He said, punish them, quoth Bonner.

Yea, said Green, but not put them to death.

That they should be punished, quoth Bonner, again.

This talk ended, he asked Green if he would recant, and return to his Romish mother. Which when he denied, the bishop pronounced the sentence definitive against him, and so committed him to the sheriffs of London, who caused him to be carried to Newgate.

And as he was going thither, there met with him two gentlemen, being both his special friends, minding alike to comfort this their persecuted brother: but at their meeting, their loving and friendly hearts (not able any longer to hide themselves) were manifested by the abundance of their pitiful tears. To whom, when Green saw them, he said in these or like words, Ah, my dear friends, is this the comfort you are come to give me, in this my occasion of heaviness? Must I, who needed to have comfort ministered to me, become now a comforter of you? And thus declaring his most quiet peaceable mind and conscience, he cheerfully spake to them and others, until he came to the prison door, door, into which he joyfully entered, and there remained always either in prayer (whereunto he much gave himself) or else in some other godly meditations and exercises, until the 28th day of January, when he with his other before-mentioned brethren, went most cheerfully to the place of their torments, often repeating both by the way and at the stake, these Latin verses :

*Christe Deus, sine te spes est mihi nulla salutis :
Te duce vera sequor, te duce falsa nego.*

In English thus,

O Christ, my God, sure hope of health,
Besides thee I have none :
The truth I love, and falsehood hate,
By thee my guide alone.

During the time of his imprisonment in Newgate, divers of his friends had access unto him, to whom he gave sundry godly exhortations, wherewith they were not only well contented, but for a better remembrance of his instructions, as well as of his good and pious person, they desired him to write somewhat in their books, which he readily complied with.

Amongst other divers and singular good virtues of this good man, especially in him was to be noted such a modest nature, so humbly thinking of himself, as in few men is to be found, ever dejecting himself under that which was in him, and ever seeming to be less than he was, so that nothing less could he abide, than to hear of his praise or commendation ; which his letter written to Mr. Philpot declareth, wherein he doth earnestly expostulate with him, for slandering him with praise of his wit and learning, and other manifold virtues of great excellency ; but also by his own speech and answers in his examination, wherein he casteth from him all knowledge of learning and cunning, when notwithstanding he had more in him, than to any man's eyes did appear.

So great and admirable was this gift of modesty grafted in the nature of him, so far abhorring all pride and arrogancy, that as he could not abide any thing that was spoken to his advancement or praise ; so neither did there appear any shew or boasting in those things wherein he might justly glory, which were his punishments and sufferings for the cause and quarrel of Christ. For when he was beaten and scourged with rods by bishop Bonner (which scarce any man would believe, nor I neither, but that I heard it of him, who heard it out of his own mouth), and he greatly rejoiced in the same, yet his modesty was such, that he would never mention it, lest he should seem to glory too much in himself, except only to one Mr. Cotton, an intimate friend, a little before his death.

To this admirable modesty may be added his excellent and universal compassion to mankind ; which, however slighted by some, yet there is nothing in nature that doth more truly resemble the image of the most high Majesty of Almighty God. As, in respect of humanity, man only excelleth a beast, so this man by his merciful tenderness did not only seem to be, but really was, superior to most of his own species. It was his custom to visit the poor prisoners (those that were with him in prison) both with bodily relief and spiritual comfort : and finding many of them (I mean such as were there for theft and other wicked crimes) very penitent and sorry for their wicked lives, in hope of their amendment, did not only by word of mouth, but also by his letters require, yea, as it were of duty in love, charged his friends to do their utmost endeavours to obtain their liberty : such was the pious and charitable disposition of this true member of Christ's church, whose imitation of divine benignity appeareth in the following letter.

A LETTER

Of Mr. GREEN in Behalf of poor Prisoners.

To my very loving Friends and Masters, Mr. Goring, Mr. Fernham, Mr. Fleetwood, Mr. Russwel, Mr. Hussey, Mr. Calthorp, Mr. Bowyer, and other my Masters of the Temple, Bartlet Green wilheth Health of Body and Soul.

VERY friends are they who are knit together with the knot of charity ; charity doth not decay, but increase in them that die faithfully : whereof it followeth, that though we be absent in body, yet are we present in the spirit, coupled together with the unity of faith in the bond of peace, which is love. How is he worthy the name of a friend, that measureth his friendship with the distance of a place, or parting of persons ? If thy friend be out of sight, is thy friendship ended ? if he be gone into the country, wilt thou cease to love him ? if he be passed the seas, wilt thou so forsake him ? if he be carried into heaven, is charity hindered thereby ?

On the one side we have the use of the fathers from the primitive church, who gave thanks for their friends that died in the faith, to prove that charity died not with death. On the other side, saith Horace, They change their country, not their minds, who sail beyond sea.

Why speak I of Horace ? Saith not St. Paul the same thing ? For we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his blood, yea, we are members one of another. Is the hand or arm, foot or leg, a member, when it is dislevered from the body ? How can we be members, except we be joined together ? What is the line that coupleth us, but love ? When all things shall fail, love never faileth. Hope hath it's end, when we have got that which we hoped for. Faith is finished in heaven ; love endureth for ever ; love, I say, that proceedeth of charity ; for carnal love, when that which he loveth is lost, doth perish with the flesh. Neither was that ever but fleshly love, which by distance of place, or severing of bodies, is parted asunder. If love be the end or sum of the law ; if heaven and earth shall perish, yet one jot of God's word shall not decay, why should we think that love lasteth not for ever ?

I need not write much to you, my friends, neither have I leisure now the keepers are risen : but this I say, If we keep Christ's commandment in loving each other, as he loved us, then should our love be everlasting. This friendship St. Paul felt when it moved him to say, That neither length nor breadth (meaning no distance of place), neither height nor depth, should sever him from the love of Christ. Weigh this place well, and mete it with St. Paul's measures, so shall we find that if our love be untainted, it can never be ended. Now may you say, Why writest thou this ? certainly to the end that if our friendship be stable, you may accomplish this the last request of your friend, and perform after my death the friendship we began in our life, that amity may increase until God make it perfect at our next meeting together.

Mr. Fleetwood, I beseech you remember Wittrance and Cook, two singular men amongst common prisoners. Mr. Fernham and Mr. Bell, with Mr. Hussey, as I hope, will dispatch Palmer and Richardson with his companions. I pray you, Mr. Palmer, think on John Grove, an honest poor man, Traiford and Rice Apprice, his accomplices : my cousin Thomas Witton (a scrivener in Lombard-street) hath promised to further their delivery ; at least he can instruct you which way to work. I doubt not but that Mr. Bowyer will labour for the good wife Cooper (for she is worthy to be holpen), and Berard, the Frenchman. There be also other well-disposed men, whose deliverance if ye will not labour for, yet I humbly beseech you to seek their relief, as you shall see cause : namely, of Henry Apprice, Lancelot, Hobbes, Lothor, Homes, Carre, and Bockingham a young young man of goodly gifts in wit and learning, and (saying that he is somewhat wild) likely to do well hereafter. There be also two women, Conningham and Alice Alexander, that may prove honest. For these and all other poor prisoners here I make my humble suit and prayer to you all my masters, and especially good friends, beseeching you of all bonds of amity, for the precious blood of Jesus Christ, in the bowels of mercy, to tender the causes of miserable captives; help to clothe Christ, visit the afflicted, comfort the sorrowful, and relieve the needy. The very God of peace guide your hearts to have mercy on the poor, and love faithfully together, Amen. This present Monday, when I look to die, and live for ever.

Your's as ever,

BARTLET GREEN.

A LETTER

Of Mr. GREEN to Mrs. ELIZABETH CLARK.

WOULD God, if it were his pleasure, that with this letter I might send you my heart and mind, and whatsoever there is in me else, that pertaineth to God: so should I think it the best message, and happiest letter that ever I could write. But though I obtain not my desire, yet I shall not cease with continual prayer to labour for you, desiring Almighty God to increase that which he hath long since begun in you, of sober and earnest zeal towards his religion. In faith (as faith St. Paul) she that is a true widow and friendless, putteth her trust in God, continuing day and night in supplication and prayer; but she that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth. And verily a true widow is she that hath married Christ, forsaking the vanities of the world, and lust of the flesh. For as the married woman careth how to love, please, and serve her husband, so ought the widow to give all her heart and soul, thought and words, studies and labours, faithfully to love God, virtuously to bring up her children and household, and diligently to provide for the poor and oppressed.

Therefore St. Paul first instructeth a widow how to behave herself, that is, Not to live in pleasure, then to watch unto prayer, as the only means to obtain all our desires, stedfastly laying up all our trust in God, as David right well saith, First chew evil, then do good. Of Anna, the praise was written, that she never went out of the temple, but served God with fasting and prayer night and day; so well had she espoused Christ. Judith wore a smock of hair, continuing in fasting, and had good report of all men.

The next care that belongeth to a widow, is, that she bring up her children and household godly, in the nurture and information of the Lord. Whereof St. Paul saith, if any have children or nephews, let them learn first to rule their own house godly, and to recompense their elders. The incontineny and covetousness of Phineas and Hophni, corrected by Eli their father, provoked God's vengeance upon him and all his kindred. The over tender love of Absalom expelled David from his kingdom. The unrebuked sins of Amnon encouraged Absalom to slay his brother; most manifest examples against the parents, for the offences of their children.

Contrariwise, how greatly might Hannah rejoice over Samuel her son, whom she had brought up in the house of the Lord? What thanks might Tobias's wife give for her son Toby? How happy was Solomon to be taught by the prophet Nathan? But above all widows, thrice blessed was the happy mother of the seven sons, that had so instructed them by the fear of God, that by no torments they would shrink from the love of his truth?

Of the last part, St. Paul sheweth that a widow should be chosen, if she has nourished her children, if she has been liberal to strangers, if she has washed the saints' feet, and if she has ministered to them in adversity. Herein it is evident how earnestly St. Paul would have widows bent towards the poor; for that (as though they only had been therefore meet) he appointed only widows to minister to the saints, and to gather for the poor. Which use also continued almost throughout the primitive church, that widows had the charge and gathering for the poor men and strangers.

Of your neighbours I need not put you in remembrance, seeing you daily feed them with good hospitality, by which means also many foreigners are by you relieved: but of the poor alms-houses, and miserable prisoners here in London, many lacking their liberty without cause, some under colour of religion, some only kept for fees, and some for private men's displeasure. Alas! that Christ so hungereth, and no man will feed him; is sore oppressed with thirst, and no man will give him drink; destitute of all lodging, and not relieved; naked, and not clothed; sick, and not visited; imprisoned, and not seen.

In times past men could bestow large sums of money on copes, vestments, and ornaments of the church. Why rather follow we not the example of St. Ambrose, who sold the same for the relief of the poor; or the commandment of Chrysostom, who willed first to deck and garnish the living temple of God? But, alas! such is the wickedness of these our last days, that nothing moveth us; neither the pure doctrine, the godliness of life, nor good examples of ancient fathers. If in any thing they erred, if they have written any thing that serveth for sects and dissention, that will their charitable children embrace, publish, and maintain with sword, faggot, and fire: but all in vain; they strive against the stream. For though in despite of the truth, by force of the cares of crafty persuasion, they may bring themselves into the haven of hell; yet they cannot make all men believe that the banks move while the ship saileth, nor ever shall be able to turn the direct course of the stream of God's truth. Our Lord Jesus Christ strengthen you in all pure doctrine and upright living, and give you grace virtuously to bring up your children and family, and carefully to provide for the poor and oppressed, Amen. At Newgate, the 20th of January, Anno 1556.

Your assured,

BARTLET GREEN.

Another certain Writing of Mr. BARTLET GREEN.

BBETTER is the day of death, saith Solomon, than the day of birth. Man that is born of a woman liveth but a short time, and is replenished with many miseries: but happy are the dead that die in the Lord. Man of woman is born in travail, to live in misery: man through Christ doth die in joy, and live in felicity. He is born to die, and dieth to live. Straight as he cometh into the world, with cries he uttereth his miserable estate; straight as he departeth, with songs he praiseth God for ever. Scarce yet in his cradle, three deadly enemies assault him; after death no adversary can annoy him. Whilst he is here, he displeaseth God; when he is dead, he fulfilleth his will. In this life here he dieth through sin; in the life to come he liveth in righteousness. Through many tribulations in earth he is still purged; with joy unspeakable in heaven is he made pure for ever. Here he dieth every hour; there he liveth continually. Here is sin: there is righteousness. Here is time; there is eternity. Here is hatred; there is love. Here is pain; there is pleasure. Here is misery; there is felicity. Here is corruption; there is immortality. Here we see vanity; there we shall behold the Majesty of God with triumphant and unspeakable joy in glory everlasting. Seek therefore the things that are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God the Father; unto whom, with the Holy Ghost, be all honour and glory, world without end, Amen.

Your's in Christ,

BARTLET GREEN.

There were divers other letters and matters wrote by this servant of God, as namely certain notes and extracts in Latin, out of the doctors and other authors, for for his memory, whereby is declared how studious he was in the searching and knowledge of the law of God, although his profession was the temporal law. Where I would to God he were not among the lawyers such a phenix, that he had very few or no fellows to fly with him, or to follow his steps. But God is to be praised, that although we read of few or none among that sort that died as he did; yet good witnesses do daily spring up of the same profession, to such forwardness and godly zeal, that some hope already appeareth shortly to come to pass, that this godly phenix shall not fly alone. These aforesaid notes and gatherings of his out of the doctors, were taken from him by bishop Bonner, being found about him, which was to him no little grief. He among the rest was first apprehended, but the last of them condemned, which was the fifteenth day of January, and afterwards burned with other martyrs the 27th of the same month.

III. The History of THOMAS BROWN, Martyr.

THOMAS BROWN, born in the parish of Histon, within the diocese of Ely, came afterwards to London, where he dwelt in the parish of St. Bride's, in Fleet-street, a married man, of the age of thirty-seven years, who, because he came not to his parish-church, was presented by the constable of the parish to bishop Bonner. The articles on which he was examined, with his answers also annexed to the same, have been already mentioned in the general process against him and his fellow-sufferers. This Thomas Brown being had to Fulham with the others there to be examined, was required to come into the chapel to hear mass, which he refusing to do, went into the warren, and there knelt among the trees. For this he was greatly charged by the bishop as for an heinous matter, because he said it was done in despite and contempt of their mass; which seemed to the bishop and his chaplains no small offence. At length being produced to his last examination before the said bishop, the fifteenth day of January, there to hear the definitive sentence against him; first he was required, with many fair words and glossing promises, to revoke his doctrine, to whom the aforesaid bishop speaking these words, said, Brown, you have been before me many times and oft, and I have endeavoured to win thee from thine errors; yet thou, and such like, hast and do report that I go about to seek thy blood, &c.

To whom the said Thomas Brown answered again, Yea, my lord (said he), indeed ye be a blood-sucker, and I wish I had as much blood as there is water in the sea, for you to suck.

Bonner then proceeding to the articles, when he had read them unto him again, as he had done divers times before, asked him whether he was content and willing to relinquish those his heresies and erroneous opinions (as he called them), and return again into the unity of the catholic faith. Whereunto he made answer again, saying, if they were heresies, he would forsake them. They be heresies, said the bishop. How will you prove it? said Brown, for I will not go from mine answer, except you can prove them to be heresies, which ye shall never do. For that which ye call heresy is no heresy. With that bishop Bonner, not able, or else not disposed to supply the part of a sufficient teacher, in proving that which the other had denied, by good authority and doctrine of the scripture, went about with words and promise of pardon to allure him to renounce those his heresies, as he called them, and to return unto the unity of his mother the catholic church, &c.

To whom the said Brown inferred again as followeth; Prove it to be heresy, that I do hold and maintain, and I will turn to you. But you will condemn me, because I will not confess and believe the bread in the sacrament of the altar (as you call it) to be the body of Christ, and therefore ye spill mine and such like innocents' blood, being the queen's true subjects, for which you shall answer, and that shortly.

No. 38.

-After this being spoken, Bonner (as he had done to others before) read in writing the sentence against him. The copy and form of which sentence wherewith the papists were wont to condemn these innocents, is before expressed. And this being done, he was committed to the sheriffs to be had away, and burned the 27th day of the said month of January, constantly abiding with others the cruel torments, for the true confession of his christian faith.

IV. The History of JOHN TUDSON, Martyr.

ON the same day that the aforesaid Thomas Brown with his fellows were condemned (as is above related), being the 15th day of January, John Tudson was also brought forth with the rest of the said company unto the like condemnation. This John Tudson was born in Ipswich, in the county of Suffolk, after that apprenticeship in London, dwelling with one George Goodyear, of the parish of St. Mary Botolph, within the diocese of London, who being complained of to Sir Richard Cholmley and Dr. Story, was by them sent unto Bonner, bishop of London, and was divers times before him in examination.

The articles and interrogatories ministered unto him as unto the rest, are before specified, with his answers also to the same annexed, &c. After this he was brought into the open consistory, where the said John Tudson appearing before the said bishop and his accomplices, was urged with sundry persuasions (as their manner is) to go from his opinion (which they named heresy), and to return to the unity of the church which they were of; but he, constantly persisting in that which he had received by the preachers in king Edward's time, refused so to do, saying, there was no heresy in his answers. For I (said he) defy all heresy. The bishop yet still used his old accustomed persuasions to move him, promising moreover all his offences and errors (as he called them) to be forgiven him, if he would return, &c. Then said Tudson, Tell me wherein I have offended, and I will return. Then said the bishop, In your answers. No, said Tudson again, I have not therein offended; and you, my lord, pretend charity, but nothing thereof appeareth in your works. Thus after a few words, the bishop did likewise pronounce against him sentence of condemnation; which being read, the godly martyr was committed to the secular power, and so with much patience finished this life with the others before named, the 27th day of January.

V. The History of JOHN WENT, Martyr.

JOHAN WENT, born in Langham, in Essex, within the diocese of London, of the age of twenty-seven, and a sheerman by occupation, was first examined (as is partly mentioned before) by Dr. Story upon the sacrament of the altar; and because the poor man did not accord with him thoroughly in the real presence of the body and blood of Christ, the said Dr. Story sent him up to Bonner, bishop of London. Who likewise, after divers examinations upon the articles aforesaid in the consistory, attempted the like manner of persuasions with him as he did to the others, to recant and return. To whom, in very few words, the said Went answered again, he would not; but that by the leave of God, he would stand firm and constant in that he had said. And when the bishop yet notwithstanding did still urge and call upon him with words and fair glosses, to give over himself to their opinion, he could have no other answer of him but this, No, I say as I have said, &c. Whereupon being condemned by the bishop's sentence, he was committed unto the sheriffs, (whom that shameless shaveling at that time abused for his servile butcher) and so brought to his martyrdom, which he with no less constancy suffered to the end, with the rest of that blessed society of martyrs above named.

VI. The History of ISABEL FOSTER, Martyr.

WITH these five persons above recited and condemned, were also two women in the said company condemned the same time, and likewise burned for the same cause; the one a wife, called Isabel Foster, the other a maid, named Joan Warne, or otherwise Lashford.

This aforesaid Isabel was born in Grafestock, in the diocese of Carlisle, and was afterwards married to one John Foster, cutler, of the parish of St. Bride's, in Fleet-street, being of the age of fifty-five years. She likewise, for not coming to their church, was sent to bishop Bonner, who put her in prison, and examined her sundry times, but she would never be overcome, nor removed from the constant confession of Christ's gospel.

At length, coming unto her final examination before the bishop in the consistory the 15th day of the said month of January, she was moved again, whether she would yet go from her former answers. Whereunto she gave a resolute answer in a few words; I will not, saith she, go from them, by God's grace; and thereunto did adhere, neither being cast down by the menacing threats of the bishop, nor yet yielding through his alluring enticements, promising both life and liberty, if she would associate herself in the unity of the catholic church, whereunto she said again in this wise, That she trusted she was never out of the catholic church, &c. and so persisting in the same, continued constant till the sentence definitive was pronounced, and then she was committed by command of the bishop to the secular power, and so brought a few days after to the stake, the 27th day of the aforesaid month; where she, like a faithful witness of the Lord's truth (with the other five aforesaid), ended her troubles here, to find a better rest in the kingdom of Christ our Saviour.

VII. The History of JOAN LASHFORD, alias JOAN WARNE, Martyr.

IN this volume mention hath been made of one Elizabeth Warne, who with her husband John Warne (as is aforesaid), in the beginning of queen Mary's reign, was apprehended in Bow-church-yard for being there at a communion; and both suffered for the same; first, the man in the month of May, then the wife in July after; and now the daughter in the month of January followed her parents in the same martyrdom. Furthermore, in the same place following mention was made also of Dr. Story, who there (we said) was somewhat near unto the said parties, either in kindred or alliance; however, as I have heard since, there was no kindred between them, but only that she was his servant. Yet notwithstanding, the said Dr. Story (as it is above specified) before he was commissioner, made intercession for the parties to Dr. Martin, then commissioner: but afterwards being placed in commission himself, he so far forgot himself, and his old servant, that he became no small procurer of their deaths. I will not here expostulate with the hard heart of that man, nor with his inconstancy: who yet, notwithstanding, after he had brought them to death, was arrested himself for three-score pounds, charged with debt in their behalf; which if it be true, it may thereby appear that he was in some manner allied unto them. But leaving that person to the good pleasure of God, let us return to what we have in hand.

This Joan Lashford, born in the parish of Little St. Alhallows, in Thames-street, was the daughter of one Robert Lashford, cutler, and of the aforesaid Elizabeth, who afterwards was married to John Warne, upholsterer, who (as is before said) was persecuted for the gospel of God to the burning fire; and after him his wife; and after her this Joan Lashford her daughter; who, about the age of twenty years, ministering to her father and mother in prison, suspected and known to be of the same doctrine and religion, was sent to Bonner, bishop of London, by Dr. Story (as is above in the answers to the articles declared) and so committed to the Poultry Compter, where she remained about five weeks, and from thence conveyed to Newgate, where she continued some months.

After that, remaining prisoner in the custody of Bonner, and being examined, her confession was, that for above a twelvemonth before, she came not to the popish mass service in the church, neither would, either to receive the sacrament of the altar, or to be confessed, because her conscience would not suffer her so to do; confessing and protesting, that in the sacrament of the altar there is not the real presence of Christ's body and blood; nor that auricular confession or absolution after the popish sort, was necessary, nor the mass to be good according to the scripture, but said, that both the said sacraments, confession and absolution, and the mass, with all their other superfluous sacraments, ceremonies, and divine service, as then used in this realm of England, were most vile, and contrary to Christ's word and institution; so that they were neither at the beginning, nor shall be at the latter end. This godly damsel, feeble and tender of age, yet strong by grace in this her confession and faith, stood so firm, that neither the flattering promises, nor the violent threats of the bishops could turn her, but being moved and exhorted by the bishop to return to the catholic unity of the church, boldly said to him again, If you will leave off your abomination, I will return, and otherwise I will not.

Whereupon the bishop yet again promised her pardon of all her errors (as he called them) if she would be confirmed. To this she answered again, saying to the bishop, Do as it pleaseth you, and I pray God that you may do that which may please God.

And thus she constantly persevering in the Lord's holy truth, was by the sentence definitive condemned and committed to the sheriffs, by whom, the aforesaid 27th day of January, she with the rest being brought unto the stake, there washed her clothes in the blood of the Lamb, dying most constantly for his word and truth, to whom most lovingly she espoused herself.

And thus much concerning the life, story, and condemnation of these seven martyrs.

The History of five Martyrs who were burnt at Canterbury, at two Stakes in one Fire.

THESE five martyrs suffered for the truth of the gospel at Canterbury on the 31st day of January, being one man, and four women, whose names and examinations here follow:

John Lomas, a young man; Anne Albright; Joan Catmer; Agnes Snoth, widow; Joan Sole, wife.

JOHN LOMAS, Martyr.

JOHN LOMAS, of the parish of Tenderden, detected and presented of that religion which the papists call heresy, and cited upon the same to appear at Canterbury, examined there of the first article, whether he believed the catholic church or no, answered thus; that he believed so much as is contained in God's book, and no more.

Then being assigned to appear again under the pain of the law the next Wednesday seven-night after, which was the 17th day of January, the said Lomas was examined, whether he would be confessed by a priest or no, answered and said, that he found it not written that he should be confessed to any priest in God's book, neither would he be confessed, unless he were accused by some man of sin. Again, examined whether he believed the body of Christ to be in the sacrament of the altar really under the forms of bread and wine after the consecration, or no? He answered, that he believed no reality of Christ's body to be in the sacrament; neither found he written, that he is there under form or trestle, but he

he believed so much as is written. Being then demanded whether he believed that there is a catholic church or no, and whether he would be content to be a member of the same, he answered thereunto, that he believed so much as was written in God's book, and other answer than this he refused to give, &c. Whereupon the sentence was given and read against him the 18th day of January, and so committed to the secular power, he constantly suffered for the conscience of a true faith, with the four women here following.

II. AGNES SNOTH.

AGNES SNOTH, widow, of the parish of Smarden, likewise cited and accused for the true profession of Christ's religion, was divers times examined before the pharisaical fathers; and being there compelled to answer to such articles and interrogatories as should be administered unto her, first denied to be confessed to a priest; notwithstanding she denied not to confess her offences one to another, but not auricularly to any priest. And as touching the sacrament of the altar, she protested that if she or any other did receive the sacrament so as Christ and his apostles after him did deliver it, then she and they did receive it to their comfort: but as it is now used in the church, she said that no man could otherwise receive it than to his damnation, as she thought. Afterwards being examined again concerning penance, whether it were a sacrament or no, she plainly denied the same, and that the popish manner of their absolution was not consonant to the word, nor necessary to be taken; with other such like, agreeing with the answers and confession of John Lomas before-mentioned. Whereupon the sentence being likewise read, she was committed to the sheriffs of Canterbury, and to suffering martyrdom with the rest, declared herself a perfect and constant witness of Christ and his truth, the 31st day of January.

III. ANNE ALBRIGHT, alias CHAMPNES.

ANNE ALBRIGHT, likewise appearing before the judge and his colleagues, it was also objected concerning the same matter of confession. Whereunto she answered in these words, saying, That she would not be confessed by a priest; and added moreover, speaking unto the priests, You priests (said she) are the children of perdition, and can do no good by your confession. And likewise speaking unto the judge and his assistants, she told them that they were subverters of Christ's truth.

And concerning the sacrament of the altar, she said it was a wicked and abominable idol, and so utterly denied the same sacrament. Thus persisting and persevering in her former sayings and answers, she was condemned the 18th day of January, with the others before-mentioned; with whom also she suffered quietly, and with great comfort, for the truth of Christ's religion.

IV. JOAN SOLE.

IN like manner Joan Sole, of the parish of Horton, was condemned by the same pharisees and priests for not allowing auricular confession, and for denying the real presence and substance of Christ to be in the sacrament. Who, after their pharisaical sentence being pronounced, was brought by the sheriffs to the stake with the other four, and sustained the like martyrdom with them, through the assistance of God's unbounded holy grace and Spirit mightily working in her, to the glory of his name, and confirmation of his truth.

V. JOAN CATMER.

THE fifth and last of this heavenly company of martyrs, was Joan Catmer, of the parish of Hith, wife of George Catmer, burned before. Who being asked what she said to confession made to a priest, denied to be confessed to any such priest. And moreover, the judge speaking of the sacrament of the altar, she said and affirmed, That she believed not in that sacrament, as it was then used, for that it was made, said she, a very idol. In this her confession the remaining and persisting, was by the like sentence cruelly by them condemned, and so suffered with the aforesaid John Lomas, and the other three martyrs, ratifying and confessing with their blood the true knowledge and doctrine of the glorious gospel of Jesus Christ our Saviour.

These five persons were burnt at two stakes in one fire, together at Canterbury, as is before said; who, when the fire was flaming about their ears, did sing psalms. Whereat the good knight, sir John Norton, being there present, wept bitterly at the sight.

The judges and other assistants which sat upon her and the other four before mentioned, were Richard Faucet, John Warren, John Mills, Robert Collins, and John Baker, the notary.

The History of the Reverend Pastor and Prelate, THOMAS CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury, Martyr, burnt at Oxford, for the Confession of Christ's true Doctrine, under Queen MARY, March 21, 1556.

CONCERNING the life and estate of that most reverend father in God, and worthy prelate of godly memory, Thomas Cranmer, late archbishop of Canterbury, and of the original cause and occasion of his preferment unto his archiepiscopal dignity, who by many hath been thought to have procured the same by friendship only, and by some others esteemed unworthy of so high a vocation; it is first therefore to be noted and considered, that the same Thomas Cranmer, coming of an ancient parentage, from the conquest to be deduced, and continuing since in the name and family of a gentleman, was born in a village called Arselacton, in Northamptonshire, of whose said name and family there remaineth at this day the manor and mansion-house in Lincolnshire, called Cranmer-hall, &c. sometime the heritage of the said stock and family. He being from his infancy kept at school, and carefully brought up, from school he was sent unto the university of Cambridge, and there prospering in good knowledge among the better sort of students, was chosen fellow of Jesus-college in Cambridge. And so being master of arts, and fellow of the same college, he married a gentleman's daughter, by which he lost and gave over his fellowship, and became a reader in Buckingham-college; and because he would with more diligence apply himself to his office of reading, he placed his said wife in an inn, called the Dolphin, in Cambridge, the woman of the house being a relation of her's. By reason whereof, and his often going to see his wife in that inn, he was much noticed by some popish merchants: on this arose the slanderous noise and report against him, after he was preferred to the archbishopric of Canterbury, raised up by the malicious disdain of certain malignant adversaries to Christ and his truth, reporting abroad every where, that he was but an ostler, and therefore deficient in all good learning. Of whose malicious reports, one of their practices in that behalf shall hereafter be declared, as place and time shall serve.

But in the mean time to return to the matter present: while Mr. Cranmer continued as a reader in Buckingham-college, his wife died in child-bed. After whose death the masters and fellows of Jesus-college, desirous again of their old companion, namely, for his eminent learning, chose him again fellow of the same college. Where he remaining at his study, became in a few years after the reader of the divinity lecture in the same college, and in such universal estimation and reputation with the whole university, that when doctor of divinity, he was commonly appointed one of the heads (which are two or three of the most learned men) to examine such as yearly proceed in commencement, either bachelors or doctors of divinity, by whose approbation the whole university licensed them to proceed unto their degree, and again by whose non-approbation the university university also rejected them for a time to proceed, until they were better furnished with knowledge.

Now, Dr. Cranmer, ever favouring the knowledge of the scripture, would never permit any to proceed in divinity, unless they were substantially versed in the history of the bible: by means whereof certain friars and other religious persons, who were principally brought up in the study of school-authors, without regard had to the authority of the scriptures, were commonly rejected by him; so that he was greatly, for that his severe examination, by the religious sort much hated, and had in great indignation; and yet it came to pass in the end, that divers of them thus compelled to study the scriptures, became afterwards very well learned and well affected; insomuch that when they became doctors of divinity, they could not too much extol and commend Dr. Cranmer's goodness towards them, who for a time had put them back, to initiate themselves in better knowledge and perfection. Among whom Dr. Barret, a white friar, who afterwards dwelt at Norwich, was handled after that manner, giving him no less commendation for his happy rejecting of him for a better amendment. Thus much I repeat, that our apish and popish sort of ignorant priests may well understand, that this his exercise, kind of life, and vocation, was not altogether osler-like.

Well, to proceed; as he was neither in fame unknown, nor in knowledge obscure, he was very much solicited by Dr. Capon, to be one of the fellows in the foundation of cardinal Wolsey's college in Oxford, which he utterly refused, not without danger of indignation. Notwithstanding, he foresaw that which after happened, to the utter confusion of many well-affected learned men there, without consideration (because man's glory was there more sought for than God's), he stood the danger of the said indignation, which turned out more prosperously unto him within a few years after than he expected. While he thus continued in Cambridge, the great and weighty cause of king Henry the Eighth's divorce with the lady Katharine Dowager of Spain, came into question; which being many ways for the space of two or three years amongst the canonists, civilians, and other learned men, diversly disputed and debated, it came to pass that the said Dr. Cranmer, on account of the plague being in Cambridge, resorted to Waltham-Abbey, to one Mr. Cressley's house there, whose wife was a relation of the said Dr. Cranmer. He had two sons of the said Mr. Cressley with him at Cambridge as his pupils; he continued at Waltham-Cross, at the house of the said Mr. Cressley, with the said two children, during the summer-time while the plague reigned.

During this summer cardinal Campeius and cardinal Wolsey, being in commission from the pope, to hear and determine that great cause in controversy between the king and the queen, his pretended wife, dallied and delayed all the summer-time until the month of August in hearing the said cause in controversy debated. When August was come, the said cardinals little minding to proceed to give sentence, took occasion to finish their commission, and to determine no further therein, pretending that it was not permitted by the laws to keep courts of ecclesiastical matters in harvest-time: which sudden stoppage and giving up of the said commission by both the cardinals, unknown to the king, so much enraged him, that he taking it as a mock at the cardinals hands, commanded the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk to dispatch immediately home to Rome cardinal Campeius; and in haste removed himself to Waltham for a night or two, while his household removed to Greenwich: by this means it happened that the harbingers Dr. Stephen Gardiner, secretary, and Dr. Foxe, almoner, (who were the chief furtherers, preferers, and defenders on the king's behalf in the said cause) to lodge in the house of the said Mr. Cressley, where Dr. Cranmer also lodged and resided. When supper-time came, the three doctors met together; Dr. Stephen Gardiner and Dr. Foxe were very much surprised at Dr. Cranmer's being there. He declared the cause, namely, because the plague was in Cambridge: as they were old acquaint-tance, the secretary and the almoner very well entertained Dr. Cranmer, intending to understand his opinion concerning the great business they had in hand. And as this good occasion served, while they were at supper, they conferred with Dr. Cranmer concerning the king's cause, requesting him to give his judgment and opinion of what he thought therein.

Whereunto Dr. Cranmer answered, That he could say little to the matter, as he had not studied nor looked for it. Notwithstanding he said, that in his opinion they made more ado in prosecuting the ecclesiastical law than needed. It were better, as I think, said Dr. Cranmer, that the question, Whether a man may marry his brother's wife, or no? were discussed by the divines, and by the authority of the word of God, whereby the conscience of the prince might be better satisfied and quieted, than thus from year to year by unnecessary delays to prolong the time, leaving the very truth of the matter unsettled by the word of God. There is but one truth in it, which the scripture will soon declare, make open and manifest, being by learned men well handled, and that may be as well done in England in the universities here, as at Rome, or elsewhere in any foreign nation, the authority whereof will soon compel any judge to come to a definitive sentence: and therefore, as I take it, you might that way have made an end of this matter long since. When Dr. Cranmer had thus ended his tale, the other two liked well his device, and wished they had proceeded so before, and thereupon conceived some matter of council to instruct the king with, who was then thinking to send to Rome again for a new commission.

Now the next day, when the king removed to Greenwich, recollecting in himself how he had been used by the cardinals, in thus deferring his cause, his mind was very uneasy, and desirous to see an end of this long and tedious suit, he called unto him the two principal managers of his cause, namely, Dr. Gardiner, and Dr. Foxe. What now, my masters, said the king, shall we do in this infinite cause of mine? I see there must be a new commission procured from Rome, and when we shall have an end, God knoweth, and not I.

When the king had declared somewhat of his mind herein, Dr. Foxe, the almoner, said to the king, we trust that there shall be better ways devised for your majesty, than to send any more to Rome in your highness's cause, which by chance was put into our heads last night at Waltham. The king being very desirous to understand his meaning, said, Who hath taken in hand to instruct you by a better or more expeditious method of proceeding in our said cause? Then said Dr. Foxe, We happened to lodge last night at one Mr. Cressley's house in Waltham, your highness being there, where we met with an old acquaintance of our's, named Dr. Cranmer, with whom having conference concerning your highness's cause, he thought that the best way was, first to instruct and quiet your majesty's conscience by trying your majesty's question by the word of God, and thereupon to proceed to a final sentence. With this report the secretary was displeased with the almoner, because they did not take the glory of this invention to themselves. And when the secretary endeavoured by colourable words to make it appear to the king, that it was a project of their own devising, the king immediately cried out, Where is this Dr. Cranmer, is he still at Waltham? They answered, that they left him there. Then, said the king, I will surely speak with him, and therefore let him be sent for immediately. I perceive (said the king) that that man hath found out the true mode of proceeding. And if I had known this device but two years ago, it had been a great saving of money to me, and extricated me out of much inquietude.

Whereupon Dr. Cranmer was sent for, but having removed from Waltham to Cambridge, was going to see his friends in Nottinghamshire, when the post overtook him. But when he came to London, he began to quarrel with his two acquaintances, that he through their means was thus troubled, and brought thither to be encumbered in a matter which he had not studied, but was intirely unacquainted with ; and therefore intreated they would instantly go and make his excuse in such a manner that he might be dispatched home again, and not be required to come into the king's presence. They promised, and took the matter upon themselves to do, if by any means they could accomplish it. But all was in vain; for the more they excused Dr. Cranmer's absence, the king insisted to have him brought into his presence out of hand, so that no excuse serving, he was obliged immediately to wait on the king at court, whom the gentle prince benignly received, demanded his name, and said unto him, Were you not at Waltham at such a time, in the company of my secretary and my almoner? Dr. Cranmer confessing the same, the king said again, Had you not conference with them concerning our matter of divorce now in question after this sort? repeating the manner and order thereof. That is right true, if it please your highness, quoth Dr. Cranmer. Well, (said the king) I well perceive that you have the right sense of this matter. You must understand that I have been long troubled in conscience, and now I perceive that by this means I might have been long ago relieved one way or other from the same, if we had this way proceeded. And therefore, Mr. Doctor, I pray you, and nevertheless because you are a subject, I charge and command you (all your other business and affairs set apart) to take some pains to see this my cause furthered according to your device, as much as it may lie in you, so that I may shortly understand whereunto I may trust. For this I protest before God and the world, that I seek not to be divorced from the queen, if by any means I might justly be persuaded that this our matrimony were inviolable, and not against the laws of God: for otherwise there never was any other cause to move me to seek any such extremity. Never was there a prince had a more gentle, a more obedient loving companion and wife than the queen is, nor did I ever fancy a woman in all respects better, if this doubt had not risen; assuring you that for the singular virtues wherewith she is indued, besides the consideration of her noble family, I would be right well contented still to remain with her, if so be it would stand with the will and pleasure of Almighty God. And thus highly commending her many and amiable qualities, the king further said, I therefore pray you with an indifferent eye, and with as much dexterity as in you lieth, that you will for your part forward this matter for the discharging of both our consciences.

Dr. Cranmer unwilling by himself to meddle in so weighty an affair, besought the king's highness to commit the trial and examining of this matter by the word of God, unto the best learned men of both his universities, Cambridge and Oxford. You speak well, said the king, and I am content therewith. But nevertheless, I will have you particularly to write your mind thereon. And so calling the earl of Wiltshire to him, said, I pray you, my lord, let Dr. Cranmer have entertainment in your house at Durham-Place for a time, to the intent he may be there quiet to accomplish my request, and let him want neither books, nor any thing requisite for his study. And thus after the king's departure, Dr. Cranmer went with my lord of Wiltshire unto his house, wherein he incontinently wrote his mind concerning the king's question: adding to the same, besides the authorities of the scriptures, of general councils, and of ancient writers, but also his own opinion, which was this, That the bishop of Rome had no such authority, whereby he might dispense with the word of God and the scripture. When Dr. Cranmer had written this book, and committed it unto the king, the king said unto him, Will you stand to this that you have here written before the bishop of Rome? That I will do, by God's grace, quoth Dr. Cranmer, if your majesty will send me thither. Indeed, said the king, I will send you unto him in a sure ambassage.

And thus by means of Dr. Cranmer's handling of this matter with the king, not only certain learned men were sent abroad to the most part of the universities in Christendom, to dispute the question, but also the same being by commission disputed by the divines in both the universities of Cambridge and Oxford, it was there concluded, That no such matrimony was by the word of God lawful.

Whereupon a solemn ambassage was then prepared and sent to the bishop of Rome, then being at Bonony, wherein went the earl of Wiltshire, Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Stokesley, Dr. Carne, Dr. Bennet, and divers other learned men and gentlemen.

And when the time came that they should come before the bishop of Rome to declare the cause of their ambassage, the bishop sitting on high in his cloth of state, and in his rich apparel, with his sandals on his feet, offering, as it were, his foot to be kissed by the ambassadors; the earl of Wiltshire disdaining thereat, stood still, and shewed no countenance thereunto, so that all the rest kept themselves from this wicked idolatry.

However, one thing is not to be omitted here, as a prognosticate of our separation from the see of Rome, which then happened through a spaniel which belonged to the earl of Wiltshire. For he having there a great spaniel which he brought with him out of England, it stood between the earl and the bishop of Rome. And when the said bishop, that servant of the servants of God (as he in great humility stiled himself), offered his foot to be kissed, and while they stood still and declined it, the said spaniel seeing the foot shining with gold and jewels, caught hold of it, taking it to be some kind of repast, and bit it. The pope disdaining the affront, in haste pulled in that glorious foot, and kicked the dog with the other, while the Englishmen smiled in their sleeves at the omen. The pontifical bishop, knitting his brows, demanded the cause of their embassy. Which being declared, the earl of Wiltshire delivered Cranmer's book to the pope; telling him withal, That there were learned men come along with him from England, who were ready to defend what was contained in that book, by the holy scriptures, the councils, and the writings of the orthodox fathers, against all who should contradict it.

The pope often promised the ambassador to appoint a day for the disputation: but it was a promise which he never performed; by affected delays spinning out the time, as his cardinals had before done in England. So giving the ambassadors most honourable and court-like entertainment, and having made Cranmer (whom he either knew or supposed to be the author of that book concerning the king's marriage with Katharine) his penitentiary in England, Ireland, and Wales; being mighty timorous, and equally afraid of the emperor, the French king, and our's, he durst not come to any resolution in a matter of such moment, but dismissed the assembly, without determining, or even proposing any thing about it.

From hence, while the rest returned home, Cranmer by the king's private order, made the emperor and the princes of Germany in his way. At that time the emperor was engaged in an expedition against the Turks, who were engaged in the siege of Vienna, the capital of Austria. Whom when Cranmer attended, and asked him in the king's name, which of his domestics or others that he knew would contradict him? Cornelius Agrippa was mentioned; a man better versed in the secrets of philosophy than divinity. But he being easily brought over to Cranmer's side of the question, did readily join in persuading the other learned men of the emperor's retinue, not to oppose Cranmer; who, he said, had brought the truth along with him. Therefore meeting with no opposition, he took his leave of the emperor. From whence taking a tour throughout Germany, he brought home with him to the king the opinions and judgment of the most learned men there, as well in the universities, as in the courts of princes, all agreeing with his own.

This matter thus prospering on Dr. Cranmer's behalf, as well touching the king's question, as concerning the invalidity of the pope's authority, bishop Warham, then archbishop of Canterbury, departed this transitory life, whereby that dignity then being in the king's gift, was immediately given to Dr. Cranmer, as worthy, for his good services, of such a promotion. Thus much concerning the preferment of Dr. Cranmer, and by what means he arrived at this dignity: not by flattery, nor by bribes, nor by any other unlawful means; which thing I more at large discoursed, to stop the railing mouths of such, who being themselves obscure and unlearned, are not ashamed most scurrilously to attack so learned a man with the nickname of ostler, whom, for his godly zeal to sincere religion, they ought with humility to have had in regard and reputation.

Now as concerning his behaviour and method of living towards God and the world, being now entered into his said dignity, and forasmuch as the apostle St. Paul writing to two bishops, Timothy and Titus, setteth out unto us a perfect description of a true bishop, with all the other properties and conditions belonging to the same, unto which pattern it is rare in these strange days to find the image of any bishop correspondent; yet, for example's sake, let us take this archbishop of Canterbury, and try him by the rule thereof, to see either how near he cometh to the description of St. Paul, or else how far off he serveth from the common course of others in his time, of his calling. The rule of St. Paul is found, 1 Tim. iii. also in his epistle to Titus, chap. i. in these words:

“A bishop must be faultless, as becometh the minister of God, not stubborn, nor angry, no drunkard, no fighter, nor given to filthy lucre; but a lover of hospitality, one that loveth goodness, sober-minded, righteous, holy, temperate, and such as cleaveth unto the true word and doctrine, that he may be able to exhort,” &c.

Unto this rule and touch-stone, to lay now the life and conversation of this archbishop, we will first begin with that which is thus written.

A Bishop must be faultless, as becometh the Minister of God.

As no man is without sin, and as every man carrieth about him his peculiar vice or failings; yet nevertheless the apostle meaneth, that the bishop and minister must be faultless in comparison of the common conversation of men in the world, who seem to live more licentious at their own liberties and pleasures, than a bishop or minister ought to do, having small regard to the giving of good example; which a bishop and minister most carefully ought to consider, lest by his dissolute life the word of God be slandered and evil spoken of; to avoid which, and the better to accomplish this precept of the apostle, this worthy man gave himself to continual study, strictly observing the order that he in the university commonly used, that is, to be by five o'clock in the morning at his book, and so continuing in prayer and study till nine, he then applied himself (if the prince's affairs did not call him away) until dinner-time to hear suiters, and to dispatch such matters as appertained to his special cure and charge, committing his temporal affairs, both of his household and other foreign business, to his officers: so that such things were never impediments either to his study, or to his pastoral charge, which principally consisted in reformation of corrupt religion, and in setting forth of true and sincere doctrine. For the most part always being in commission, he associated himself with learned men for sifting or bolting something or other for the advantage and profit of the church of England. By means whereof, and what for his private study, he was never idle; besides that, he accounted it no idle point to bestow an hour or two of the day in reading over such works and books as daily came from beyond the seas.

After dinner, if any suiters were attendant, he would very diligently hear them, and dispatch them in such an obliging manner, that every one admired and commended his lenity and gentleness, although the case required that sometimes divers of them were committed by him to prison. And having no suiters after dinner, for an hour, or thereabouts, he would play at chess, or behold such as were at play. That done, then again to his ordinary study, where he commonly stood (seldom sat down) till five of the clock, which hour he bestowed in hearing the Common Prayer, and walking, or using some innocent recreation till supper-time. At supper, if he had no appetite (as many times he would not sup), yet he would sit down at table, having his ordinary provision of his mess furnished with expedient company, he wearing his gloves on his hands, because he would, as it were, thereby wean himself from eating of meat, but yet entertaining the company with such edifying discourse as did much delight the hearers; so that by this means hospitality was well furnished, and the alms-chest well maintained for relief of the poor. After supper he would spend, at least, one hour in walking, or some other harmless pastime, and then again till nine of the clock at his study: so that no hour of the day was spent in vain, but the same was so bestowed, as tended to the glory of God, the service of the prince, or the advantage of the church. By all which he gained a good report amongst men, so that his conversation, in comparison with other men, seemed to be faultless, as the minister of God.

That a Bishop ought not to be stubborn.

Secondly, It is required, “That a bishop ought not to be stubborn.” With which kind of vice, without great wrong, this archbishop in no wise ought to be charged; whose nature was such, as none more gentle, or sooner won to an honest suit or purpose, especially such things, wherein by his word, writing, counsel, or deed, he might gratify either gentleman or nobleman, or do good to any mean person, or else relieve the needy and poor. Only in causes pertaining to God or his prince, no man more stout, more constant, or more hard to be won; as in that part his earnest defence in the parliament-house above three days together, in disputing against the six articles of Gardiner's device, can testify. And though the king would needs have them upon some politic consideration to go forward, yet he so handled himself, as well in the parliament-house, as afterwards by writing, so obediently, and with such humble behaviour towards his prince, protesting the cause not to be his, but Almighty God's, who was the author of all truth, that the king did not only well like his defence (willing him to depart out of the parliament-house into the council whilst the act should pass and be granted, for safeguard of his conscience; which he with humble protestation refused, hoping that his majesty, in process of time, would revoke them again); but also after the parliament was finished, the king perceiving the zealous affection that the archbishop bare towards the defence of his cause, which many ways, by scriptures and manifold authorities and reasons, he had substantially confirmed and defended, sent the lord Cromwel, then vicegerent, with the two dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and all the lords of the parliament, to dine with him at Lambeth; where it was declared by the vicegerent, and the two dukes, that it was the king's pleasure, that they all should, in his highness's behalf, cherish, comfort, and animate him, as one that for his trouble in that parliament, had shewed himself both greatly learned, and also discreet and wise, and therefore they willed him not to be discouraged for any thing that was passed contrary to his allegations. He most humbly thanked the king's majesty for his great goodness towards him, and them for all their pains, saying, I hope in God, that hereafter my allegations and authorities shall take place to the glory of God and the advantage of the realm; in the mean time I will satisfy myself with the honourable consent of your honours, and the whole parliament.

Here it is to be noted, that this man's stout and godly defence of the truth herein so bound the prince's conscience, that he would not permit the truth in that man to be clean overthrown with authority and power; and therefore this way God working in the prince's mind, a plain token was declared hereby, that all things were not so sincerely handled in the confirmation of the said six articles as they ought to have been, for else the prince might might have had a just cause to have borne his great indignation towards the archbishop. Let us pray that the like stoutness may be perceived in all ecclesiastical and learned men, where the truth ought to be defended, and also the like relenting and flexibility may take place in princes and noblemen, when they shall have occasion offered to manifest the same, so that they utterly overwhelm not the truth by self-will, power, and authority. Now in the end this archbishop's constancy was such towards God's cause, that he confirmed all his doings by bitter death in the fire, without respect of any worldly treasure or pleasure. And as concerning his stoutness in his prince's cause, the contrary resistance of the duke of Northumberland against him proved right well his good mind that way; which chanced by reason that he would not consent unto the dissolving of chantries, until the king came of age, to the intent that they might then better serve to furnish his royal estate, than to have so great treasure consumed in his nonage. Which stoutness, joined with such simplicity, surely was thought by divers of the council a thing incredible, especially in such sort to contend with him, who was so accounted in this realm, as few or none would or durst withstand him.

So dear to him was the cause of God, and of his prince, that for the one he would not keep his conscience clogged, nor for the other lurk or hide his head. Otherwise (as it is said) his very enemies might easily intreat him in any cause reasonable; so that he was altogether free from the vice of stubbornness, and rather culpable of over-much facility and gentleness.

Not angry.

Then followeth, Not angry. Surely, if over-much patience may be a vice, this man may seem to offend rather on this side than on the contrary. Albeit for all his doings I cannot say: for the most part such was his mortification that way, that few we shall find in whom the saying of our Saviour Christ so much prevailed as with him, who would not only have a man to forgive his enemies, but also to pray for them; that lesson never went out of his memory. It was known that he had many cruel enemies, not for his own defects, but only for the sake of his religion: and yet whosoever he was that sought his hindrance, either in goods, estimation, and life, or upon conference would seem ever so slenderly to relent and excuse himself, he would both forget the offence, and ever afterwards familiarly entertain the offender: insomuch that it became a common proverb, "Do unto my lord of Canterbury a displeasure, or a shrewd turn, and then you may be sure to have him your friend whilst he liveth." Of which his gentle disposition in abstaining from revenge, amongst many examples thereof, I shall repeat one.

It happened, an ignorant priest and parson in the north parts, (the town is not now in remembrance, but he was kinsman to one Chersey, a grocer in London; being one of those priests that used more to study at the alehouse, than in his chamber) to sit on a time with his honest neighbours at the alehouse in his own parish, where they were talking in the praise of my lord Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury: and this priest envying his name only for religion's sake, said to his neighbours, "What make you of him, he was but an oiler, and hath no more learning than the gossins that go yonder on the green," with such like slanderous and uncomely words. His honest neighbours not much liking his irreverent speech, articulated against him, and sent their complaint to the lord Cromwel, then vicegerent in causes ecclesiastical, who sent for the priest, and committed him to the Fleet, intending to have made him recant those slanderous words publicly at Paul's Cross. However the lord Cromwel, having great affairs of the prince then in hand, forgot his prisoner in the Fleet: so that the said Chersey, the grocer, understanding that his kinsman was in confinement, only for speaking words against my lord of Canterbury, consulted with the priest, and between them devised to apply rather to the archbishop for his deliverance, than to the lord Cromwel, before whom he was accused: well knowing the difference of their tempers, the one gentle and full of clemency, the other somewhat more severe and rigid, especially against a papist: so that Chersey took upon him first to try my lord of Canterbury's benignity, inasmuch as his cousin's offence was only against him, and none other. Whereupon the said Chersey came to one of the archbishop's gentlemen (whose father bought all his spices and fruit of the said Chersey, and so thereby of familiar acquaintance with the gentleman), and acquainted him with the trouble his kinsman was in, desiring him to be a means to my lord his master, to hear his suit in the behalf of his kinsman.

The matter was moved. The archbishop, like a good-natured man, would never shew himself strange to the meanest petitioner: he immediately sent for the said Chersey, who appearing before him, declared, that there was a kinsman of his in the Fleet, a priest of the north country, and as I may tell your grace the truth (quoth Chersey) a man of small civility and of less learning: and yet he hath a parsonage there, which now (by reason that my lord Cromwel hath laid him in prison) being in his cure, is unserved, and he hath continued in durance above two months, and is called to no answer, and knows not when he shall come to any end; so that this imprisonment consumeth his substance, and will utterly undo him, unless your grace be his good lord.

I know not the man, said the archbishop, nor what he hath done why he should be thus in trouble.

Said Chersey again, He only hath offended against your grace, and against no man else, as may well be perceived by the articles objected against him; the copy whereof the said Chersey then exhibited to the said archbishop of Canterbury; who well perusing the said articles, said, 'This is the common talk of all the ignorant popish priests in England against me. Surely, said he, I was never made privy to this accusation, and of his confinement I never heard before this time. Notwithstanding, if there be nothing else to charge him withal against the prince or any of the council, I will, at your request, take order with him, and send him again to his cure to do his duty; and so thereupon sent his ring to the warden of the Fleet, desiring him to send the prisoner unto him, with his keeper, in the afternoon.

When the keeper had brought the prisoner at the hour appointed, and Chersey had well instructed his cousin in any wise to submit to the archbishop, confessing his fault, whereby that way he should most easily have an end, and win his favour; the parson was carried into the garden at Lambeth, and there the archbishop sitting under the vine, demanded of the parson what was the cause of his confinement, and who committed him to the Fleet. The parson answered and said, that the lord Cromwell sent him thither, for that certain malicious parishioners of his parish had wrongfully accused him of words which he never spake nor meant. Chersey hearing his foolish cousin so far out of the way from his former instruction, said, Thou dastardly dolt and varlet, is this thy promise thou madest to me? Are there not a great number of thy honest neighbours' hands against thee, to prove thee a liar? Surely, my lord, (quoth Chersey) it is a pity to do him good. I am sorry I have troubled your grace thus far with him.

Well, said the archbishop unto the parson, if you have not offended me, I can do you no good: for I am intreated to help one out of trouble that hath offended against me. If my lord Cromwell hath committed you to prison wrongfully, that lieth in himself to amend, and not in me. If your offence only hath touched me, I will be bold to do somewhat for your friend's sake here. If you have not offended against me, then have I nothing to do with you, but that you may go and remain from whence you came.

Hereupon his kinsman Chersey made a great ado with him, calling him all kinds of opprobrious names! In the end my lord of Canterbury seeming to rise and go his

his ways, the priest fell on his knees, and said, I beseech your grace to forgive me this offence, assuring your grace that I spake those words being drunk and not well advised.

Ah, said my lord, this is somewhat, and yet it is no good excuse: for drunkenness always uttereth that which lieth hid in the heart of man when he is sober, alledging a text or two out of the scriptures concerning the vice of drunkenness, which cometh not now to remembrance.

Now therefore (said the archbishop) that you acknowledge somewhat your fault, I am content to commune with you, hoping that you are at this present of an indifferent sobriety. Tell me then, quoth he, did you ever see me, or were you ever acquainted with me before this day?

The priest answered and said, that he never saw his grace in his life. Why then, said the archbishop, what occasion had you to call me an ostler, and that I had not so much learning as the gossins which then went upon the green before your face? If I have no learning, you may now try it, and be out of doubt thereof: therefore, I pray you, examine me, either in grammar, or in other liberal sciences, for I have at one time or other tasted partly of them. Or else if you are a divine, say somewhat that way.

The priest being amazed at my lord's familiar talk, answered and said, I beseech your grace to pardon me. I am altogether unlearned, and understand not the Latin tongue, but very simply. My only study hath been to say my service and mass, fair and deliberate, which I can do as well as any priest in the county where I dwell, I thank God.

Well, said my lord, if you will not examine me, I will make bold to try you, and yet as easily as I can devise, and that only in the story of the Bible now in English, in which I suppose you are daily exercised. Tell me therefore who was king David's father, said my lord. The priest stood still pausing a while, and said, In good faith, my lord, I have forgotten his name. Then said my lord again to him, If you cannot tell that, I pray you tell me then, who was Solomon's father? The foolish priest, without all consideration of what was demanded of him before, made answer, Good my lord, bear with me, I am no further seen in the Bible, than is daily read in our service in the church.

Then the archbishop said, This my question may be found well answered in your service. But I now well perceive, howsoever you have judged heretofore of my learning, sure I am that you have none at all. But this is the common practice of all you that be ignorant and superstitious priests, to slander, back-bite, and hate all such as are learned and well affected towards God's word and sincere religion. Common reason might have taught you what an unlikely thing it was, and contrary to all manner of reason, that a prince having two universities within his realm of well learned men, and desirous to be resolved of as doubtful a question as in these many years the like was not moved within Christendom, should be driven to that necessity for the defence of his cause to send out of his realm an ostler, being a man of no better knowledge than a gossin, in an embassy to answer all learned men, both in the court of Rome, and the emperor's court, in so difficult a question as touching the king's matrimony, and the divorce thereof. I say, if you were men of any reasonable consideration, you might think it both unseemly and uncomely for a prince so to do. But look, where malice reigneth in man, there reason can take no place: and therefore I see by it, that you all are at a point, that no reason or authority can persuade you to favour my name, who never meant evil to you, but both your advantage and profit. Howbeit, God amend you all, forgive you, and send you better minds.

With these words the priest seemed to weep, and desired his grace to pardon his fault and frailty, so that by this means he might return to his cure again, and he would certainly recant those foolish words before his parishioners, as soon as he came home, and would become a new man. Well, said the archbishop, so had you need: and giving him a godly admonition to forbear haunting the alehouse, and to bestow his time better in the continual reading the scriptures, he dismissed him from the Fleet.

The lord Cromwel, perceiving within a fortnight after that his prisoner was sent home without any open punishment, came to Lambeth to the archbishop, and, in a great heat, said to him, My lord, I understand that you have dispatched the northern priest home again, that I of late sent to the Fleet for railing against you, and calling you an ostler.

Indeed I have done so, said the archbishop, for that in his absence the people of his cure wanted their divine service. It is very devout divine service that he saith, quoth the lord Cromwel; it were more meet for him to be an ostler than a curate, who stuck not to call you an ostler. But I thought so much what you would do; and therefore I would not tell you of his knavery when I sent him to prison. Howbeit, henceforth, they shall cut your throat before that I say any thing more to them on your behalf. Why, what would you have done with him? quoth the archbishop; there was nothing laid to his charge, other than words spoken against me, and now the man hath repented, and is well reconciled, and hath been at great charges in prison: it is time therefore that he were rid out of his trouble. Well, said my lord Cromwel, I meant that he should have preached a recantation at Paul's cross, before he had gone home. That had been well done, quoth the archbishop, for then you would have all the world to wonder at me as well as at him. Well, well, said lord Cromwel, we shall bear so long with these popish knaves, that at length they will bring us indeed to be wondered at of all the world.

This example among others serveth to declare, that there remained small desire of revenge in the said archbishop. But what should I say more? His quietness and mortification this way was such, that it is reported by all that knew him, that he never raged so far with any of his household servants as once to call the meanest of them varlet or knave in anger, much less to reprove a stranger with any reproachful words. Much unlike, in this part to the property (as it seemeth), of some other inferior bishops of this realm, which have not spared to fly in the faces, to pluck off the beards, to burn the hands, to beat and scourge with rods the bodies of gentlemen, both married men and others, having almost nothing else in their mouths, but fools and knaves, &c. and yet after all this, think themselves good perfect bishops, after the rule which followeth, and faith,

No Striker, no Fighter.

From which kind of vice, the nature of this archbishop was so far off, as was his doctrine which he professed, and death which he suffered, far from all condition and example of blind popery. After the prohibition of these foresaid vices, succeedeth the mother of all good virtues necessarily required of all christians, but chiefly of a spiritual prelate; which is,

Not given to filthy Lucre.

The contrary whereof was so odious unto St. Paul, that he esteemed the same no less than a kind of idolatry, in that it maketh men forget their duty to God so far, and instead of him to worship their treasure. How little this prelate we speak of was infected by this vice, and how he was no niggard, all kind of people that knew him, as well learned beyond the seas and on this side, to whom yearly he gave in exhibition great sums of money, as others, both gentlemen, mean men, and poor men, who had in their necessity that which he could conveniently spare, lend, or make, can well testify. And albeit such was his liberality to all sorts of men, that no man did lack whom he could do for, either in giving or lending; yet, nevertheless, such was again his circumspection, that when he was apprehended and committed to the Tower by queen Mary, he owed no man living a penny, that could or would demand any of of him, but satisfied every man to the uttermost; where-as several sums of money were owing him by divers persons, which by breaking their bills and obligations he freely forgave them, and suppressed before his attainer. Infomuch that when he perceived the fatal end of king Edward would work to him no good success touching his body and goods, he immediately called for his officers, his steward and others, commanding them in any wise to pay where any money was owing, which was out of hand dispatched. And then he said, now I thank God I am mine own man, and in conscience with God's help able else to answer all the world and worldly adversities, which some men would suppose he might also have avoided, if he would have been counselled by some of his friends. It followeth moreover,

A Lover of Hospitality.

And as touching his hospitality, so little was this property lacking in him, that some men disliking the same, thought it rather a house of too much lavishing and unprofitable expence. But as nothing can be so well done, which by others shall not be maligned and detracted; so neither did this man want his accusers, some finding fault with his great prodigality, some on the contrary part repining and complaining of his scanty house-keeping, and strict order, much beneath his revenues and calling. Of which two, the first sort must consider the causes which moved him to that liberal and large kind of expences. Wherein here cometh to be considered, the time wherein he served; which was when reformation of religion first began to be advanced. At that time the whole weight and care of the same chiefly depended upon him. During which season almost for the space of sixteen years together, his house was never lightly unfurnished of a number both of learned men and commissioners, from time to time appointed for deciding ecclesiastical affairs.

And thus as he seemed to some to be too lavish and open-handed, even more than hospitality required; so on the other side, there wanted not some, by whom he was much noticed and accused, yea, and complained of to king Henry the Eighth, for his niggardly and slender house-keeping as not worthy to be accounted the hospitality of a gentleman, as by the following doth appear.

After the ample and great possessions, revenues, jewels, rich ornaments, and other treasures of the abbeyes were dissolved and brought into the king's hands, in the dissolving of which many cormorants were fed and satisfied, and yet not so fully but that in a few years they began to be hungry again; and because no more could be scraped out of the abbeyes, they began to seek some other prey to satiate their appetites, and which was, to tickle the king's ears with the rich revenues of the bishops lands. To bring this device to pass, they procured sir Thomas Seymour, knight of the privy chamber, to be a promoter of the same; who not in all points much liking the archbishop, and embracing a favourable opportunity, declared to the king, that my lord of Canterbury did nothing else but sell his woods, and let his leases by large and many fines, making havock of all the royalties of the archbishopric, and that only to the intent to gather up treasure for his wife and children, keeping no manner of hospitality, in comparison of so great a revenue; advertising the king further, that it was the opinion of many wise men, that it were much better for the bishops to have a sufficient yearly stipend in money out of the exchequer, than to be encumbered with those temporal affairs of their royalties, being great impediments to their study and pastoral charge, and his highness to have their lands and royalties converted to his own use, which besides their honest stipends would be no small advantage and profit to his majesty.

When the king had heard this fair tale, he said little thereunto; other than this. Well, we will talk more of this matter at another time. Now, within a fortnight after, or thereabouts (whether by chance, or by intention, it is not known) it came to pass, that his highness going to dinner, had washed, sir Thomas Seymour holding the bason, the king said to him, Go directly to Lambeth unto my lord of Canterbury, and desire him to be with me at two o'clock this afternoon, and see that he fail not. Sir Thomas immediately went to Lambeth, and as he came to the gate, the porter being in the lodge, came out and conveyed him into the hall, which was richly furnished, and full of household servants and strangers, with four head messes of officers, as daily was the custom. When sir Thomas Seymour saw the large stately hall so well set and furnished, being therewith abashed, and sensible of the untruth told to the king before, he turned back, and would needs have gone to the archbishop by the chapel, and not through the hall. Richard Nevil, gentleman, then steward of the household, perceiving him to retire, came to him, and desired to know whether he would speak with my lord: sir Thomas answered, that he must needs do so, for he came from the king's highness, saying, I am going this way to my lord's grace. Sir, said the steward, you cannot go that way, for the door is fast shut at dinner time; so very courteously conducted him through the hall into the chamber where my lord was at dinner; with whom he dined after he had delivered his message, whose common fare might always well become a right honourable personage. Dinner was scarce ended, when sir Thomas took his leave of my lord, and went again to court.

As soon as the king saw him, he said unto him, Have you been with my lord of Canterbury? Sir Thomas answered, I have, and please your majesty, he will be with your highness immediately. Did you not dine with him, said the king? Yes, my liege, said he, I have. And when he had said these words, whether he espied by the king's countenance, or by his words any thing tending to displeasure, but presently without delay he kneeled down upon his knee, and said, I beseech your majesty to pardon me for the great untruth I lately told you concerning my lord of Canterbury's house-keeping; but from henceforward I intend never to believe that person which did put that false tale into my head; for I assure your highness that I never saw so honourable a hall set in this realm, except your majesty's, in all my life, with better order, and so well furnished in each degree. If I had not seen it myself, I could never have believed it, and his own table so honourably served.

What, said the king, have you now espied the truth? I thought you would have told me another tale when you had been there. He was a wicked person, continued the king, that told you that tale; for he spendeth (ah! good man) all that he hath in house-keeping. But now I perceive which way the wind bloweth. There is a set of you to whom I have liberally given of the possessions and revenues of the suppressed monasteries, which as you have lightly gotten, so have you more unthriftilly spent, some at dice, others in gaudy apparel, and other ways worse I fear; and now that all is gone you would fain have me make another disposal of the bishops lands, to accomplish your greedy appetites. But let no other bishops bestow their revenues worse than my lord of Canterbury doth, then shall you have no cause to complain of their house-keeping.

And thus the conversation being ended by the king himself, neither sir Thomas Seymour, nor any other on his behalf ever after durst renew or revive that suit, or any other against the archbishop in king Henry's days; so that it may be evident to all impartial men, the liberality of the archbishop in house-keeping what it was, which being defended and commended by the prince himself, may rather give a good example to his posterity to follow, than was then to be depraved of any private subject, such as knew him not.

Moreover this is not to be forgotten of the good archbishop, touching the relief of the poor, impotent, sick, and such as then came from the wars at Bullen, and other parts beyond the seas, lame, wounded, and destitute: for whom he provided, besides his mansion-house at Beckisborn, in Kent, the parsonage barn well furnished nished with certain lodgings for the sick and wounded soldiers. To whom were also appointed the almoner, a physician, and a surgeon to attend upon them, and to dress and cure such as were not able to go home to their own countries, having daily from the bishop's kitchen hot broth and meat; for otherwise the common alms of the household was bestowed upon the poor neighbours of the shire. And when any of the impotent did recover and were able to travel, they had convenient money to bear their charges, according to the number of miles from that place distant. And this good example of mercy and liberal benignity, I thought here fit not in silence to be suppressed, whereby others may be moved, according to their vocation, to walk in the steps of no less liberality, than in him in this behalf appeared.

One that loveth Goodness, sober-minded, righteous, holy, and temperate.

As concerning these qualities, the business of his life before joined with his benign and gentle disposition, do testify that he could not be void of these virtues reigning in him, which was so abundantly adorned with the other, as we have before declared.

To cleave fast unto the true Word of Doctrine, that he may be able to exhort with wholesome Learning, and to reprove them that say against it.

Then concludeth St. Paul with the most excellent virtue of all others to be wished in a prelate of the church. For if this constancy be not in him to this end, that is, "To cleave fast unto the true word of doctrine, that he may be able to exhort with wholesome learning, and to reprove them that say against it;" if he be void, I say, of these gifts and graces, he is worthy of no commendation, but shall seem an idol, and a deceiver of the world. Neither shall he deserve the name of a bishop, if either for dread or reward, affection or favour, he do at any time, or in any point swerve from the truth. As in this behalf the worthy constancy of this said archbishop never, for the most part, shrunk from any manner of storm; but was so many ways tried, that neither the fear nor favour of his prince, nor any other respect could alienate or change his purpose, grounded upon that infallible doctrine of the gospel. Notwithstanding, his constant defence of God's truth was ever joined with such meekness toward the king, that he never took occasion of offence against him.

At the time of setting forth the six articles, this archbishop was the man, and the only man that opposed them, and disputed with the whole parliament three days together against them. Inasmuch that the king, who could not mislike his reasons, and yet would needs have the articles pass, required him to absent himself for a time out of the chamber while the act should pass, and so he did; and soon after the king sent all the lords to Lambeth to comfort and cheer up his heart, that he might not be discouraged.

And this was done during the time of the lord Cromwel's authority; but that the archbishop's constancy did not decay with the fall of the lord Cromwel, will appear by what followeth.

After the apprehension of the lord Cromwel, the adversaries of the gospel thought all things sure and safe on their own side, it was so appointed amongst them, that ten or twelve bishops, and other learned men, joined together in commission, should come to the archbishop of Canterbury for the establishing of certain articles of our religion, which the papists then thought to win to their purpose against the said archbishop. For having now the lord Cromwel fast and sure, they thought all had been safe and sure for ever: as indeed to all men's reasonable consideration, that time appeared so dangerous, that there was no manner of hope that religion reformed should stand one week longer, such account was made of the king's untowardness thereunto. Inasmuch that of all those commissioners there was not one left to stay on the archbishop's side, but he alone against them all stood in defence of the truth; and those that he most trusted to, namely, bishop Heath and bishop Skip, left him in the plain field, who then so turned against him, that they took upon them to persuade him to their purpose: and having him down from the rest of the commissioners into his gardens at Lambeth, there by all manner of persuasions intreated him to leave off his overmuch constancy, and to incline unto the king's intent, who was fully determined to have it otherwise than he then had penned, or meant to have it sent abroad. When those two, his familiars, with one or two of his other friends, had used all their eloquence and policy, he little regarding their inconstancy and remissness in God's cause and quarrel, very notably said unto them,

You make much ado (said the archbishop) to have me come to your purpose, alledging, that it is the king's pleasure to have the articles, in the way you have devised them, to proceed; and now that you do perceive his highness, by sinister information, to be bent that way, you think it a convenient thing to apply unto his highness's mind. You are both my friends, especially one of you I did recommend to his majesty as a man of trust. Beware, I say, what you do: there is but one truth in our articles to be concluded upon, which if you do hide from his highness by consenting unto a contrary doctrine, and then after in process of time, when the truth cannot be hidden from him, his highness will perceive how that you have dealt treacherously with him, I know his majesty's nature so well (said the archbishop) that he will never after trust nor credit you, nor put any good confidence in you. And as you are both my friends, therefore I wish you to beware thereof in time, and discharge your consciences in maintenance of the truth.

But all this would not serve, for they still swerved; and in discharging his conscience, and declaring the truth unto the king, God so wrought with the king, that his highness joined with him against all the rest, so that the book of articles passing on his side, he won the prize from them all; contrary to all their expectations, when many wagers were laid in London, that he would have been laid up with Cromwel at that time in the tower, for his bold standing up to his principles. After that day there could neither chancellor, bishop, nor papist, bring him out of the king's favour.

Notwithstanding, not long after that, certain of the council, whose names need not be mentioned, by the enticement and provocation of his old enemy the bishop of Winchester, and others of the same sect, attempted the king against him, declaring plainly, that the realm was so infected with heresies and heretics, that it was dangerous for his highness farther to permit it unreformed, lest peradventure by long suffering, such contention should arise, and ensue in the realm among his subjects, that there might spring horrible commotions and uproars, as was the case in some parts of Germany not long ago. The enormity whereof they could not impute to any so much as to the archbishop of Canterbury, who by his own preaching, and his chaplains, had filled the realm with divers and pernicious heresies. The king would needs know his accusers. They answered, forasmuch as he was a counsellor no man durst take upon him to accuse him: but if it would please his highness to commit him to the tower for a time, there would be accusations and proofs enough against him: for otherwise, just testimony and witness against him would not appear, and therefore your highness (said they) must needs give us the counsel, liberty and leave to commit him to prison.

The king perceiving the importunate suit against the archbishop, (but yet meaning not to have him wronged and utterly given over into their hands) granted unto them that they should the next day commit him to the Tower for his trial. When night came the king sent sir Anthony Deny about midnight to Lambeth to the archbishop, willing him forthwith to resort unto him at the court. The message done, the archbishop speedily addressed himself at the court, and coming into the gallery where the king walked and tarried for him, his highness said, Ah, my lord of Canterbury, I can can tell you news. For divers weighty considerations it is determined by me and the council, that you to-morrow, by nine of the clock, should be committed to the Tower, for that you and your chaplains (as information is given us) have taught and preached, and thereby sown within the realm, such a number of execrable heresies, that it is feared, the whole realm being infected with them, no small contentions and commotions will arise thereby among my subjects, as of late days the like was in divers parts of Germany: and therefore the council have requested me, for the trial of the matter, to suffer them to commit you to the Tower, or else no man dare come forth, as witness in these matters, you being a counsellor.

When the king had spoke his mind, the archbishop kneeled down, and said, I am content, if it please your grace, with all my heart, to go thither at your highness's commandment, and I most humbly thank your majesty that I may come to my trial; for there be those that have many ways slandered me, and now by this way I hope to clear myself of such report.

The king perceiving the man's uprightness, joined with such simplicity, said, O Lord! what manner of man be you! what simplicity is in you! I thought that you would rather have sued to us to have taken the pains to have heard you and your accusers together for your trial, without any such imprisonment. Do you not know what state you be in with the whole world, and how many great enemies you have? Do you not consider what an easy thing it is, to procure three or four false knaves to witness against you? Think you to have better luck that way than your master Christ had? I see by it you will run headlong to your own ruin, if I would suffer you. Your enemies shall not so prevail against you, for I have otherwise devised with myself to keep you out of their hands. Yet notwithstanding, to-morrow when the council shall sit, and send for you, resort unto them, and if, in charging you with this matter, they do commit you to the Tower, require of them, (because you are one of them, a counsellor) that you may have your accusers brought before them without any further confinement, and use for yourself as good arguments that way as you may devise; and if no intreaty or reasonable request will serve, then deliver unto them this my ring (which then the king delivered unto the archbishop), and say unto them, If there be no remedy, my lords, but that I must needs go to the Tower, then I revoke my cause from you, and appeal to the king's own person, by this his token unto you all; for (said the king to the archbishop) as soon as they shall see this my ring, they will know it so well, that they shall understand that I have resumed the whole cause into mine own hands and determination, and that I have discharged them thereof.

The archbishop perceiving the king's benignity so much towards him, had much ado to fearbear tears. Well, said the king, go your ways, my lord, and do as I have bidden you. My lord, humbling himself with thanks, took his leave of his majesty for that night.

On the morrow about nine of the clock before noon, the council sent a gentleman-usher for the archbishop, who, when he came to the council-chamber door, could not be let in, but of purpose (as it seemed) was compelled there to wait among the pages, lacquies, and serving men. Dr. Butts, the king's physician, resorting that way, and seeing how my lord of Canterbury was used, went immediately to the king's highness, and said, May it please your grace, my lord of Canterbury is well promoted: for he is now become a footman: yonder he hath stood this half hour at the council-chamber door amongst them. Sure it is not so! (quoth the king) the council hath not so little discretion as to use the metropolitan of all the realm in that manner, especially being one of their own number. But let him alone (said the king), you shall hear more by and by.

At last the archbishop was called into the council-chamber, to whom was alledged, as before is rehearsed. The archbishop answered as the king had before advised him; and in the end, when he perceived that no manner of persuasion or intreaty could serve, he delivered the king's ring, revoking his cause into the king's hands. At this the whole council were much amazed, and it is an easy matter to imagine how foolishly they looked upon one another. The earl of Bedford, with a loud voice, and rapping out a great oath, said, When you first began the matter, my lords, I told you what would come of it. Do you think that the king will suffer this man's finger to ake? much more, I warrant you, will he defend his life against brabbling varlets. You do but incumber yourselves to hear tales and fables against him. And so immediately, upon receipt of the king's token, they all arose, and carried the king his ring, surrendering the matter, as the order and custom was, into his own hands.

When they were all come into the king's presence, his highness, with a severe countenance, said unto them, Ah, my lords, I thought I had wiser men of my council than I now find you. What discretion was this in you, thus to make the primate of all the realm, and one of you in office, to wait at the council-chamber door amongst footmen? You might have considered that he was a counsellor as well as you, and that you had no such commission of me so to handle him. I was willing that you should try him as a counsellor, and not as a mean subject. But now I well perceive that things be done against him maliciously, and if some of you might have had your minds, you would have tried him to the uttermost. But I would have you all to know, and I do protest, that if a prince may be beholden to his subject, (solemnly laying his hand upon his breast) by the faith I owe to God, I take this man here, my lord of Canterbury, to be of all others a most faithful subject unto us, and one to whom we are much beholden, giving him great commendations otherwise. And with that one or two of the chief of the council, making their excuse, declared, that in desiring his confinement, it was rather meant for his trial, that he might have an opportunity of clearing himself of the slanderous reports of the world, than for any malice conceived against him. Well, well, quoth the king, take him and use him well, as he is worthy to be, and make no more ado. And with that every man caught him by the hand, and made fair weather altogether, which might easily be done with him.

And it was much to be marvelled, that they would go so far with him, thus to seek his ruin, when they well knew that the king most intirely loved him, and would always stand in his defence, whosoever spake against him; as many other times the king's patience was tried by sinister informations against him; inso-much that the lord Cromwel was commonly wont to say unto him, My lord of Canterbury, you are most happy of all men; for you may do and speak what you list; and say what all men can against you, the king will never believe one word to your detriment or hindrance. I am sure I take more pains than all the council doth, and spend more largely in the king's affairs, as well beyond the seas as on this side: yea I assure you, even very spies in other foreign realms, at Rome and elsewhere, cost me about a thousand marks a year: and do what I can to bring matters to knowledge, for the advantage of the king and the realm, I am every day chidden, and many false tales now and then believed against me; and therefore you are most happy, for in no point can you be discredited with the king. To this the archbishop answered, If the king's majesty were not good to me that way, I were not able to stand and endure one whole week; but your wisdom and policy is such, that you are able to shift well enough for yourself.

Now when the king's highness had thus benignly and mercifully dispatched the said archbishop from this fore accusation by the council laid against him, all wise men would have thought that it had been mere folly afterwards to have attempted any matter against him: but yet look where malice reigneth, there neither reason nor honesty can take place. Such therefore as had conceived deep rancour and displeasure against him, ceased not to persecute him by all possible means. Then brought brought they against him a new kind of accusation, and caused sir John Gostwike, knight, a man of a contrary religion, to accuse the archbishop openly in the parliament-house, laying to his charge his sermons preached at Sandwich, and his lectures read at Canterbury, wherein should be contained manifest heresies against the sacrament of the altar, &c. Which accusation came to the king's ear. Why (quoth the king) where dwelleth Gostwike? as I take it, either in Bedfordshire or Buckinghamshire, and hath he so open an ear that he can hear my lord of Canterbury preaching out of Kent? This is very likely, said the king. If he had been a Kentish-man, there had been something worthy of consideration: but as for Gostwike, I know him well enough, and what good religion he is of. Go to him and tell him, said the king to one of his privy chamber, if he goes not to my lord of Canterbury, and so reconcile himself to him, that he may become his good lord, I will pull the gossin's feathers so, that hereafter he shall have little lust to slander the metropolitan, or any other learned man. When sir John Gostwike heard these words, there was no need to bid him hasten to Lambeth unto the metropolitan, making to him as many friends as possibly he might. When he came to the archbishop, he was fain to disclose unto him, by what means he was procured to do that which he did; requesting his clemency to be his good lord, or else he took himself to be utterly undone, being so in the king's indignation, as he understood he was by that before declared, which petition was soon granted by that good-natured archbishop, who not only forgave sir John all his ingratitude, but also went to the king, and procured him his majesty's favour again. And thus the king made a short end of this accusation.

Well, here you may perceive that malicious invention went not the wisest way to work, to procure a stranger dwelling afar off, to accuse the archbishop of his doctrine preached in his diocese: and therefore hath blind malice learnt some more wisdom now to accuse their archbishop in such a manner as he shall never be able to avoid it. And therefore it was procured by his ancient enemies, that not only the prebendaries of his cathedral church in Canterbury, but also the most famous justices of the peace in the shire should accuse him and article against him; which in very deed was most substantially brought to pass, and the articles both well written and subscribed, were delivered to the king's highness as a thing of such effect, that there must needs follow to the said archbishop, both indignation of the prince, and condign punishment for his grievous offence committed by him and his chaplains, in preaching such erroneous doctrine as they did within the diocese of Canterbury; whereof they being such witnesses of credit, no man had cause to doubt of their circumspect doings. This accusation particularly sent out, was delivered to the king by the means of some of the council: when the king had perused the book, he wrapt it up, and put it in his sleeve; and finding occasion to solace himself upon the Thames, came with his barge, furnished with his musicians, along by Lambeth-bridge towards Chelsea. The noise of the musicians provoked the archbishop to resort to the bridge to do his duty, and to salute his prince. Whom when the king had perceived to stand at the bridge, immediately commanded the waterman to draw towards the shore, and so came straight to the bridge.

Ah, my chaplain (said the king to the archbishop), come into the barge to me. The archbishop told his highness that he would take his own barge, and wait on his majesty. No, said the king, you must come into my barge, for I want to talk with you. When the king and the archbishop were both together alone in the barge, the king said to the archbishop, I have news out of Kent for you, my lord. The archbishop answered, Good, I hope, if it please your highness. Marry, quoth the king, it is so good that I now know the greatest heretic in Kent, and with that pulled the book of articles out of his sleeve against both the archbishop and his preachers, and gave the book to him, desiring him to peruse the same. When the archbishop had read the articles, and saw himself so uncourteously handled of his own church whereof he was head, I mean the prebendaries of his cathedral, and of such his neighbours as he had many ways gratified, I mean the justices of the peace, it much grieved him. Notwithstanding he kneeled down to the king, and besought his majesty to grant out a commission to whomsoever it pleased his highness, for them to try out the truth of this accusation. In very deed, said the king, I do mean so to do, and you yourself shall be chief commissioner, to adjoin to you such two or three more as you shall think good yourself. Then it will be thought, quoth the archbishop, that it is not fair and impartial that I should be my own judge and my chaplains also. Well, said the king, I will have none other but yourself, and such as you will appoint: for I am sure that you will not halt with me in any thing, although you be driven to accuse yourself, and I know partly how this affair proceedeth, and if you handle the matter wisely, you shall find a pretty conspiracy devised against you. Whom will you have with you, said the king? Whomsoever it shall please your grace to name, quoth the archbishop. I will appoint Dr. Belhouse for one, name you the other, said the king, meet for that purpose. My chancellor, Dr. Cox, and Hufsey, my register, said the archbishop, are men expert to examine such troublesome matters. Well, said the king, let there be a commission made forth, and out of hand get you into Kent, and advertise me of your doings.

They came into Kent, and there they sat about three weeks to find out who was the first occasion of this accusation, for thereof the king would chiefly be informed. Now the inquisition being begun by the commissioners, every man shrunk in his horns, and no man would confess any thing to the purpose. For Dr. Cox and Hufsey, being friendly to the papists, handled the matter so, that they would permit nothing material to come to light. This thing being well perceived by the archbishop's secretary, he wrote immediately to Dr. Buts and Mr. Deny, declaring, that if the king did not send some other to assist my lord, than those that then were there with him, it were impossible that any thing should come to light: and therefore wished that Dr. Lee, or some other spirited man that had been exercised in the king's ecclesiastical affairs in his visitations, might be sent to the archbishop. Upon these letters, Dr. Lee was sent for to court by the king, and having the king's mind farther declared unto him when he came to court, he departed immediately into Kent, so that on All-hallow-eve he delivered to the archbishop the king's ring, with a declaration of his highness's farther pleasure: and after his message was delivered, he advised the archbishop to name him a dozen or sixteen of his officers and gentlemen, such as had both discretion, wit, and penetration, to whom he gave in commission from the king, to search both the purses, chests, and chambers of all those that were deemed or suspected to be of this confederacy, both within the cathedral church and without, and such letters and writings as they could find about them, to bring them to the archbishop and him.

These men thus appointed, went in one hour and instant to all the houses and places they were appointed to; and within four hours afterwards the whole conspiracy was disclosed by finding of letters, some from the bishop of Winchester, some from Dr. London, at Oxford, and from justices of the shire, with others: so that the first beginning, the proceeding, and what should have been the end of their conspiracy, was now made manifest. Certain chambers and chests of gentlemen of the shire were also searched, where likewise letters were found tending to this purpose. Amongst others, two letters came to my lord's hands, the one wrote by the suffragan of Dover, and the other by Dr. Barbar, a civilian, whom the archbishop continually retained in his house for the expedition of matters in suit before him, as a counsellor in the law, when need required. These two men being well promoted by the archbishop, he used ever in such familiarity, that when the suffragan, being prebendary of Canterbury, came to him, he always had him at his own mess, and the other other never from his table, as men in whom he had much delight and comfort, when time of care and peniveness happened. But that which they did was altogether counterfeit, and the devil was turned into the angel of light, for they were both of this confederacy.

When my lord had gotten these their letters into his hands, he one day, when the suffragan happened to come to him at his house at Bekisburn, called him into his study along with Dr. Barbar, saying, Come your ways with me, for I must have your advice in a matter. When they were both with him in his study, he said to them, You two are men in whom I have had much confidence and trust; you must now give me some good counsel, for I am shamefully abused by one or two, to whom I have trusted all my secrets from time to time, and did trust them as myself. The matter is so now fallen out, that they not only have disclosed my secrets, but have also taken upon them to accuse me of heresy, and are become witnesses against me. I require you, therefore, with your good advice to instruct me how I shall behave myself towards them. You are both my friends, and such as I have always used when I needed counsel. What say you to the matter? said the archbishop.

Marry, quoth Dr. Barbar, such villains and knaves (saving your honour) are not worthy to live, but ought to be hanged out of hand without any other law. Hanging were too good, quoth the suffragan; and if there lacked one to do execution, I would be hangman myself.

At these words, the archbishop, being astonished, cast up his hands to heaven, and said, O Lord most merciful God, whom may a man trust now-a-days! It is most true which is said, "Curst is he who putteth his trust in man, and in his own strength." There was never man used as I am: but, O Lord, thou hast evermore defended me, and lent me one great friend and matter (meaning the king) without whose protection I were not able to stand upright one day without being overthrown, I praise thy holy name therefore: and with that he pulled out of his bosom their two letters, and said, Know ye these letters, my masters? Then they fell upon their knees, and desired forgiveness, declaring, how they a year before were tempted to do the same; and so, very lamentably weeping and bewailing their doings, besought his grace to pardon and forgive them. Well, said the gentle archbishop, God make you both good men; I never deserved this at your hands: but ask God forgiveness, against whom you have highly offended. If such men as you are not to be trusted, what should I do alive? I perceive now, that there is no fidelity or trust amongst men. I am brought to this point now, that I fear my left hand will accuse my right hand. I need not marvel much hereat, for our Saviour Christ truly prophesied of such a world to come in the latter days. I beseech him of his great mercy to finish that time shortly: and so departing, he dismissed them both with gentle and comfortable words, in such sort that never after appeared in his countenance or words any remembrance thereof.

Now, when all these letters and accusations were found, they were put into a chest, the king's majesty minding to have perused some of them, and to have punished the principals of them. The chest and writings were brought to Lambeth; at which time began the parliament. Lord, what ado there was to procure the king a subsidy, to the intent that thereupon might ensue a pardon, which indeed followed, and so nothing was done, other than their falsehood known. This was the last push that was attempted against the archbishop during king Henry the Eighth's days; for never after durst any man alledge any matter against him while he lived.

And thus have you both the plotting and disclosing of this popish conspiracy against this worthy archbishop and martyr of Christ, Thomas Cranmer. In which conspiracy, forasmuch as complaint was also made to the king against his chaplains and good preachers in Kent, it shall not be forgotten to mention something concerning them, especially of Richard Turner, then preacher in the archbishop's diocese, and curate to Mr. Morrice, the archbishop's secretary, in the town of Chatham, by whose diligent preaching a great part of this heart-burning of the Papists took it's first kindling against the archbishop. Touching the description of which story, because nothing shall be said by me, neither more nor less than is the truth; you shall hear the very certainty thereof, truly compiled in a letter sent the same time to Dr. Buts, and Sir Anthony Deny, to be shewed unto the king, and so it was written by the aforesaid Mr. Morrice, then secretary to the archbishop, farmer of the benefice of Chatham, and patron to Mr. Turner, there minister and preacher aforesaid.

A L E T T E R

Of Apology written by Mr. MORRICE to Sir WILLIAM BUTS, and Sir ANTHONY DENY, defending the Cause of Mr. RICHARD TURNER, Preacher, against the Papists.

THE letter first beginning in these words: "I am certain (right worshipful) that it is not unknown to your discreet wisdom," &c. And after a few lines, coming to the matter, thus the letter proceedeth.

"As your worships well know, it was my fortune to be brought up under my lord of Canterbury, my master, in writing of the ecclesiastical affairs of this realm, as well concerning reformation of corrupt religion, as concerning the advancement of that pure and sincere religion received by the doctrine of the gospel; which I take to be so substantially handled and built upon the doctrine of the prophets and the apostles, that hell-gates shall never prevail against it. The consideration whereof compelled me, being a farmer of the parsonage of Chatham, in Kent, to retain with me one named Richard Turner, a man not only learned in the scriptures of God, but also in conversation of life towards the world irreprehensible, whom for discharging of my conscience I placed at Chatham, aforesaid, to be curate there. This man, because he was a stranger in the country there, was therefore void of grudge, displeasure, or any old rancour to any individual, and through that and other good qualities gained him credit in his doctrine; but where malice once taketh fire against truth, no policy I see is able to quench it. Well, this man, as he knew what appertained to his office, so he spared not weekly, both Sundays and holidays, to open the gospel and epistle unto his audience after such a sort, when occasion served, that as well by his vehement inveighing against the bishop of Rome's usurped power and authority, as in the earnest setting forth and advancing of the king's majesty's supremacy, innumerable of the people of the country resorting unto his sermons, changed their opinions, and favoured effectually the religion received. The confluence of the people so daily increased, that the church being a fair, ample, and large church, was not now-and-then able to receive the number. The fame of this new instruction of the people was so blazed abroad, that the popish priests were wonderfully amazed and displeased, to see their pope so defaced, and their prince so highly advanced.

Now, thought they, it is high time for us to work, or else all here, will be utterly lost by this man's preaching: some of them went with capons, some with hens, some with chickens, some with one thing, some with another, unto the justices, such as then favoured their cause and faction, and such as were no small fools, as Sir John Baker, Sir Christopher Hales, Sir Thomas Moile, knights, with other justices. The prebendaries of Christ-church, in Canterbury, were made privy hereof, giving their succour and aid thereunto. So that, in conclusion, poor Turner, and other preachers, were grievously complained of unto the king's majesty. Whereupon my lord of Canterbury, and certain other commissioners, were appointed at Lambeth to sit upon the the examination of these seditious preachers. However, before Turner went up to his examination, I obtained of sir Thomas Moile, that he in Easter week was content to hear Turner preach a rehearsal sermon in his parish church at Westwell, of all the doctrine of his sermons preached at his cure in Chatham: which he most gently granting, heard Turner both before noon and afternoon on the Wednesday in Easter week last past, and as it seemed, took all things in good part, remitting Turner home to his said cure with gentle and favourable words. I supposed by this means to have stayed Mr. Turner at home from further examination, hoping that sir Thomas Moile would have answered for him at Lambeth before the commissioners. Notwithstanding, after Mr. Moile's coming to London, such information was laid in against Turner, that he was sent for to make answer himself before the said commissioners; and there appearing before them, he made such an honest, perfect, and learned answer unto the articles objected, that he was, with a good exhortation, discharged home again, without any manner of recantation or other injunction.

Now when the pope-catholic clergy of Kent understood of his coming home without controulment, so that he preached as freely as he did before, against their blind and dumb ceremonies, straightway, by the help of Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, they found a new means to put him to utter confusion, devising that he came home from examination in such glorious pomp by the highways side in the woods adjoining, that five hundred persons met him then with banquetting dishes to welcome him home, stirring the people rather to an uproar and commotion, than to keep them in any quiet obedience: when in very deed, contrary to this surmise, (as God would) on this side Rochester, a mile or two, for avoiding all such light and glorious talk with any of his familiars or acquaintance, he of purpose left the highway, and came through the woods all alone above eighteen miles together on foot, so wearied and fatigued for want of sustenance, that when he came into my house at Chatham, he was not well able to stand or speak for faintness and thirst.

This malicious tale being reported to the king's highness, his majesty was so sore grieved therewith, that he sent for the archbishop of Canterbury, willing him to cause Turner to be whipped out of the country. By means whereof the archbishop of Canterbury sent again for Turner: I hearing thereof immediately made report by my letters, with such vehemency proving it mere malice, that the archbishop understanding the truth, pacified again the king's wrath. Home cometh Turner once again to his cure without blot; which so wrung the papists, in that they could not prevail, that they thought it all in vain any further to attempt against him concerning any accusation for matters in Kent, the archbishop of Canterbury being his ordinary. Well, yet would they not thus leave him undiscredited. Then was there one new matter devised, how that he had preached erroneous doctrine in other counties before he came into Kent, laying to his charge that he had both translated the mass into English, and said, or ministered the same, and that he had preached against purgatory, pilgrimages, and praying for the dead, &c. By means whereof he was now convented before the whole council by the bishop of Winchester, who sent Syriake Petite, gentleman, for him, who brought him up to London bound, (as I heard say) and being examined before the said bishop of Winchester and others, he was committed to ward for a season.

In the mean time, the archbishop of Canterbury being in Kent about the trial of a conspiracy purposed against himself by the justices of the shire and the prebendaries of Christ's church, Turner is now sent down to the archbishop to the intent he should recant that doctrine which long ago he, in other places out of Kent, had preached, to the utter subversion and defacing of all that he had most godly and earnestly here in Kent taught, both to the glory of God, and the furtherance and setting forth of the king's highness's proceedings. If his majesty will thus permit learned honest men thus daily to be insulted and trodden under foot with a sort of tyrannous or rather traitorous papists (who cannot abide to hear his majesty's supremacy advanced, nor the sincere word of God preached), it were better for men to dwell amongst the infidels and miscreants than in England.

What reason is this, that Turner should recant here in Kent the doctrine which in other counties he hath taught, to the wounding and overthrowing most desperately of five hundred men's consciences and above, (I dare say) who lately, by his sincere preaching, have embraced a right good opinion, both of the king's supremacy, and also of the reformed religion received? All good subjects may well lament the king's majesty's estate in this behalf, that no man may dare to be so bold to advance his highness's title, but that every ignorant and malicious papist shall spurn against him, seeking his utter undoing, and that by the aid of papistical justices set in authority. I beseech your worships to pardon me of my rude and homely terms. They herein deserve worse, if worse may be devised. For what honest man can bear with this, that so noble a prince's ears shall be thus impudently abused with manifest lies and fables, as this one is of Turner's coming home in such a triumph as they craftily and falsely had devised? It is easily to be espied what they mean and go about, that, the prince being alive, dare take in hand so uncourtously to abuse both the gentle nature of the prince, and his godly preacher, the advancer and extoller of his just authority.

What think your worships they would attempt, if his majesty were at God's mercy, (as God forbid that ever any of us should see that day, without better reformation) that can thus dally with his highness, blinding his eyes with mists, whilst he liveth and reigneth amongst us in most prosperity? As for my lord of Canterbury, he dare do nothing for the poor man's delivery, he hath done so much for him already. And his grace hath told me plainly, that it is put into the king's head, that he is the maintainer and supporter of all the heretics within the realm; nor will he permit me or my neighbours to resort unto the council for his purgation while he was at Chatham, saving only I have obtained this at his hand, that I may become a suitor in writing to my friends and good masters in the court for his delivery.

And therefore it is (right worshipful) that I have now taken pen in hand, thus to discourse and open our misery unto you concerning the extreme handling of this poor honest man, Mr. Turner, that if it may possibly be brought to pass by your godly wisdom, the poor man may be released and discharged of his recantation; you cannot do to God and your prince a more acceptable service in my poor opinion. For otherwise if he should be driven to recant, (as I am sure he will sooner die) both the cause of God and the king will suffer no small detriment amongst his poor loving subjects here. For if there be no better stay for the maintenance of these godly preachers, the king's authority concerning his supremacy shall lie intirely hidden in the act of parliament, and not in the hearts of his subjects.

If they can bring to pass that Turner may recant, to the defacing of his good doctrine preached here, then have they that for which they have thus travailed. And yet in effect shall not Turner recant, but king Henry the Eighth in Turner's person shall most odiously recant, to the wounding of all men's consciences here. If the king's majesty do not esteem his authority given to his highness by God's word and his parliament; it were well done that the preachers had good warning to talk no more to the people thereof, rather than thus to be tossed and troubled for doing their duties by the members of Antichrist.

And now, to the intent that they might effectually for ever slander Turner's doctrine here, they have indicted him for offending against the six articles this last sessions, by the witness of two papists of the parish of Chatham, his utter enemies, Saunders and Brown by name, for a sermon preached at Chatham on Passion-Sunday, which chanced on St. Gregory's even, they both both being absent that day at Wye fair, as it is well proved, namely, for that he preached against the mass: saying, that our Saviour Christ was the only sole priest, which sung mass on the altar of the cross, there sacrificing for the sins of the world once for ever, and that all other masses were but remembrances and thanksgiving for that one sacrifice; or such words in effect.

Wherefore, to conclude, (right worshipful) knowing your godly zeal, as well towards the preferment of sincere religion, as your no less affection towards the king's majesty's person and his godly proceedings, I most humbly beseech you, in the bowels of our Saviour Christ, so to ponder the weighty consideration of the premises, as by your travails unto the king's majesty, or to the honourable council, we here in Kent that have now of late our hearts bent towards the observation of the law of God and the prince, through Turner's godly persuasions, may receive from your worships some comforts of his deliverance, or else certainly many an honest and simple man, lately embracing the truth, may perhaps fall away desperately from the same, not without danger of their souls. In accomplishing whereof your worships shall not only do unto Almighty God and the prince most true and acceptable service, but also bind the said Mr. Turner, with all others to whom this cause doth appertain, both daily to pray for your prosperities, and also to be at your commandments during their lives. From Canterbury, the second day of November.

Your worships evermore at command,

R. M.

And thus much containeth the letter sent (as is said) by Mr. Morrice to Dr. Buts and sir Anthony Deny. Now, what success and speed this letter had, hereafter shall be declared. For Dr. Buts, the king's physician aforesaid, after the receipt of these letters, considering the weighty contents of the same, as he was ever a forward friend in the gospel's cause, so he determined to act in this matter to the uttermost of his diligence, and so watching his opportunity, when the king was in trimming and in washing (as his manner was at certain times to call for his barber), Dr. Buts, (whose manner was at such times ever to be present, and with some pleasant conceits to refresh and solace the king's mind) brought with him, in his hand, this letter. The king asking what news, Dr. Buts pleasantly and merrily becometh to insinuate to the king the effect of the matter, and so at the king's command read out the letter; which, when the king had heard, and paused a little thereon, commanded the letter to be read again. The hearing and consideration whereof so altered the king's mind, that whereas before he commanded the said Turner to be whipped out of the country, he now commanded him to be retained as a faithful subject. And here is an end of that matter. Let us now return to the archbishop again.

Although he was encompassed about (as is said) with mighty enemies, and by many crafty trains impugned, yet through God's more mighty providence, working in the king's heart so to favour him, he lived out all king Henry's time, without blemish or soil, by means of the king's protection; who not only defended the said archbishop against such conspired adversaries, but also extended such special favour to him in such manner, that he being not ignorant of his wife, whom he had married before at Noremberge, (being niece to the wife of Osiander) keeping her also their fix articles time contrary to law, notwithstanding he both permitted the same, and kept his council.

Then after the death of king Henry, immediately succeeded his son king Edward, under whose government and protection the state of this archbishop, being his godfather, was not impaired, but rather more advanced.

During all this time of king Henry aforesaid, until the entering in of king Edward, it seemed that Cranmer was scarcely yet thoroughly persuaded in the right knowledge of the sacrament, or at least was not yet fully ripened in the same; wherein shortly after he being more grounded and confirmed by conference with bishop Ridley; in process of time did so profit in more ripe knowledge, that at last he took upon him the defence of that whole doctrine, that is, to refute and throw down first the corporal presence; secondly, the fantastical transubstantiation; thirdly, the idolatrous adoration, fourthly, the false error of the papists, that wicked men do eat the natural body of Christ; and lastly, the blasphemous sacrifice of the mass. Whereupon in conclusion he wrote five books for the public instruction of the church of England, which instruction to this day standeth, and is received in the church of England.

Against these five books of the archbishop, Stephen Gardiner, the arch-enemy to Christ and his gospel, being then in the Tower, drew up a certain answer such as it was, which he in open court exhibited at Lambeth, being there examined by the archbishop aforesaid, and other the king's commissioners in king Edward's days, which book was intitled, "An explication and assertion of the true catholic faith, touching the blessed sacrament of the altar, with a confutation of a book written against the same."

Against this explication, or rather cavilling sophistication of Stephen Gardiner, doctor of law, the archbishop of Canterbury learnedly and copiously replied again, which also he published abroad to the eyes and judgments of all men.

The unquiet spirit of Stephen Gardiner being not yet contented, after all this he thrust out another book in Latin of the like popish argument, but after another title, named Marcus Antonius Constantinus. Whereunto first the archbishop again intending a full confutation, had already absolved three parts of his answer lying in prison. Of which parts two perished in Oxford; the other is fallen in my hands, worthy to be seen and set forth, as the Lord shall see good. Also bishop Ridley, lying likewise the same time in prison, having there the said book of Marcus Antonius, for lack of pen and paper, with the lead of a window, in the margin of the book wrote annotations, as streightness of time would serve him, in refutation of the same book. And finally, because these worthy martyrs had neither liberty nor leisure to go through with that travail, that which lacked in them, for accomplishment of that behalf, was supplied shortly by Peter Martyr, who abundantly and substantially hath overthrown that book in his learned defence of the truth, against the false sophistication of Marcus Antonius aforesaid.

Besides these books above cited of this archbishop, divers other things there were also of his doing, as the book of the reformation, the catechism, with the book of homilies, whereof part was by him contrived, part by his procurement approved and published. Whereunto also may be adjoined another writing of confutation of his against eighty-eight articles by the convocation devised and propounded, but yet not ratified nor received in the reign of king Henry the Eighth.

And thus much concerning the actions of this archbishop of Canterbury, during the lives of king Henry the Eighth, and of king Edward his son. During whose lives this archbishop lacked no stay of maintenance against all his enemies.

Afterward, this king Edward, a prince of most worthy qualifications, falling sick, when he perceived that his death was at hand, and the force of his painful disease would not suffer him to live longer, and knowing that his sister Mary was wholly wedded to the popish religion, bequeathed the succession of this realm to the lady Jane (a lady of great birth, but of greater learning, being niece to king Henry the Eighth by his sister) by consent of the council and lawyers of the realm. To this testament of the king's, when all the nobles of the realm, estates, and judges had subscribed, they sent for the archbishop, and required him that he also would subscribe. But he excusing himself in this manner, said, That it was otherwise in the testament of king Henry his father, and that he had sworn to the succession of Mary, as then the next heir; by which oath he was so bound, that without manifest perjury he could not go from it.

The

The council answered, that they were not ignorant of that, and that they had conscience as well as he; and moreover, that they were sworn to that testament, and therefore he should not think there was any danger therein, or that he should be in more peril of perjury than the rest.

To this the archbishop answered, that he was judge of no man's conscience but his own: and therefore as he would not be prejudicial to others, so he would not commit his conscience unto other men's facts, or cast himself into danger, seeing that every man should give account of his own conscience, and not of other men's. And as concerning the subscription, before he had spoken with the king himself, he utterly refused to do it.

The king therefore being demanded of the archbishop concerning this matter, said, that the nobles and lawyers of this realm counselled him unto it, and persuaded him that the bond of the first testament could nothing hinder, but that this lady Jane might succeed him as heir, and the people without danger acknowledge her as their queen. Who then demanding leave of the king that he might first talk with certain lawyers that were in the court; when they all agreed that by law of the realm it might be so, returning to the king, with much ado he subscribed.

Well, not long after this king Edward died, being almost sixteen years old, to the great sorrow, but greater calamity of the whole realm. After whose decease, immediately it was commanded that the lady Jane (who was unwilling thereunto) should be proclaimed queen. Which thing the common people much disliked, not that they did so much favour the lady Mary, before whom they saw the lady Jane preferred, as for the hatred conceived against some whom they could not favour.

Besides this, there happened also other causes of discord between the nobles and commons the same time: for what injuries of commons and inclosures wrongfully held, with other inordinate pollings and uncharitable dealings between the landlords and tenants, I cannot tell. But in fine, thus the matter fell out, that the lady Mary hearing of the death of her brother, and shifting for herself, was so assisted by the commons, that she soon prevailed. Who being established in the possession of the realm, not long after came to London: and after she had first caused the two fathers, the duke of Northumberland, and the duke of Suffolk, to be beheaded (as has been already related), she likewise caused the lady Jane, being both in age tender, and innocent from this crime, after she could by no means be turned from the constancy of her faith, together with her husband, to be beheaded.

The rest of the nobles, paying fines, were forgiven, the archbishop of Canterbury only excepted: who though he desired pardon (by means of his friends) could obtain none: inasmuch that the queen would not once vouchsafe to see him. For as yet the old grudge against the archbishop for the divorcement of her mother, remained hid in the bottom of her heart. Besides this divorce, she remembered the state of religion changed; all which was imputed to the archbishop as the cause thereof.

While these things were doing, a rumour was in all men's mouths, that the archbishop, to gain favour with the queen, had promised to say a dirge mass after the old custom, for the funeral of king Edward, her brother. Neither wanted there some who reported that he had already said mass at Canterbury; which mass indeed was said by Dr. Thornton. This rumour Cranmer thinking speedily to stop, gave forth a writing of his purgation: the tenor whereof being before expressed, I need not here again recite.

This bill being thus written, and lying openly in a window in his chamber, cometh in by chance Mr. Story, then bishop of Rochester, who after he had read and perused the same, required the archbishop to have a copy of the bill. The archbishop granting the same, and by Mr. Story's lending it to another friend, there were divers copies taken, and the thing published abroad among the common people, inasmuch that almost every scrivener's shop was occupied in copying out the same: and so at length some of these copies coming to the bishop's hands, and so brought to the council, and they sending it to the commissioners, the matter was known, and so he commanded to appear.

Whereupon Dr. Cranmer appeared at the day prefixed, before the said commissioners, bringing a true inventory, as he was commanded, of all his goods. That done, a bishop of the queen's privy council, being one of the said commissioners, after the inventory was received, made mention of the bill; My lord, said he, there is a bill put forth in your name, wherein you seem to be aggrieved with setting up the mass again; we doubt not but you are sorry that it is gone abroad.

To whom the archbishop answered, As I do not deny myself to be the author of that bill or letter, so must I confess here unto you, concerning the same bill, that I am sorry that the said bill went from me in such sort as it did. For when I had written it, Mr. Story got the copy from me, and it is now come abroad, and as I understand, the city is full of it. For which I am sorry that it so passed my hands: for I intended otherwise to have made it in a more large and ample manner, and minded to have set it on St. Paul's-church door, and on the doors of all the churches in London, with mine own seal joined thereunto.

At which words, when they saw the constancy of the man, they dismissed him, affirming they had no more at present to say unto him, but that shortly he should hear farther. The said bishop declared afterwards to one of Dr. Cranmer's friends, that notwithstanding his attainder of treason, the queen's determination at that time was, that Cranmer should only have been deprived of his archbishopric, and have had a sufficient living assigned him, upon his exhibiting of a true inventory, with commandment to keep his house without meddling in matters of religion. But how true that was I have not to say. This is certain, that not long after this, he was sent to the Tower, and soon after condemned for treason. Notwithstanding the queen, when she could not honestly deny him his pardon, seeing all the rest were discharged, and especially, seeing he last (of all others) subscribed to king Edward's request, and that against his own will, released to him his action of treason, and accused him only of heresy, which the archbishop liked well, and came to pass as he wished, because the cause was not his own, but Christ's; not the queen's, but the church's. Thus stood the cause of Cranmer, till at length it was determined by the queen and the council, that he should be removed from the Tower where he was prisoner, to Oxford, there to dispute with the doctors and divines. And privily word was sent before to them of Oxford to prepare themselves, and make them ready to dispute. And although the queen and the bishops had concluded before what should become of him, yet it pleased them that the matter should be debated with arguments, that under some honest shew of disputation the murder of the man might be covered. Neither could their hasty speed of revenge abide any long delay; and therefore in all haste he was carried to Oxford.

What this disputation was, and how it was handled what were the questions and reasons on both sides, and also touching his condemnation by the university and the prolocutor, because it hath been sufficiently declared, we intend now therefore to proceed to his final judgment and order of condemnation, which was the 12th day of September, 1555, and seven days before the condemnation of bishop Ridley and Mr. Latimer, as is before-mentioned. The story whereof here followeth, faithfully corrected by the report and narration (coming by chance to our hands) of one who being both present thereat, and also a devout favourer of the see and faction of Rome, can lack no credit (I think) with such who seek what they can to discredit whatsoever maketh not with their fancied religion of Rome.

After the disputations done and finished in Oxford between the doctors of both universities, and the three worthy bishops, Drs. Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, ye heard then how sentence condemnatory, immediately upon the same, was administered against them by Dr. Weston and others of the university; whereby they were judged to be heretics, and so committed to the mayor and sheriffs of Oxford. But forasmuch as the sentence given against them was void in law, (for at that time the authority of the pope was not yet received into the land) therefore a new commission was sent from Rome, and a new process framed for the conviction of these reverend and godly learned men aforesaid. In which commission, first was Dr. James Brooks, bishop of Gloucester, the pope's sub-delegate; with Dr. Martin and Dr. Story, commissioners in the king and queen's behalf for the execution of the same. Of which three commissioners above-named, as touching Dr. Martin, this by the way is to be understood; that although he was used for an instrument of the pope's side to serve a turn, (whose book also is extant against the lawful marriage of priests) yet notwithstanding neither was he so bitter an enemy in this persecution as the other commissioners were; and also in the time of queen Elizabeth, where divers other doctors of the arches refused to be sworn against the pope, he denied not the oath; and yet notwithstanding not altogether here to be excused. But to the purpose of this story. Whereof, first, it shall be requisite to declare the circumstance, and the whole state of the matter, as in a general description, before we come to their orations, according as, in a part of a certain letter concerning the same, it came to our hands.

IMPRIMIS. Here is to be understood, that at the coming down of the aforesaid commissioners, which was upon Thursday the 12th of September, 1555, in the church of St. Mary, and in the east end of the said church, at the high altar, was erected a solemn scaffold for bishop Brooks aforesaid, representing the pope's person, ten feet high. The seat was made that he might sit under the sacrament of the altar. And on the right hand of the pope's delegate, beneath him sat Dr. Martin, and on the left hand sat Dr. Story, the king and queen's commissioners, who were both doctors of the civil law, and underneath them other doctors, scribes and pharisees also, with the pope's collector, and a number of such others.

And thus these bishops being placed in their pontificals, the archbishop of Canterbury was sent for to come before them. He having intelligence of them that were there, thus ordered himself. He came forth of the prison to the church of St. Mary, set forth with bills and spears for fear he should start away, being clothed in a fair black gown, with his hood on both shoulders, such as doctors of divinity used to wear in the university. Who, after he came into the church, and did see them sit in their pontificals, he did not put off his cap to any of them, but stood still till he was called.

And anon one of the proctors for the pope, also his doctor, called, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, appear here and make answer to what shall be laid to thy charge; that is to say, for blasphemy, incontinence, and heresy; and make answer here to the bishop of Gloucester, representing the pope's person.

Upon this he being brought nearer unto the scaffold, where the aforesaid bishop sat, he first well viewed the place of judgment, and espying where the king and queen's majesties' proctors were, putting off his cap, he first humbly bowing his knee to the ground, made reverence to the one, and after to the other.

That done, beholding the bishop in the face, he put on his bonnet again, making no manner of token of obedience towards him at all. Whereat the bishop being offended, said unto him, that it might beseem him right well, weighing the authority he did represent, to do his duty unto him.

Whereunto Dr. Cranmer answered and said, That he had once taken a solemn oath, never to consent to the admitting of the bishop of Rome's authority into this realm of England again; and that he had done it advisedly, and meant by God's grace to keep it; and therefore would commit nothing either by sign or token, which might argue his consent to the receiving of the same; and so he desired the said bishop to judge of him, and that he did it not for any contempt to his person, which he could willingly have honoured as well as any of the others, if his commission had come from as good an authority as their's. This he answered both modestly, wisely, and patiently, with his cap on his head, not once bowing or making any reverence to him that represented the pope's person, which was wonderously marked by the people that were there present and saw it, and marked it as nigh as could be possible.

No. 40.

When after many means used, they perceived that the archbishop would not move his bonnet, the bishop proceeded in these words following.

The Oration of Dr. BROOKS, Bishop of Gloucester, unto Dr. CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury, in the Church of St. Mary, at Oxford, March 12, 1556.

MY lord, at this present we are come to you as commissioners, and for you, not intruding ourselves by our own authority, but sent by commission, partly from the pope's holiness, partly from the king and queen's most excellent majesties, not to your utter discomfort, but to your comfort if you will yourself. We come, not to judge you, but to put you in remembrance of what you have been, and may be. Neither come we to dispute with you, but to examine you in certain matters; which being done, to make relation thereof to him that hath power to judge you. The first being well taken, shall make the second to be well taken. For if you, of your part, be moved to come to a conformity, then shall not only we of our side take joy of our examination, but also they that have sent us.

And first, as charity doth move us, I would think good somewhat to exhort you, and that by the second chapter of St. John in the Revelations, "Remember from whence thou art fallen, and do the first works, or if not,"—and you know what followeth. Remember yourself from whence you have fallen. You have fallen from the universal and catholic church of Christ, from the very true and received faith of all Christendom, and that by open heresy. You have fallen from your promise to God, from your fidelity and allegiance, and that by open preaching, marriage, and adultery. You have fallen from your sovereign prince and queen by open treason. Remember therefore from whence you are fallen. Your fall is great, the danger cannot be seen. Wherefore, when I say, Remember from whence you are fallen, I put you in mind, not only of your fall, but also of the state you were in before your fall. You were some time, as I and other poor men, in a mean estate; God I take to witness, I speak it to no reproach or abasement of you, but to put you in memory, how God hath called you from a low to an high degree, from one degree to another, from better to better, and never gave you over, till he had appointed you an ambassador, metropolitan of all England, and pastor of his own flock: such great trust did he put you in, in his church; what could he do more? for even as he ordained Moses to be a ruler over his church of Israel, and gave him full authority of the same; so did he make you over his church of England. And when did he this for you? forsooth, when you gave no occasion or cause of mistrust either to him or to his magistrates. For although it be conjectured, that in all your time you were not upright in the honour and faith of Christ, but rather set up on purpose as a fit instrument, whereby the church might be spoiled and brought into ruin: yet may it appear by many of your doings otherwise, and I, for my part, as it becometh each one of us, shall think the best. For who was thought as then more devout? who was more religious in the face of the world? who was thought to have more conscience of a vow-making, and observing the order of the church, more earnest in the defence of the real presence of Christ's body and blood in the sacrament of the altar than you were? and then all things prospered with you; your prince favoured you; yea, God himself favoured you; your candlestick was set up in the highest place of the church, and the light of your candle was over all the church; I would God it had so continued still.

But after you began to fall by schism, and would not acknowledge the pope's holiness as supreme head, but would stoutly uphold the unlawful requests of king Henry the Eighth, and would bear with what should not be borne withal, then began you to fancy unlawful liberty; and when you had exiled a good conscience, then ensued great shipwreck in the sea, which was out of the true and catholic church into the sea of desperation: for, as he saith, without the church there is no salvation. When you had forsaken God, God forsook you, and gave you over to your own will, and suffered you to fall from schism to apostacy, from apostacy to heresy, and from heresy to perjury, from perjury to treason, and so in conclusion, into the full indignation of our sovereign prince, which you may think a just punishment of God for your other abominable opinions.

After that, ye fell lower and lower, and now to the lowest degree of all, to the end of honour and life. For if the light of your candle be as it hath been hitherto dusky, your candlestick is like to be removed, and have a great fall, so low, and so far out of knowledge, that it be quite out of God's favour, and past all hope of recovery: for in hell there is no redemption. The danger whereof being so great, very pity causeth me to say, "Remember from whence thou hast fallen;" I add also, and whither you fall.

But here peradventure you will say to me, What, sir, my fall is not so great as you make it: I have not yet fallen from the catholic church. For that is not the catholic church that the pope is head of. There is another church. But as touching that I answer, You are sure of that as the Donatists were, for they said they had the true church, and that the name of true christians remained only in Africa, where only their seditions were preached. And as you think, so thought Novatus, that all they that did acknowledge their supreme head at the see of Rome, were out of the church of Christ. But here St. Cyprian, defending Cornelius against Novatus, Book ii. Epist. 6. saith on this wise, The church is one, which church, whereas it is one, it cannot be here and there. So that if Novatus was in the church, then was not Cornelius, who indeed by lawful succession succeeded pope Fabian. Here St. Cyprian intendeth by the whole process to prove, and concludeth thereupon, that the true church was only at Rome. Gather you then what will follow your fall. But you will say peradventure, that you fell not by heresy, and so said the Arians, alledging for themselves that they had scripture, and went about to prove their schism by scripture; for indeed they had more places by two and forty, which by their torture seemed to depend upon scripture, than the catholics had.

So did the Marcions endeavour to prove their heresy by scripture. But those are not scriptures; for they are not truly alledged, nor truly interpreted, but untruly wrested and wrong, according to their own fantasies. And therefore were they all justly condemned for their wrong taking of the scriptures, and the church replieth against them, saying, What make you here in my heritage? from whence came you? the scripture is mine inheritance: I am right heir thereof: I hold it by true succession of the apostles; for as the apostles required me to hold, so do I hold it. The apostles have received me, and put me in my right, and have rejected you as bastards, having no title thereunto.

Also you will deny that you have fallen by apostacy, by breaking your vow; and so Vigilantius said, inso-much that he would admit none to his ministry, but those who had their wives bagged with children. What now? shall we say, that Vigilantius did not fall therefore? Did not Donatus and Novatus fall, because they said so, and brought scripture for their defence? Then let us believe as we list, pretending well, and say so: for except the church which condemneth them for their saying so, do approve us for so doing, then will she condemn you also: so that your denial will not stand. And therefore I tell you, Remember from whence you are fallen, and how long you shall fall if you hold on as you do begin. But I trust you will not continue, but revoke yourself in time, and the remedy followeth.

Repent, and do thy first works, for by such means as you have fallen you must rise again. First, your heart hath fallen, then your tongue and your pen, and besides your own damage, hath caused many more to fall. Therefore, first your heart must turn, and then shall the tongue and pen be quickly turned; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place.

I need not to teach you a method to turn; you know the ready way yourself. But I would God I could but exhort you to the right and truth, then the way should soon be found out. For if you remember how many you have brought by abominable heresy into the way of perdition, I doubt not but very conscience would move you, as much for them as for yourself, to come again. And so would you spare neither tongue nor pen, if the heart were once reformed; for, as touching that point, the Holy Ghost toucheth their hearts very near by the mouth of his holy prophet Ezekiel, when he requireth the blood of his flock at the priest's hands, for lack of good and wholesome food. How much more should this touch your guilty heart, having overmuch diligence to teach them the way of perdition, and feeding them with baggage and corrupt food, which is heresy; "He that shall convert a sinner from his wicked life, shall save his soul from death, and shall cover the multitude of sins." So that if it be true, that he who converteth a sinner, saveth a soul; then the contrary must needs be true, that he that perverteth a soul, and teacheth him the way to perdition, must needs be damned.

Origen, on the epistle of St. Paul to the Romans, saith, The damnation of those that preach heresy doth increase to the day of judgment. The more that perish by heretical doctrine, the more grievous shall their torment be, that minister such doctrine. Berengarius, who seemed to fear that danger, provided for it in his life-time, but not without a troubled and disquiet conscience. He did not only repent; but recant, and not so much for himself, as for them whom he had with most pestilent heresies infected. For as he lay on his death-bed, upon Epiphany-day, he demanded of them that were present, Is this (quoth he) the day of Epiphany, and appearing of the Lord? They answered him, Yea. Then (quoth he) this day shall the Lord appear to me, either to my comfort, or to my discomfort. This remorse argueth, that he feared the danger of them whom he had taught and led out of the faith of Christ. Origen, upon him, saith in this wise, "Although his own blood was not upon his head, for that he did repent, and was sorry for his former errors, yet being converted, he feared the blood of them whom he had infected, and who received his doctrine."

Let this move you even at the last point. Inso-much as your case is not unlike to Berengarius, let your repentance be like also. And what should stay you (tell me) from this godly return? Fear that you have gone so far, ye may not return? Nay, then I may say as David said, "You fear where you have no cause to fear." For if you repent and be heartily sorry for your former heresy and apostacy, you need not to fear. For as God, of his part, is merciful and gracious to the repentant sinner, so is the king, so is the queen merciful, which you may well perceive by your own case, since you might have suffered a great while ago for treason committed against her highness, but you have been spared and reserved upon hope of amendment, which she conceived very good of you, but now (as it seemeth) is but a very desperate hope. And what do you thereby? "According to the hardness of your heart you treasure up to yourself anger in the day of wrath."

Well, what is it then, if fear do not hinder you? Shame, to unsay that that you have said? Nay, it is no shame, unless you think it shame to agree with the true and catholic church of Christ. And if that be shame, then blame St. Paul, who persecuted the disciples of Christ with the sword; then blame St. Peter, who denied his master Christ with an oath, that he never knew him. St. Cyprian, before his return, being a witch;

St. Austin, being nine years out of the church; they thought it no shame after their return, because that they had returned. Shall it then be shame for you to convert and consent with the church of Christ? No, no.

What is it then that doth hinder you? Glory of the world? Nay, as for the vanity of the world, I for my part judge not in you, being a man of learning and knowing your estate.

And as for the loss of your estimation, it is ten to one that where you were archbishop of Canterbury, and metropolitan of all England, it is ten to one (I say) that you shall be as well still, yea, and rather better.

And as for the winning of good men, there is no doubt but all that are here present, and the whole congregation of Christ's church also, will more rejoice at your return, than they were sorry for your fall. And as for the other, you need not to doubt, but they will all come after; and to say the truth, if you should lose them for ever it were no force, you should have no less thereby at all. I do not here intimate them which should confirm your estimation. For as St. Paul, after his conversion, was received into the church of Christ, with wonderful joy to the whole congregation, even so shall you be. The fame of your return shall be spread abroad throughout all Christendom, where your face was never known.

But you will say perhaps, your conscience will not suffer you. My lord, there is a good conscience, and there is a bad conscience. The good conscience have not they, as St. Paul declareth to Timothy, concerning Hymeneus and Alexander. The evil and bad conscience is, saith St. Cyprian, well to be known by his mark. What mark? This conscience is marked with the print of heresy. This conscience is a wicked, filthy, and a branded conscience, which I trust is not in you. I have conceived a better hope of you than so, or else I would never go about to persuade or exhort you. But what conscience should stay you to return to the catholic faith and universal church of Christ? What conscience doth separate you to that devilish and several church? To a liberty which never had ground in the holy scriptures? If you judge your liberty to be good, then judge you all Christendom to do evil besides you.

O what a presumptuous persuasion is this, upon this utterly to forsake the church of Christ? Under what colour or pretence do you this? For the abuses? As though in your church were no abuses: yes, that there were. And if you forsake the universal church for the abuses, why do you not then forsake your particular church, and so be flitting from one to another? That is not the next way, to slip from the church for the abuses; for if you had seen abuses, you should rather have endeavoured for a reformation than for a defection. He is a good surgeon, who for a little pain in the toe will cut off the whole leg. He helpeth well the tooth-ach, which cutteth away the head by the shoulders. It is mere folly to amend abuses by abuses. You are like Diogenes; for Diogenes on a time envying the cleanliness of Plato, said on this wise, Behold, I tread upon the pride of Plato. Plato answered, But with another sort of pride. So that Diogenes seemed more faulty of the two.

But when we have said all that we can, peradventure you will say, I will not return. And to that I say, I will not answer. Nevertheless, hear what Christ saith to such obstinate and stiff-necked people in the parable of the supper. When he had sent out his men to call them in that were appointed, and they would not come, he bade his servants go into the highways and streets, to compel men to come in. If then the church will not lose any member that may be compelled to come in, you must think it good to take the compulsion, lest you lose your part of the supper which the Lord hath prepared for you, and this compulsion standeth well with charity.

But it may be perhaps, that some that animated you to stick to your tackle, and not to give over, bearing you in hand that your opinion is good; and that you shall die in a good quarrel, and God shall accept your oblation. But hear what Christ saith of a meaner gift; If thou come to the altar to offer thy oblation, and knowest, that thy brother hath somewhat to say against thee, leave there thy gift, and go and be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer up thy gift, or else thy brother will make thy offering unfavoury before God. This he said unto all the world, to the end they should know how their offerings should be received, if they were not according.

Remember you therefore before you offer up your offering, whether your gift be qualified or no. Remember the church of Rome, and also of England, where not only one brother, but a number have matter against you, so just that they will make your burnt-offering stink before God, except you be reconciled. If you must needs appoint upon a sacrifice, make yet a mean first to them that have to lay against you. I say no more than the church hath allowed me to say. For the sacrifice that is offered without the church is not profitable. The premises therefore considered, for God's sake I say, "Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do thy first works, or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place, except thou repent." Cast not yourself away, spare your body, spare your soul, spare them also whom you have seduced, spare the shedding of Christ's blood for you in vain. Harden not your heart, acknowledge the truth, yield to the prescript word of God, to the catholic church of Rome, to the received verity of all Christendom. Wed not yourself to your own self-will. Stand not too much in your own conceit. Think not yourself wiser than all Christendom is besides you. Leave off this unjust cavil. How? Leave what? Leave reason, leave wonder, and believe as the catholic church doth believe and teach you. Persuade with yourself, that without the church there is no salvation. And thus much have I said of charity. If this poor simple exhortation of mine may sink into your head, and take effect with you, then have I said as I would have said; otherwise not as I would, but as I could for this present.

And thus bishop Brooks finishing his oration, sat down. After whom, Dr. Martin taking the matter in hand, began thus.

The Oration of Dr. MARTIN.

ALTHOUGH there are two governments, the one spiritual, and the other temporal, the one having the keys, and the other the sword, yet in all ages we read, that for the honour and glory of God both these powers have been adjoined together. For if we read the Old Testament, we shall find that so did Josias and Ezekias. So did the king of the Ninevites compel a general fast through all the whole city. So did Darius in breaking the great idol Bell, and delivering godly Daniel out of the den of lions. So did Nebuchadonofor make and institute laws against the blasphemers of God. But to let pass these examples, with a great number more, and to come to Christ's time, it is not unknown what great pains they took to set forth God's honour: and although the rule and government of the church did only appertain to the spirituality, yet for the suppression of heresies and schisms, kings were admitted as aiders thereunto. First, Constantine the Great called a council at Nice for the suppression of the Arian sect, where the same time was raised a great contention among them. And after long disputation had, when the fathers could not agree upon the putting down the Arians, they referred their judgment to Constantine. God forbid, said Constantine: you ought to rule me, and not I you. And as Constantine did, so did Theodosius against the Nestorians, so did Marcianus against Manicheus. Jovinian made a law, that no man should marry with a nun, that had wedded herself to the church.

So had king Henry the Eighth the title of Defender of the Faith, because he wrote against Luther and his accomplices. So these nine hundred years the king of Spain

Spain had the title of Catholic, for the expulsion of the Arians; and, to say the truth, the king and queen's majesties do nothing degenerate from their ancestors, taking upon them to restore again the title to be Defender of the Faith, to the right heir hereof, the pope's holiness.

Therefore these two princes, perceiving this noble realm, how it hath been brought from the unity of the true and catholic church, which you and your confederates do and have renounced; perceiving also that you do persist in your detestable errors, and will by no means be revoked from the same, have made their humble request and petition to the pope's holiness, Paul the Fourth, as supreme head of the church of Christ, declaring to him, that whereas you were archbishop of Canterbury, and metropolitan of England, and at your consecration took two solemn oaths for your due obedience to be given to the see of Rome, to become a true preacher or pastor of his flock, yet contrary to your oath and allegiance, for unity have sowed discord; for chastity, marriage and adultery; for obedience, contention; and for faith, you have been the author of all mischief. The pope's holiness, considering their request and petition, hath granted them, that according to the censure of this realm process should be made against you.

And whereas in this late time you both excluded charity and justice, yet hath his holiness decreed, that you shall have both charity and justice shewed unto you. He willeth you should have the laws in most ample manner to answer in your behalf, and that you shall here come before my lord of Gloucester, as high commissioner from his holiness, to the examination of such articles as shall be proposed against you, and that we should require the examination of you in the king and queen's majesties' behalf. The king and queen as touching themselves, because by the law they cannot appear personally, [quia sunt illustris persone] have appointed as their attornies, Dr. Story, and me. Wherefore here I offer to your good lordship our proxy, sealed with the broad seal of England, and offer myself to be proctor in the king's majesty's behalf. I exhibit here also certain articles, containing the manifest adultery and perjury: also books of heresy made partly by him, and partly set forth by his authority. And here I produce him as party principal to answer to your good lordship.

Thus when Dr. Martin had ended his oration, the archbishop began as follows.

Cranmer. Shall I then make my answer?

Martin. As you think good, no man shall hinder you.

And here the archbishop kneeling down on both knees towards the west, said the Lord's prayer. Then rising up, he recited the articles of the creed. Which done, he entered his protestation in form as follows.

The Faith and Profession of Dr. CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury, before the Commissioners.

THIS I do profess as touching my faith, and make my protestation, which I desire you to note. I will never consent that the bishop of Rome shall have any jurisdiction within this realm.

Story. Take a note thereof.

Martin. Mark, Mr. Cranmer, how you answer for yourself. You refuse and deny him, by whose laws you do remain in life, being otherwise attainted of high-treason, and but a dead man by the laws of the realm.

Cranmer. I protest before God I was no traitor, but indeed I confessed more at my arraignment than was true.

Martin. That is not to be reasoned at this present. You know you were condemned for a traitor, and a cause determined is taken for a truth. But proceed to your matter.

Cranmer. I will never consent to the bishop of Rome, for then I should give myself to the devil; for I have made an oath to the king, and I must obey the king by God's laws. By the scripture the king is chief, and no foreign person in his own realm above him. There is no subject but to a king. I am a subject, I owe my fidelity to the crown. The pope is contrary to the crown. I cannot obey both; for no man can serve two masters at once, as you in the beginning of your oration declared by the sword and keys, attributing the keys to the pope, and the sword to the king. But I say the king hath both. Therefore he that is subject to Rome, and the laws of Rome, he is perjured; for the pope's and the judge's laws are contrary.

A priest indebted, by the laws of the realm shall be sued before a temporal judge; by the pope's laws contrary.

The pope doth the king injury in that he hath his power from the pope. The king is head of his own realm: but the pope claimeth all bishops, priests, curates, &c. So the pope in every realm hath a realm.

Again, by the laws of Rome the benefice must be given by the bishop, by the laws of the realm the patron giveth the benefice. Herein the laws be as contrary as fire and water.

No man can by the laws of Rome proceed in a pre-munire, but so is the law of the realm, and the king standeth accursed in maintaining his own lands. Therefore in consideration that the king and the queen take their power of him, as though God should give it to them, there is no true subject, unless he be abrogate, seeing the crown is held of him being out of the realm.

The bishop of Rome is contrary to God, and injurious to his laws; for God commanded all men to be diligent in the knowledge of his law; and therefore hath appointed one holy day in the week at the least, for the people to come to the church and hear the word of God expounded unto them, and that they might the better understand it, to hear it in their mother tongue which they know. The pope doth contrary; for he willeth the service to be had in the Latin tongue, which they do not understand. God would have it to be perceived; the pope will not. When the priest giveth thanks, God would that the people should do so too, and God will have them to confess altogether; the pope will not.

Now as concerning the sacrament, I have taught no false doctrine of the sacrament of the altar: for if it can be proved by any doctor, above a thousand years after Christ, that Christ's body is there really, I will give over. My book was made seven years ago, and no man hath brought any authors against it. I believe that whoso eateth and drinketh that sacrament, Christ is within them, whole Christ, his nativity, passion, resurrection, and ascension; but not that corporally that sitteth in heaven.

Now Christ commanded all to drink of the cup: the pope taketh it away from the laymen: and yet one saith that if Christ had died for the devil, that he should drink thereof. Christ biddeth us to obey the king, but the bishop of Rome biddeth us to obey him; therefore unless he be Antichrist, I cannot tell what to make of him. Wherefore if I should obey him, I cannot obey Christ.

He is like the devil in his doings; for the devil said to Christ, If thou wilt fall down and worship me, I will give thee all the kingdoms of the world. Thus he took upon him to give that which was not his own. Even so the bishop of Rome giveth princes their crowns, being none of his own; for where princes either by election, or by succession, or by inheritance obtain their crown, he saith that they should have it of him.

Christ saith, that Antichrist shall be. And who shall he be? Forsooth, he that advanceth himself above all other creatures. Now if there be none already that hath advanced himself after such sort beside the pope, then in the mean time let him be Antichrist.

Story. Pleaseth it you to make an end?

Cranmer. For he will be the vicar of Christ, he will dispense dispense with the Old and New Testament also, yea and with apostasy.

Now I have declared why I cannot with my conscience obey the pope. I speak not this for hatred I bear to him that now supplieth the room, for I know him not. I pray God give him grace not to follow his ancestors. Neither say I this for my defence, but to declare my conscience for the zeal that I bear to God's word trodden under foot by the bishop of Rome. I cast fear apart, for Christ said to his apostles, that in the latter days they should suffer much sorrow, and be put to death for his name's sake: fear them not, (saith he), but fear him who, when he hath killed the body, hath power to cast the soul into fire everlasting. Also Christ saith, that he that will live shall die, and he that loseth his life for my name's sake, shall find it again. Moreover he said, Confess me before men, and be not afraid; for if you do so, I will stand with you; but if you shrink from me, I will shrink from you. This is a comfortable and terrible saying, this maketh me set all fear apart. I say therefore the bishop of Rome treadeth under foot God's laws and the king's.

The pope would give bishoprics, so would the king. But at last the king got the upper hand, and so are all bishops perjured, first to the pope, and then to the king.

The crown hath nothing to do with the clergy. For if a clerk come before a judge, the judge shall make process against him, but not to execute any laws. For if the judge should put him to execution, then is the king accursed in maintaining his own laws. And therefore say I, that he is neither true to God, nor to the king, that first received the pope. But I shall heartily pray for such counsellors as may inform the king and queen of the truth; for if they be well informed, they will do well.

Martin. As you understand, then if they maintain the supremacy of Rome, they cannot maintain England too.

Cranmer. I require you to declare to the king and queen what I have said, and how their oaths do stand with the realm and the pope. St. Gregory saith, he that taketh upon him to be head of the universal church, is worse than the Antichrist. If any man can shew me, that it is not against God's word to hold his stirrup when he taketh his horse, and kifs his feet (as kings do), then will I kifs his feet also.

And you, for your part, my lord, are perjured; for now you sit judge for the pope, and yet you did receive your bishopric of the king. You have taken an oath to be adversary to the realm; for the pope's laws are contrary to the laws of the realm.

Gloucester. You were the cause that I did forsake the pope, and did swear that he ought not to be supreme head, and gave to king Henry the Eighth, that he ought to be; and this you made me do.

Cranmer. To this I answer: You report me ill, and say not the truth, and I will prove it here before you all. The truth is, that my predecessor, archbishop Warham, gave the supremacy to king Henry the Eighth, and said, that he ought to have it before the bishop of Rome, and that God's word would agree therewith. And upon the same was there sent to both the universities, Oxford and Cambridge, to know what the word of God would do touching the supremacy, and it was reasoned upon, and argued at length. So at the last both the universities agreed, and set to their seals, and sent it to king Henry the Eighth to the court, that he ought to be supreme head, and not the pope. Whereupon you were at that time doctor of divinity, and your consent was thereunto, as by your hand doth appear. Therefore you mis-report me, that I was the cause of your falling away from the pope, but it was yourself. All this was in archbishop Warham's time, and while he was alive, so that it was three quarters of a year ere ever I had the archbishopric of Canterbury in my hands, and before I might do any thing. So that here you have reported of me that which you cannot prove, which is ill done.—All this while his cap was on his head.

No. 40.

Gloucester. We come to examine you, and you, methinks, examine us.

Dr. STORY's Oration.

PLEASETH it your good lordship, because it hath pleased the king and queen's majesties to appoint my companion and me to hear the examination of this man before your good lordship, to give me somewhat to talk in that behalf. Although I know that in talk with heretics there cometh hurt to all men; for it wearieth the stedfast, troubleth the doubtful, and taketh in snare the weak and simple: yet because he saith, he is not bound to answer your lordship sitting for the pope's holiness, because of a premunire, and the word of God as he termeth it; I think good somewhat to say, that all may see how he runneth out of his race of reason into the rage of common talk, such as here I trust hath done much good. And as the king and queen's majesties will be glad to hear of your most charitable dealing with him; so will they be weary to hear the blundering of this stubborn heretic. And where he alledgeth divinity, mingling right and wrong together, he should not have been heard. For shall it be sufficient for him to alledge, the judge is not competent? Do we not see that in the common law it is not lawful for a man in Westminster-hall to refuse his judge? and shall we dispute against one that denies principals? Although there be here a great company of learned men, that know it unmeet so to do, ye have, I hear, a plain canon, wherein he declareth himself convicted, ipso facto. The canon [as we have translated it into English] is this; "Let it be to their own destruction whosoever acts contrary to the apostolic decrees, let them have no place among the priests, but be put out from the holy ministry, neither be capable of holding any cure, seeing they are condemned by the holy apostolic church for their disobedience and presumption; but let them be cast out by the greater excommunication, to whom the discipline of the holy church being committed, not only ought to obey themselves, but also teach others to do so, yet will resist her divine and pontifical services, and so disobey the apostolical precepts."

He hath alledged many matters against the supremacy, but maliciously. You say the king in his realm is supreme head of the church. Well, sir, you will grant me that there was a perfect catholic church before any king was christened. Then if it were a perfect church, it must needs have a head, which must needs be before any king was member thereof; for you know Constantinus the emperor was the first christened king that ever was. And although you are (as St. Paul saith) to obey your rulers, and kings have the rule of the people, yet doth it not follow that they have the cure of souls: for if you argue from the more powerful, the head may do that which the minister cannot do; but the priest may consecrate, and the king cannot; therefore the king is not head.

It was licensed by Christ to every man to bring into the sheepfold, and to augment the flock, but not to rule, for that was only given to Peter.

And where the apostles call upon men to obey their princes, to pay tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom; they perceiving that men were bent to a kind of liberty and disobedience, were enforced to exhort them to obedience and payment of their tribute, which exhortation extendeth only to temporal matters.

And again, where you say the bishop of Rome maketh laws contrary to the laws of the realm; that is not true: for this is a maxim in the law, That which is true in a part, cannot be false in the whole.

Now as touching that monstrous talk of your conscience, that is no conscience that you profess; it is but private judgment, choice, and opinion. And as yet for all your glorious babble, you have not proved by God's laws that you ought not to answer to the pope's holiness.

The canons which be received of all Christendom compel you to answer, therefore you are bound so to do. And although this realm of late time, through such

such schismatics as you were, hath exiled and banished the canons, yet that cannot make for you; for you know yourself, that equal things produce equal things, nor can a part oblige the whole. Wherefore this island, being indeed but a member of the whole, could not determine against the whole. That notwithstanding the same laws, being put away by parliament, are now received again by a parliament, and have as full authority now as they had then, and they will now that you answer to the pope's holiness; therefore by the laws of this realm you are bound to answer him. Wherefore, my lord, all that this Thomas Cranmer (I cannot otherwise term him, considering his disobedience) hath brought for his defence, shall nothing prevail with you, nor take any effect. Require him therefore to answer directly to your good lordship; command him to set aside his trifles, and to be obedient to the laws and ordinances of this realm. Take witness here of his stubborn contempt against the king and queen's majesties, and compel him to answer directly to such articles as we shall here lay against him, and on refusal your lordship is to excommunicate him.

As soon as Dr. Story had thus ended his tale, Dr. Martin began his speech to the archbishop; which discourse I thought proper here to mention, although the report of the same be such, as the author thereof seemeth very partial in his writings; for as he expresseth the speech of Dr. Martin in full, and to the uttermost of his diligence, leaving out nothing in that part that either was or could be said more; so again on the other part, how raw and weak he leaveth the matter, it is easy to perceive, who neither comprehendeth all that Dr. Cranmer again answered for his defence, nor yet in those short speeches which he expresses, seemeth to discharge the part of a sincere and faithful reporter. Notwithstanding, such as it is thought good to let the reader understand, who in perusing the same may use therein his own judgment and consideration.

Conversation between Dr. MARTIN and Archbishop CRANMER.

MARTIN. Mr. Cranmer, you have told here a long glorious tale, pretending some matter of conscience in appearance, but in verity you have no conscience at all. You say that you have sworn once to king Henry the Eighth, against the pope's jurisdiction, and therefore you may never forswear the same; and so you make a great matter of conscience in the breach of the said oath. Here will I ask you a question or two. What if you made an oath to an harlot, to live with her in continual adultery, ought you to keep it?

Cranmer. I think not.

Martin. What if you did swear never to lend a poor man one penny, ought you to keep it?

Cranmer. I think not.

Martin. Herod did swear whatsoever his harlot asked of him he would give her, and he gave her John Baptist's head; did he well in keeping his oath?

Cranmer. I think not.

Martin. Jephtha, one of the judges of Israel, did swear unto God, that if he would give him the victory over his enemies, he would offer unto God the first soul that came forth of his house; it happened that his own daughter came first, and he slew her to save his oath. Did he well?

Cranmer. I think not.

Martin. So saith St. Ambrose, De officiis, "It is a miserable necessity which is paid with parricide." Then Mr. Cranmer, you can no less confess by the premises, but that you ought not to have conscience of every oath, but if it be just, lawful, and advisedly taken.

Cranmer. So was that oath.

Martin. That is not so, for first it was unjust, for it tended to the taking away of another man's right. It was not lawful, for the laws of God and the church were against it. Besides, it was not voluntary; for every man and woman were compelled to take it.

Cranmer. It pleaseth you to say so.

Martin. Let all the world be judge. But, sir, you that pretend to have such a conscience to break an oath, I pray you, did you never swear and break the same?

Cranmer. I remember not.

Martin. I will help your memory. Did you never swear obedience to the see of Rome?

Cranmer. Indeed I did once swear unto the same.

Martin. Yea, that you did twice, as appeareth by records and writings here ready to be shewed.

Cranmer. But I remember I saved all by protestation that I made by the counsel of the best learned men I could get at that time.

Martin. Hearken good people to what this man saith. He made a protestation one day, to keep never a whit of that which he would swear the next day; was this the part of a christian man? If a christian man would bargain with a Turk, and before he maketh his bargain solemnly, before witness readeth in his paper that he holdeth secretly in his hand, or peradventure protesteth before one or two, that he mindeth not to perform whatsoever he shall promise to the Turk; I say, if a christian man should serve a Turk in this manner, that the christian man were worse than the Turk. What would you then say to this man, that made a solemn oath and promise unto God and his church, and made a protestation before quite contrary.

Cranmer. That which I did, I did by the best learned men's advice I could get at that time.

Martin. I protest before all the learned men here, that there is no learning will save your perjury herein; for there are two rules of the civil law clean contrary against you, and so brought forth his rules, which being done he proceeded further. But will you have the truth of the matter? King Henry the Eighth even then meant the lamentable change which after you saw come to pass, and to further his pitiful proceedings from the divorcement of his most lawful wife, to the detestable department from the blessed unity of Christ's church, this man made the aforesaid protestation; and on the other side, he refused not to make two solemn oaths quite contrary, and why? for otherwise by the laws and canons of this realm, he could not aspire to the archbishopric of Canterbury.

Cranmer. I protest before you all, there was never a man came more unwillingly to a bishopric, than I did to that. Infomuch that when king Henry sent for me in post, that I should come over, I prolonged my journey by seven weeks at the least, thinking that he would be forgetful of me in the mean time.

Martin. You declare well by the way that the king took you to be a man of good conscience, who could not find within all his realm any man that would set forth his strange attempts, but was enforced to send for you in post to come out of Germany. What may we conjecture hereby, but that there was a compact between you, being then queen Anne's chaplain, and the king: Give me the archbishopric of Canterbury, and I will give you licence to live in adultery.

Cranmer. You say not true.

Martin. Let your protestation, joined with the rest of your talk, give judgment. [Hinc prima mali labe.] Of that your execrable perjury, and his coloured and too shamefully suffered adultery, came hereby and all mischief to this realm.

And thus have I spoken as touching the conscience you make for breaking your heretical oath made to the king. But to break your former oath made at two sundry times both to God and his church, you have no conscience at all. And now to answer another part of your oration, wherein you bring in God's word, that you have it on your side and no man else, and that the pope hath devised a new scripture contrary to the scripture of God; you play herein as the pharisees did, which cried always, The word of the Lord, the word of the Lord, when they meant nothing so. This bettereth not your cause, because you have God's word for you; for Basilides and Phontinus the heretics said, that they had God's word to maintain their heresy. So Nestorius, so Macedonius, so Pelagius, and briefly, all the heretics that that ever were, pretended that they had God's word for them; yea, and so the devil being the father of heresies alleged God's word for him, saying, it is written: so said he to Christ, Cast thyself downward, which you applied most falsly against the pope. But if you mark the devil's language well, it agreed with your proceedings most truly. For, cast thyself downward, said he, and so taught you to cast all things downward. Down with the sacrament, down with the mass, down with the altars, down with the arms of Christ, and up with a lion and a dog; down with the abbeyes, down with chauntries, down with hospitals and colleges, down with fasting and prayer, yea, down with all that good and godly is. All your proceedings and preachings tended to no other, but to fulfil the devil's request, cast thyself downward. And therefore tell not us that you have God's word. For God hath given us by his word a mark to know that your teaching proceeded not of God, but of the devil, and that your doctrine came not of Christ, but of Antichrist. For Christ foretold, there should come against his church, ravening wolves, and false apostles. But how should we know them? Christ teacheth us, saying, By their fruits ye shall know them. Why, what are their fruits? St. Paul declareth, After the flesh they walk in concupiscence and uncleanness, they contemn powers. Again, in the latter days there shall be perilous times. Then shall there be men loving themselves, covetous, proud, disobedient to parents, treason-workers. Whether these be not the fruits of your gospel, I refer me to this worshipful audience; whether the said gospel began not with perjury, proceeded with adultery, was maintained with heresy, and ended in conspiracy.

Now, sir, two points more I marked in your raging discourse that you made here: the one against the holy sacrament; the other against the pope's jurisdiction, and the authority of the see apostolic.

Touching the first, you say you have God's word with you, yea, and all the doctors. I would here ask you one question, whether God's word be contrary to itself, and whether the doctors teach doctrine contrary to themselves, or no? For you, Mr. Cranmer, have taught in this high sacrament of the altar three contrary doctrines, and yet you pretended in every one the word of the Lord.

Cranmer. Nay, I taught but two contrary doctrines in the same.

Martin. What doctrine taught you when you condemned Lambert, the sacramentary, in the king's presence in Whitehall.

Cranmer. I maintained then the papists doctrine.

Martin. That is to say, the catholic and universal doctrine of Christ's church. And how when king Henry died? Did you not translate Justus Jonas's book?

Cranmer. I did so.

Martin. Then there you defended another doctrine touching the sacrament, by the same token, that you sent to Lynn, your printer, that whereas in the first print there was an affirmative, that is to say, Christ's body really in the sacrament, you sent then to your printer to put in a [not], whereby it came miraculously to pass, that Christ's body was clean conveyed out of the sacrament.

Cranmer. I remember there were two printers of my said book, but where the same [not] was put in, I cannot tell.

Martin. Then from a Lutheran you became a Zwinglian, which is the vilest heresy of all in the high mystery of the sacrament, and for the same heresy you will help to burn Lambert the sacramentary, which you now call the catholic faith, and God's word.

Cranmer. I grant that then I believed otherwise than I do now, and so I did until my lord of London, Dr. Ridley, did confer with me, and by sundry persuasions and authorities of doctors drew me quite from my opinion.

Martin. Now, sir, as touching the last part of your oration, you denied that the pope's holiness was supreme head of the church of Christ.

Cranmer. I did so.

Martin. Who say you then is supreme head?

Cranmer. Christ.

Martin. But whom hath Christ left here on earth his vicar and head of his church?

Cranmer. Nobody.

Martin. Ah, why told you not king Henry this when you made him supreme head? and now nobody is. This is treason against his own person, as you then made him.

Cranmer. I mean not but every king in his own realm and dominion is supreme head, and so was he supreme head of the church of Christ in England.

Martin. Is this always true? and was it ever so in Christ's church?

Cranmer. It was so.

Martin. Then what say you by Nero? He was the mightiest prince of the earth after Christ was ascended: Was he head of Christ's church?

Cranmer. Nero was Peter's head.

Martin. I ask whether Nero was head of the church or no? If he were not, it is false that you said before, that all princes are, and ever were heads of the church within their realms.

Cranmer. Nay, it is true, for Nero was head of the church: that is, in worldly respect of the temporal bodies of men, of whom the church consisteth; for so he beheaded Peter and the apostles. And the Turk too is head of the church in Turkey.

Martin. Then he that beheaded the heads of the church, and crucified the apostles, was head of Christ's church; and he that was never member of the church, is head of the church, by your new found understanding of God's word.

It is not to be supposed to the contrary, but much other matter passed in this communication between them, especially on the archbishop's behalf. Whose answer I do not think to be so slender, nor altogether in the same form of words framed, if the truth as it was, might be known: but so it pleased the notary thereof, being too much partially addicted to his mother see of Rome in favour of his faction, to diminish and drive down the other side, either in not shewing all, or in reporting the thing otherwise than it was; as the common guise is of most writers, to what side their affection most weigheth, their oration commonly inclineth. But let us proceed further in the story of this matter.

It followed then (said this reporter) when the archbishop thus had answered, and the standers-by began to murmur against him, the judges not content with his answers, willed him to answer directly to the interrogatories; which interrogatories articulated against him in form of law, were these following.

Interrogatories objected to the Archbishop, with his Answers annexed to the same.

1. INTERROG. First was objected, That he the aforesaid Thomas Cranmer, being yet free, and before he entered into holy orders, married one Joan, surnamed Black, or Brown, dwelling at the sign of the Dolphin in Cambridge.

Answer. Whereunto he answered, that whether she was called Black, or Brown, he knew not, but that he married there one Joan, that he granted.

2. Interrog. That after the death of the aforesaid wife, he entered into holy orders, and after that was made archbishop by the pope.

Answer. He received (he said) a certain bull of the pope, which he delivered unto the king, and was made archbishop by him.

3. Interrog. Item, That he being in holy orders, married another woman as his second wife, named Anne, and so was twice married.

Answer. To this he granted.

4. Interrog. Item, In the time of king Henry the Eighth,

Eighth; he kept the said wife secretly, and had children by her.

Answer. Hereunto he also granted, affirming that it was better for him to have his own, than to do like other priests, holding and keeping other men's wives.

5. Interrog. Item, In the time of king Edward, he brought out the said wife openly, affirming and professing publicly the same to be his wife.

Answer. He denied not but he so did, and lawfully might do the same, forasmuch as the laws of this realm did so permit him.

6. Interrog. Item, That he shamed not openly to glory himself to have had his wife in secret many years.

Answer. And though he so did (he said), there was no cause why he should be ashamed thereof.

7. Interrog. Item, That the said Thomas Cranmer falling afterward into the deep bottom of errors, did fly and refuse the authority of the church, did hold and follow the heresy concerning the sacrament of the altar, and also did compile, and caused to be set abroad divers books.

Answer. Whereunto when the names of the books were recited to him, he denied not such books which he was the author of. As touching the treatise of Peter Martyr upon the sacrament, he denied that he ever saw it before it was abroad, yet he did approve and well like the same. As for the catechism, the book of articles, with the other book against Winchester, he granted the same to be his doings.

8. Interrog. Item, That he compelled many against their wills to subscribe to the same articles.

Answer. He exhorted (he said) such as were willing to subscribe; but against their wills he compelled none.

9. Interrog. Item, Forasmuch as he ceased not to perpetrate enormous and inordinate crimes, he was therefore cast into the Tower, and from thence was brought to Oxford, at what time it was commonly thought that the parliament should there be held.

Answer. To this he said, that he knew no such enormous and inordinate crimes that ever he committed.

10. Interrog. Item, That in the said city of Oxford he did openly maintain his heresy, and there was convicted for the same.

Answer. He defended (he said) there the cause of the sacrament; but that he was convicted of the same, that he denied.

11. Interrog. Item, When he persevered still in the same, he was by the public censure of the university pronounced an heretic, and his book heretical.

Answer. That he was so denounced he denied not, but that he was an heretic, or his books heretical, that he denied.

12. Interrog. Item, That he was and is notoriously infamed with the note of schism, as one who not only receded himself from the catholic church and see of Rome, but also moved the king and subjects of this realm to the same.

Answer. As touching the receding, that he well granted; but that receding or departing (said he) was only from the see of Rome, and had in it no manner of any schism.

13. Interrog. Item, That he had been twice sworn to the pope; and with that Dr. Martin brought out the instrument of the public notary, wherein was contained his protestation made when he should be consecrated, asking if he had any thing else protested.

Answer. Whereunto he answered, that he did nothing but by the laws of the realm.

14. Interrog. Item, That he, the said archbishop of Canterbury, did not only offend in the premises, but also in taking upon him the authority of the see of Rome, in that without leave or licence from the said see, he consecrated bishops and priests.

Answer. He granted that he did execute such things as were wont to be referred to the pope, at whatever time it was permitted him by the public laws and determination of the realm.

15. Interrog. Item, That when the whole realm had subscribed to the authority of the pope, he only persisted in his error.

Answer. That he did not admit the pope's authority, he confessed to be true. But that he erred in the same, that he denied.

16. Interrog. Item, That all and singular the premises be true.

Answer. That likewise he granted, excepting those things whereunto he had objected.

After he had thus answered to the objections aforesaid, and the public notary had entered the same, the judges and commissioners, as having now accomplished that for which they came, were about to arise and depart. But the bishop of Gloucester thinking it not proper so to dismiss the people, being somewhat stirred with the words of the archbishop, began his oration in the hearing of the people, thus to declaim.

The Oration of Bishop Brooks, in closing up his Examinations against Dr. CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury.

MR. Cranmer, (I cannot otherwise term you, considering your obstinacy) I am right sorry, I am right heartily sorry to hear such words escape your mouth so unadvisedly. I had conceived a right good hope of your amendment. I supposed that this obstinacy of your's came not of a vain-glory, but rather of a corrupt conscience, which was the occasion that I hoped so well of your return. But now I perceive by your foolish babble that it is far otherwise. You are so puffed up with vain-glory, there is such a notorious mark of heresy crept into your conscience, that I am clean void of hope, and my hope is turned into perdition. Who can save what will be lost? God would have you to be saved, and you refuse it. Thy perdition is only upon thyself, O Israel; only in me is thy salvation, saith the Lord by the prophet. You have uttered such erroneous talk, with such open malice against the pope's holiness, with such open lying against the church of Rome, with such open blasphemy against the sacrament of the altar, that no mouth could have expressed more maliciously, more lyingly, more blasphemously.

To reason with you, although I would of myself to satisfy this audience, yet may I not by our commission, neither can I find how I may do it with the scriptures: for the apostle doth command, that such a one should not only not be talked with, but also shunned and avoided; saying, An heretical person after once or twice conferring, shun, knowing that he is perverse and sinneth, being of his own judgment condemned. You have been conferred with not once nor twice, but oftentimes; you have often been lovingly admonished, you have often been secretly disputed with. And the last year in the open school, in open disputations, you have been openly convicted, you have been openly driven out of the school with hisses: your book which you brag you wrote seven years ago, and no man answered it, Marcus Antonius hath sufficiently detected and confuted, and yet you still persist in your wonted heresy.

Wherefore being so often admonished, conferred with, and convicted, if you deny you are the man whom the apostle noteth, hear then what Origen saith, who wrote above 1300 years ago, and interpreteth the saying of the apostle in this wise, in Apologia Pamphili; "All those ought to be esteemed heretics, who professing to believe in Christ, judge otherwise of his truth, than the ecclesiastical tradition." Even now you have professed a kind of christianity and holiness unto us, for at your beginning you fell down upon your knees, and said the Lord's prayer (God knows like an hypocrite), and then standing upon your feet, you rehearsed the articles of your faith, but to what end I pray you, but to cloak that inward heresy rooted in you, that you might blind the poor, simple, and unlearned people's eyes? For what will they say or think, if they do not thus say? Good Lord, what mean these men to say that he is an heretic, heretic, they are deceived, this is a good christian, he believeth as we believe.

But is this sufficient to escape the name of an heretic? To the simple and unlearned it is sufficient; but for you that have professed a greater knowledge and higher doctrine, it is not enough to recite your belief. For unless (as Origen saith) you believe all things that the church hath decreed besides, you are no christian man. In which because you do halt, and will come to no conformity; from henceforth you are to be taken for an heretic, with whom we ought neither to dispute, nor to reason, but whom we ought rather to eschew and avoid.

Nevertheless, although I do not intend to reason with you, but to give you up as an abject and an out-cast from God's favour, yet because you have uttered, to the annoying of the people, such pestilent heresies as may do harm among the rude and unlearned, I think proper to say something herein; not because I hope to have any good at your hands, which I would willingly wish, but that I may establish the simple people which are here present, lest they being seduced by your diabolical doctrine, may perish thereby.

And first (as it behoveth every man to purge himself first before he enter with any other) where you accuse me of an oath made against the bishop of Rome, I confess it, and deny it not; and therefore do say with the rest of this realm, good and catholic men, the saying of the prophet, "We have sinned with our fathers, we have done unjustly and wickedly. The sins of my youth, and my ignorances, O Lord, do not remember." I was then a young man, and as young a scholar here in the university.

I knew not then what an oath did mean, and yet to say the truth, I did it compelled, compelled I say by you, Mr. Cranmer, and here were you the author and cause of my perjury, and are to be blamed, and not I. Now where you say I made two oaths, the one contrary to the other, it is not so, for the oath I made to the pope's holiness appertaineth only to spiritual things; the other oath that I made to the king pertaineth only to temporal things; that is to say, that I do acknowledge all my temporal livings to proceed only from the king, and from none else. But all men may see, as you agree in this, so you agree in the rest of your opinions.

Now, sir, as concerning the supremacy which is only due to the see of Rome, a word or two. Although there be a number of places which do confirm that Christ appointed Peter head of the church, yet this is a most evident place. When Christ demanded of his apostles whom men called him, they answered, some Elias, some a prophet, &c. But Christ replied unto Peter and said, Whom sayest thou, Peter, that I am? Peter answered, Thou art Christ the Son of God: and Christ replied, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church. The doctors interpreting this place, Upon this rock, expound it thus, Not only on the faith of Peter, but upon Peter himself. And why did Christ change his name from Simon to Peter, which in Latin is a Stone, but only to declare that he was the foundation and head of the church?

Again, where Christ demanded of Peter, being amongst the rest of his apostles, three times over, Peter, lovest thou me? he gave him charge over his sheep, Feed my sheep, feed my lambs. Which place Chrysostom interpreting, saith, Feed, that is, be you in my stead, and head of your brethren. To conclude, when they came that required Didrachma of Christ, he commanded Peter to cast his net into the sea, and to take out of the fish's mouth that he caught a piece of money which was a double Didrachma, and give it, says he, for thee and me. Which words do signify, that when he had paid for them two, he had paid for all the rest. For as in the old law were appointed two heads over the people of Israel, Moses and Aaron; Moses as chief, and Aaron next head under him; so in the new law there were two heads of the church, which were Christ and Peter. Christ is head of all, and Peter next under him. St. Austin, in 75 quest. Veteris & Novi

Testamenti, saith, "Our Saviour Christ commanding the tribute to be given for him and for Peter, meant thereby the same to be given for all others, for he appointed him to be head of them." What can be more plain than this? But I will not tarry on this matter.

Now as touching the pope's laws, where you say they are contrary, because the service which should be (as you say) in English, is in Latin; I answer, Whosoever will take the pains to peruse the fourteenth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, shall find, that his meaning is concerning preaching, and by the way only of praying.

Again, where you say, that the pope's holiness doth take away one part of the sacrament from the lay-men, and Christ would have it under both, you can say no more but this, Drink ye all of this. And what followeth, And all drank thereof. Now if a man would be so froward with you, he might say that Christ gave it only to his disciples, in whose places succeeded priests, and not lay-men.

And admit that Christ commanded it to be received under both kinds, yet the church hath authority to change that, as well as others. You read, that Christ calling his apostles together, said unto them. "Go, and preach the gospel to every nation, baptizing them in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." But the apostles being desirous to publish Christ's name every where, did baptize only in Christ's name. Again, Christ before his last supper washed his apostles feet, saying, "If I have washed your feet, being your Lord and Master, also you ought to wash the feet of one another. I have given you example." This was a precept, yet hath the church altered it, that the simple people should not think a re-baptization in it. "So because, saith the apostle, I have received of the Lord the same which I have delivered unto you, that our Lord, the same night in which he was betrayed," &c. Notwithstanding that this was a precept that the sacrament should be administered after supper, the church hath altered it, and commanded it to be received fasting. And where Christ did break the bread, we receive the whole host. Christ administered sitting at the table, we standing at the altar.

It was also commanded in Acts xxv. that christians should abstain from things strangled and blood. But the church perceiving it to be a precept but for a time, hath altered it. Christ commanded to keep holy the sabbath day, and the church hath altered it to Sunday. If then the church may change things that are so expressed in the scriptures, she may also change the form of receiving of lay-men under both kinds, for divers occasions.

First, that in carrying it to the sick, the blood may not be shed, lost, or misused.

And next, that no occasion might be given to heretics to think that there is not so much under one kind as under both.

But why would you have it under both kinds, I pray you else, but only to pervert and contradict the commandment of the church? For when you had it under both kinds, you believed in neither. And we having but one, believe both kinds. Now, sir, as concerning the sacrament of the altar, where you say, you have a number of doctors on your side, and we none of our side, that is to say, to confirm the real presence of Christ in the sacrament of the altar, indeed one to stop your mouth I think it not possible to find. Nevertheless where your request is to have one shewed unto you, and then you will recant, I will shew you two.

St. Austin, upon Psalm xxxiii. He carried himself in his own hands: I find not how this is true in David (saith he) literally, that he was born in his own hands; but in Christ I find it literally, when he gave his body to his disciples at his last supper.

Again, St. Cyprian de Cena Domini, saith, The bread which our Lord gave to his disciples, was not a bare likeness, but the nature being changed, was made flesh by his almighty word. What can be more plain than this? yet to your exposition it is not plain enough.

But give me your figurative, significative, and other such like terms, and I will defend that Christ hath not yet ascended; no nor yet that he was incarnate, &c. Wherefore I can do no other but put you in the number of them, whom Chrysostom spake of in this wise, saying, Hear, O thou christian man, wilt thou do more than Christ could do? Christ confuted the pharisees, yet he could not put them to silence; and art thou stronger than Christ? Wilt thou go about to bring them to silence that will receive no answer? As much as to say, thou canst not. Thus much have I said, not for you, Mr. Cranmer, for my hope that I conceived of you is now gone and past; but somewhat to satisfy the rude and unlearned people, that they perceiving your arrogant lying, and lying arrogancy, may the better eschew your detestable and abominable schism.

And thus the prelate ended his worshipful tale. After whom Dr. Story took the matter, and thus inferred in words, as followeth.

Mr. Cranmer, you have made a goodly process concerning your heretical oath made to the king, but you forget your oath made to the see apostolic. As concerning your oath made to the king, if you made it to him only, it took an end by his death, and so it is released; if you made it to his successors, well, sir, the true successors have the empire, and they will you to dissolve the same, and become a member of Christ's church again, and it standeth well with charity.

To this the archbishop answered again, saith the reporter: but what his answer was, that he suppresseth and returneth to the words of Dr. Story, who imperiously turning his speech again to the archbishop, said as follows:

Hold your peace, sir, and so it shall right well become you, considering that I gave you licence before to say your fancy. Your oath was no oath: for it lacked the three points of an oath, that is to say, judgment, righteousness, and truth.

These, with the like words to the same effect, being uttered by Dr. Story, seeking to break up and make an end of that session, he immediately called for witnesses to be produced, who should be sworn upon the book, to utter and declare the next day whatsoever they knew, or could remember to be inferred against Dr. Cranmer's heresy. The names of the witnesses are these following:

Dr. Marshall, commissary, and dean of Christ-church.

Dr. Smith, under commissary,

Dr. Tresham,	Mr. Curtop,
Dr. Crook,	Mr. Warde,
Mr. London,	Mr. Serles.

After the depositions of which witnesses being taken, Dr. Story admonished the archbishop, permitting him to make his exceptions, if he thought any of the said witnesses were to be refused. The archbishop refused them all, as being men perjured, and not in christian religion. For if to swear, said he, against the pope, were unlawful, they should rather have given their lives, than their oath. But if it were lawful, then they are perjured, to defend him whom they forswore before. Nevertheless, this answer of the archbishop being lightly regarded, as little to the purpose appertaining, he was commanded again to the place from whence he came. Who at his departing out, like as at his first coming in, paid low obedience to Dr. Martin and Dr. Story, the queen's commissioners. Then Dr. Story pointing to the bishop of Gloucester, said, that he ought rather to shew reverence unto him. So the most reverend archbishop departing without any obeisance exhibited to the said bishop of Gloucester, the pope's delegate, all the others rose up, and departed every one to his own. And thus broke up the session for that day, about two o'clock in the afternoon.

And thus much hitherto concerning the summary effect of this action or session, with the orations, discourses, and articles commenced against the archbishop of Canterbury, also with the reasons and answers of the said archbishop to their objections and interrogatories. Touching which his answers, soasmuch as they being recited by report of a papist, (as is aforesaid) seem to be partially handled, it shall therefore not greatly be out of the matter, as ye have heard the orations of bishop Brooks, with the reasons and talk of the other commissioners, amplified and set forth at large on the one side, so now in repeating the words and answers of the other part, to declare and set forth somewhat more amply and effectually, what speech the said archbishop used for himself in the same action, by the faithful relation and testimony of certain others, who were likewise there present, and do thus report the effect of the archbishop's words, answering to the first oration of bishop Brooks in manner as follows.

A more full Answer of Dr. CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury, to the first Oration of Bishop BROOKS.

MY lord, you have very learnedly and eloquently, in your oration, put me in remembrance of many things touching myself, wherein I do not mean to spend the time in answering of them. I acknowledge God's goodness to me in all his gifts, and thank him as heartily for this state wherein I find myself now, as ever I did for the time of my prosperity; and it is not the loss of my promotions that grieveth me. The greatest grief I have at this time is, and one of the greatest that ever I had in all my life, to see the king and queen's majesties, by their proctors, here to become my accusers, and that in their own realm and country, before a foreign power. If I have transgressed the laws of the land, their majesties have sufficient authority and power both from God, and by the ordinance of the realm, to punish me, whereunto I both have, and at all times shall be content to submit myself.

Alas! what hath the pope to do in England; whose jurisdiction is so far different from the jurisdiction of this realm, that it is impossible to be true to the one, and true to the other. The laws also are so diverse, that whosoever sweareth to both, must needs incur perjury to the one. Which, as often as I remember, even for the love that I bear to her grace, I cannot but be heartily sorry to think upon it, how that her highness the day of her coronation, at which time she took a solemn oath to observe all the laws and liberties of this realm of England, at the same time also took an oath to the bishop of Rome, and promised to maintain that see. The state of England being so repugnant to the supremacy of the pope, it was impossible but she must needs be forsworn in the one. Wherein if her grace had been faithfully advertised by her counsel, then surely she would never have done it.

The laws of this realm are, that the king of England is the supreme and sole governor of all his countries and dominions; and that he holdeth his crown and sceptre of himself, by the ancient laws, customs, and descents of the kings of the realm, and of none other. The pope saith, that all the emperors and kings hold their crowns and regalities of him, and that he may depose them when he will; which is high treason for any man to affirm and think, being born within the king's dominions.

The laws of England are, that all bishops and priests offending in cases of felony or treason, are to be judged and tried by the laws and customs of the realm. The pope's laws are, that the secular power cannot judge the spiritual power, and that they are not under their jurisdiction; which robbeth the king of the one part of his people.

The laws also of England are, that whosoever hindereth the execution or proceeding of the laws of England for any other foreign laws ecclesiastical or temporal, incurreth the danger of a premunire. The pope's laws are, that whosoever hindereth the proceedings or executions of his laws, for any other laws, of any other king or country, both the prince himself, his council, all his officers, scribes, clerks, and whosoever give consent or aid to the making or executing of any such laws, stand accursed. An heavy case (if his curse were any thing worth) that the king and queen cannot use their laws, but they and theirs must stand accursed.

These

These things and many more examples he alledged, which (he said) stirred him, that he could not give his consent to the receiving of such an enemy into the realm, so subverting the dignity and ancient liberties of the same.

And as for the matter of heresy and schism, where-with he was charged, he protested, and called God to witness, he knew none that he maintained. But if that were an heresy to deny the pope's authority, and the religion which the see of Rome hath published to the world these latter years, then all the ancient fathers of the primitive church, the apostles, and Christ himself taught heresy; and he desired all then present to bear him witness, that he took the traditions and religion of that usurping prelate to be most erroneous, false, and against the doctrine of the whole scripture; which he had oftentimes well proved by writing, and the author of the same to be very Antichrist, so often preached of by the apostles and prophets, in whom did most evidently concur all signs and tokens whereby he was painted out to the world to be known.

For it was most evident that he had advanced himself above all emperors and kings of the world, whom he affirmeth to hold their estates and empires of him, as of their chief, and to be at his commandment to depose and erect at his good will and pleasure, and that stories make mention of his intolerable and insolent pride and tyranny used over them in such sort, as no king would have used to his christian subjects, nor yet a good master to his servants, setting his feet on the emperor's neck, affirming that to be verified in him, which was spoken only of our Saviour Jesus Christ, in these words, "Thou shalt go upon the lion and the adder, the young lion and the dragon shalt thou tread under thy feet." Others he had to hold his stirrup, others he had displaced and removed from their empires and seats royal: and not content herewithal, more insolent than Lucifer, he hath occupied not only the highest place in this world, above kings and princes, but hath further presumed to sit in the seat of Almighty God, which only he reserved to himself, which is the conscience of man; and to keep the possession thereof, he hath promised forgiveness of sins à la mode quietes.

He hath brought in gods of his own framing, and invented a new religion, full of gain and lucre, quite contrary to the doctrine of the holy scripture, only for the maintaining of his kingdom, displacing Christ from his glory, and holding his people in a miserable servitude of blindness, to the loss of a great number of souls, which God at the latter day shall exact at his hand; boasting many times in his canons and decrees, that he can dispense, "against Peter, against Paul, against the Old and New Testament: and that he, of the fulness of power, may do as much as God." O Lord! who ever heard such blasphemy? if there be any man that can advance himself above him, let him be judged Antichrist.

This enemy of God and of our redemption, is so evidently pointed out in the scriptures by such manifest signs and tokens, which all so clearly appear in him, that except a man will shut up his eyes and heart against the light, he cannot but know him: and therefore, for my part, I will never give my consent to the receiving of him into this church of England. And you, my lord, and the rest that sit here in commission, consider well and examine your own consciences; you have sworn against him, you are learned, and can judge of the truth. I pray God you be not wilfully blind. As for me, I have herein discharged mine own conscience towards the world, and I will write also my mind to her grace, touching this matter.

The copy of the letter sent to the queen, may be found after in the end of his story. While he thus made his answer, ye heard before how Dr. Martin and Dr. Story interrupted him divers times with blasphemous talk, and would fain have had the bishop of Gloucester to put him to silence: who notwithstanding did not, but suffered him to end his tale at full. After this you heard also how they proceeded to examine him of divers articles, whereof the chief was, that at the time of being created archbishop of Canterbury, he was sworn to the pope, and had his institution and induction from him, and then promised to maintain the authority of that see, and therefore was perjured: wherefore he should rather stick to his first oath, and return to his old fold again, than to continue obstinate in an oath forced in time of schism.

To that he answered, saving his protestation, (which term he used before all his answers), That at such time archbishop Warham died, he was ambassador in Germany for the king, who thereupon sent for him home, and having intelligence by some of his friends (who were near about the king), how he intended to bestow the archbishopric upon him, and therefore counselled him in that case to make haste home, he feeling in himself a great inability to such a promotion, and very sorry to leave his study, and especially considering by what means he must have it, which was clean against his conscience, which he could not utter without great peril and danger, devised an excuse to the king of matter of great importance, for which his longer abode there should be most necessary, thinking by that means in his absence, that the king would have bestowed it upon some other, and so remained there by that device, one half year after the king had written for him to come home. But after that no such matter fell out, as he seemed to make suspicion of, the king sent for him again. Who, after his return, understanding still the archbishopric to be reserved for him, made interest by divers of his best friends to shift it off, desiring rather some smaller living, that he might more quietly follow his book.

To be brief, when the king himself spake with him, declaring that his full intention, for his service sake, and for the good opinion he conceived of him, was to bestow that dignity upon him, after long disabling of himself, perceiving he could by no persuasions alter the king's determination, he freely opened his conscience unto him, most humbly craving his grace's pardon, for what he should declare unto his highness. Which obtained, he declared, that if he accepted the office, then he must receive it at the pope's hand, which he neither would nor could do, for that his highness was only the supreme governor of this church of England, as well in causes ecclesiastical as temporal, and that the full right and donation of all manner of bishoprics and benefices, as well as of any other temporal dignities and promotions, appertained to his grace, and not to any other foreign authority, whatsoever it was, and therefore if he might in that vocation serve God, him, and his country, seeing it was his pleasure so to have it, he would accept it, and receive it of his majesty, and of none other stranger, who had no authority within this realm, neither in any such gift, nor in any other thing. Whereat the king, said he, staying a while and pausing, asked me how I was able to prove it. At which time I alledged many texts out of the scriptures, and the fathers also, approving the supreme and highest authority of kings in their realms and dominions, disclosing therewithal the intolerable usurpation of the pope of Rome.

Afterwards it pleased his highness (quoth the archbishop) many and sundry times to talk with me of it, and perceiving that I could not be brought to acknowledge the authority of the bishop of Rome, the king himself called Dr. Oliver, and other civil lawyers, and devised with them how he might bestow it upon me, enforcing me nothing against my conscience. Who thereupon informed him, that I might do it by the way of protestation, and so one to be sent to Rome, who might take the oath, and do every thing in my name. Which when I understood, I said, he should do it super animam suam: and I indeed, bona fide, made my protestation, that I did not acknowledge his authority any further than as it agreed with the express word of God, and that it might be lawful for me at all times to speak against him, and so to impugn his errors, when time and occasion should serve me. And this my protestation I did cause to be inrolled, and there I think it remaineth.

They objected to him also that he was married, which he

he confessed. Whereunto Dr. Martin said, that his children were bondmen to the see of Canterbury. At which saying the archbishop smiled, and asked him, if a priest at his benefice kept a concubine, and had by her bastards, whether they were bondmen to the benefice or no, saying, I trust you will make my children's causes no worse.

After this Dr. Martin demanded of him, who was supreme head of the church of England? Marry, quoth my lord of Canterbury, Christ is head of this member, as he is of the whole body of the universal church. Why, quoth Dr. Martin, you made king Henry the Eighth supreme head of the church. Yea, said the archbishop, of all the people of England, as well ecclesiastical as temporal. And not of the church, said Dr. Martin? No, said he; for Christ is the only head of his church, and of the faith and religion of the same. The king is head and governor of his people, which are the visible church. What, quoth Martin, you never durst tell the king so. Yes, that I durst, quoth he, and did in the publication of his stile, wherein he was named supreme head of the church, there was never other thing meant. A number of other trifling and foolish objections were made, with a repetition whereof I thought not to trouble the reader.

Thus after they had received his answers to all their objections, they cited him (as is aforesaid) to appear at Rome within fourscore days, to make there his personal answers: which he said, if the king and queen would send him, he would be content to do; and so thence was carried to prison again, where he continually remained, notwithstanding that he was commanded to appear at Rome.

Wherein all men that have eyes to see, may easily perceive the crafty practice of these prelates, and the vizored face of their justice, as though the court of Rome would condemn no man before he answered for himself, as all law and equity required. But the very same instant of time, the holiness of that unholy father, contrary to all reason and justice, sent his letter executory unto the king and queen to degrade and deprive him of his dignity: which thing he did not only before the fourscore days were ended, but before there were twenty days spent. Furthermore, whereas the said archbishop was first detained in strait confinement, so that he could not appear (as was notorious both in England, and also in the Romish court), and therefore had a lawful and most just excuse for his absence by all laws, both popish and others; yet in the end of the said fourscore days, was that worthy martyr decreed Contumax, that is, sturdily, frowardly, and wilfully absent, and in pain of the same his absence condemned and put to death.

Dr. THIRLBY and Dr. BONNER come with a new Commission to sit upon the Archbishop, February 14.

THIS letter or sentence definitive of the pope was dated about the first day of January, and was delivered here in England about the middle of February. Upon the receipt of which letters, another session was appointed, for the archbishop to appear the 14th day of February, before certain commissioners directed down by the queen, the chief whereof was the bishop of Ely, Dr. Thirlby. Concerning which Dr. Thirlby by the way here is to be noted, that although he was not the said archbishop's household chaplain, yet he was so familiarly acquainted with him, so dearly beloved, so inwardly accepted and advanced of him (not like a chaplain, but rather like a natural brother) that there was never any thing in the archbishop's house so dear, were it plate, jewels, horse, maps, books, or any thing else, but if Thirlby did ever so little commend it (a subtle kind of begging), the archbishop soon after either gave it to him, or else sent it after him to his house. So greatly was the archbishop enamoured with him, that whosoever would obtain any thing of him, most commonly would make their way before by Dr. Thirlby. Which character of the said Dr. Thirlby I thought here to recite; not so much to upbraid the man with the vice of unthankfulness, as chiefly and only for this, to admonish him of old benefits received, whereby he might the better remember his old benefactor, and so to favour the cause and quarrel of him whom he was so singularly bounden unto.

With the said Dr. Thirlby, bishop of Ely, was assigned in the same commission Dr. Bonner, bishop of London; which two coming to Oxford, upon St. Valentine's day, as the pope's delegates, with a new commission from Rome, by the virtue thereof commanding the archbishop aforesaid to come before them, in choir of Christ's church, before the high altar, where they sitting (according to their manner), in their pontificals, first began, as the fashion is, to read their commission: wherein was contained, how that in the council of Rome all things being indifferently examined, both articles laid to his charge, with the answers made unto them, and witnesses examined on both parts, and council heard as well on the king and queen's behalf, his counselors, as on the behalf of Thomas Cranmer, the papal guilty, so that he wanted nothing appertaining to necessary defence, &c. which foresaid commission, as was in reading, O Lord, said the archbishop, what be these, that I being continually in prison, and never could be suffered to have council or advocate at home, should produce witness and appoint my counsel at Rome? God must needs punish this open and shameless lying. They read on the commission which came from the pope plenitudine potestatis, supplying all manner of defects in law or process committed in dealing with the archbishop, and giving them full authority to proceed to deprivation and degradation of him, and so upon excommunication to deliver him up to the secular power.

When the commission was read thus, they proceeded thereupon to his degradation, first cloathed and disguised him, putting on him a surplice, and then an albe; and that the vestment of a sub-deacon, and every other furniture, as a priest ready to say mass.

When they had apparelled him so far: What, said I think I shall say mass: Yea, said Cosins, one of Bonner's chaplains, my lord, I trust to see you say mass all this. Do you so, quoth he? that shall you never nor will I ever do it.

Then they invested him in all manner of robes of a shop and archbishop, as he was at his installment, save that as every thing then is most rich and costly, so every thing here was of canvas and old rags, with a mitre, a pall of the same suit put upon him in mockery, then the crozier-staff was put in his hand.

This done after the pope's pontifical form and manner, Bonner, who for the space of many years had borne as it seemed, no great good-will towards him, and now rejoiced to see this day wherein he might triumph over him, and take his pleasure at full, began to stretch his eloquence, making his oration to the assembly, in this manner:

This is the man that hath ever despised the pope's holiness, and now is to be judged by him. This is the man that hath pulled down so many churches, and now is come to be judged in a church. This is the man that contemned the blessed sacrament of the altar, and now is come to be condemned before that blessed sacrament hanging over the altar. This is the man that set Lucifer sat in the place of Christ upon an altar to judge others, and now is come before an altar to be judged himself.

Whereunto the archbishop interrupting him, said, in that he belied him, as he did in many other things, for that which he would now seem to charge him with was his own fault, if it was any, and none of his. The thing you mean was in Paul's church, said he, where I came to sit in commission; and there was a scaffold prepared for me and others, by you and your officers, and whether there were any altar under it or not, I did not perceive it, nor once suspected, wherefore you wittingly evil to charge me with it.

But Bonner went on still in his rhetorical repeating and railing against the archbishop, beginning his sentence with, This is the man, this is the man, length every man grew tired of his unmannerly use of him in that time and place; insomuch that the times pulled him by the sleeve to make an

I say and publish, that James by the mercy priest, called Cardinal of the Pit, and of the r lady in the church of Rome, judge and compecially deputed of our most holy lord the he affirmed) caused me to be cited to Rome, pppear fourscore days after the citation served on me, to make answer to certain articles touching the peril of my state and life: and whereas I was kept in prison with most strait ward, so that I could in no wise be suffered to go to Rome, nor to come out of prison (and in so grievous causes concerning state and life, no man is bound to send a proctor); and though I would ever so fain send my proctor, yet by reason of poverty

I am not able (for all that ever I had, wherewith I should bear my proctor's costs and charges, is quite taken from me); nevertheless the most reverend cardinal aforesaid doth sore threaten me, that whether I shall appear or not, he will nevertheless yet proceed in judgment against me; wherein I feel myself so grieved, that nothing can be imagined more mischievous or further from reason.

2. Secondly, The reverend father James Brooks, by the mercy of God, bishop of Gloucester, judge and under-deputy (as he affirmeth) of the most reverend cardinal, caused me to be cited at Oxford, (where I was then kept in prison) to answer to certain articles, concerning the danger of my state and life. And when I being un-learned and ignorant in the laws, desired counsel of the learned in the laws, that thing was most unrighteously denied me, contrary to the equity of all laws both of God and man. Wherein again I feel myself most wrongfully grieved.

3. And when I refused the said bishop of Gloucester to be my judge, for most just causes, which I then declared, he nevertheless went on still, and made process against me, contrary to the rule of the laws of appealing, which say, A judge that is refused ought not to proceed in the cause, but to leave off. And when he had required of me answers to certain articles, I refused to make him any answer: I said I would gladly make answer to the most renowned king and queen's deputies or attornies then present, with this condition notwithstanding, that none should be extrajudicial, and that was permitted me. And with this my protestation made and admitted, I made answer; but my answer was sudden and unprovided for: and therefore I desired to have a copy of mine answers, that I might add to, take away, change, and amend them; and this was also permitted me. Nevertheless, contrary to his promise made unto me, no respect had to my protestation, nor licence given to amend mine answer, the said reverend father bishop of Gloucester (as I hear) commanded mine answers to be enacted contrary to the equity of the law. In which thing again I feel myself much grieved.

4. Furthermore, I could not, for many causes, admit the bishop of Rome's usurped authority in this realm, nor consent to it: for my solemn oath hindering me, which I made in the time of king Henry the Eighth, of most famous memory, according to the laws of England. Secondly, because I knew the authority of the bishop of Rome, which he usurpeth, to be against the crown, customs, and laws of this realm of England, insomuch, that neither the king can be crowned in this realm, without the most grievous crime of perjury, nor may bishops enjoy their bishoprics, nor judgments to be used according to the laws and customs of this realm, except by the bishop of Rome's authority, be accursed both the king and queen, the judges, writers, and executors of the laws and customs, with all that consent to them. Finally, the whole realm shall be accursed.

5. Moreover, that heinous and usurped authority of the bishop of Rome, through reservations of the bishop-rics, provisions, annuities, dispensations, pardons, appellations, bulls, and other merchandize of Rome, was wont exceedingly to spoil and consume the riches and substance of this realm, all which things should follow again by recognizing and receiving of that usurped authority unto the infinite loss of this realm.

6. Finally, it is most evident by that usurped authority, not only the crown of England to be under the yoke, the laws and customs of this realm to be thrown down, and trodden under foot, but also the most holy decrees of councils, together with the precepts both of the gospel and of God.

When in times past the Sun of righteousness being risen in the world, christian religion, by the preaching of the apostles, began to be spread very far abroad, and to flourish, insomuch that their sound went out into all the world; innumerable people, which walked in darkness, saw a great light, God's glory every where published did flourish, the only cark and care of the ministers of the church was purely and sincerely to preach Christ; the people to embrace and follow Christ's doctrine. Then the church of Rome, as it were lady of the world, both was, and also was counted worthily the mother of other churches, forasmuch as then she first begat to Christ, nourished with the food of pure doctrine, did help them with their riches, succoured the oppressed, and was a sanctuary for the miserable, she rejoiced with them that rejoiced, and wept with them that wept. Then by the examples of the bishops of Rome, riches were despised, worldly glory and pomp was trodden under foot, pleasures and riot nothing regarded. Then this frail and uncertain life, being full of miseries, was laughed to scorn, whilst thro' the examples of Romish martyrs, men did every where press forward to the life to come. But afterward, when the ungraciousness of damnable ambition, never-satisfied avarice, and the horrible enormity of vices, had corrupted and taken the see of Rome, there followed every where almost the deformities of all churches, growing out of kind into the manners of the church their mother, leaving their former innocency and purity, and slipping into foul and heinous usages.

For the aforesaid and many other griefs and abuses, (which I intend to prove, and to proffer myself in time convenient to prove hereafter) since reformation of the above-mentioned abuses is not to be looked for of the bishop of Rome, neither can I hope, by reason of his wicked abuses and usurped authority, to have him an equal judge in his own cause: therefore I do challenge and appeal in these writings from the pope, having no good council, and from the above named pretences, commissions, and judges, from their citations, processes, and from all other things that have or shall follow thereupon, and from every one of them, and from all their sentences, censures, pains, and punishments of cursing, suspension, and interdicting, and from all others whatsoever their denouncings and declarations (as they pretend) of schism, of heresy, adultery, deprivation, degrading by them, or by any of them, in any manner or way attempted, done, and set forward to be attempted, to be done and to be set forward hereafter (saving always their honours and reverences) as unequal and unrighteous, most tyrannical, and violent, and from every grief to come, which shall happen to me, as well for myself as for all and every one that cleaveth to me, or will hereafter be on my side, unto a free general council, that shall hereafter lawfully be, and in a sure place, where I, or a proctor deputed by me, may freely and with safety come, and to him or them, to whom a man may by the law, privilege, custom, or otherwise, challenge and appeal.

And I desire the first, the second, and third time, instantly, more instantly, and most instantly, that I may have messengers, if there be any man that will and can give me them. And I make open promise of prosecuting this mine appellation, by the way of disannulling, abuse, inequality, and unrighteousness, or otherwise as I shall be better able: choice and liberty reserved to me, to put to, diminish, change, correct, and interpret my sayings, and to reform all things after a better fashion; saving always to me every other benefit of the law, and to them that either be, or will be on my part.

And touching my doctrine of the sacrament, and other my doctrine, of what kind soever it be, I protest that it was never my mind to write, speak, or understand any thing contrary to the most holy word of God, or else against the holy catholic church of Christ, but purely and simply to imitate and teach those things only, which I had learned of the sacred scripture, and of the holy catholic church of Christ from the beginning, and also according to the exposition of the most learned fathers and martyrs of the church.

And if any thing hath peradventure chanced otherwife than I thought, I may err, but heretic I cannot be, forasmuch as I am ready in all things to follow the judgment of the most sacred word of God, and of the holy catholic church, desiring none other thing, than meekly and gently to be taught, if any where (which God forbid) I have swerved from the truth.

And I protest and openly confess, that in all my doctrine and preaching, both of the sacrament, and of my other doctrine whatsoever it be, not only I mean and judge of those things, as the catholic church, and the most holy fathers of old, with one accord, have made and judged, but also I would gladly use the same words that they used, and not use any other words, but to set my hand to all and singular their speeches, phrases, ways, and forms of speech, which they do use in their treatises upon the sacrament, and to keep still their interpretation. But in this thing I am only accused for an heretic, because I allow not the doctrine lately brought in of the sacrament, and because I consent not to words not accustomed in scripture, and unknown to the ancient fathers, but newly invented and brought in by men, and belonging to the destruction of souls, and overthrowing of pure and old religion. Yea, even, &c.

This appeal being put up to the bishop of Ely, he said to the archbishop, My lord, our commission is to proceed against you, omni appellatione remota, and therefore we cannot admit it.

Why (quoth the archbishop) then you do me the more wrong; for my case is not as every private man's case. The matter is immediately between the pope and me, and none otherwise: and I think no man ought to be a judge in his own cause.

Well, quoth Ely, if it may be admitted, it shall, and so received it of him. And then he began earnestly to persuade the archbishop to consider his state, and to weigh it well, while there was time to do him good, promising to become a suitor to the king and queen for him; and so protested his great love and friendship that had been between them, heartily weeping, so that for a time he could not go on with his tale. After going forward, he earnestly affirmed, that if it had not been the king and queen's commandment, whom he could not deny, else no worldly advantages should have made him to have done it; concluding that to be one of the sorrowfullest things that ever happened unto him. The archbishop gently seeming to comfort him, said, he was very well content withal: and so they proceeded to his degradation: the perfect form whereof, with all the rites and ceremonies thereunto appertaining, taken out of the pope's pontifical, we have already described.

To be short, when they came to take off his pall, (which is a solemn vesture only belonging to an archbishop) then said he, Which of you hath a pall, to take off my pall? which imported as much as they being his inferiors, could not degrade him. Whereunto one of them answered, confessing that as they were but bishops they were inferior to him, and therefore not competent judges; but, as being the pope's delegates, they had authority to take his pall, which accordingly they did; and, so proceeding, took every thing in order from him, as it was put on. Then a barber clipped his hair round about, and the bishop scraped the tops of his fingers where he had been anointed, wherein bishop Bonner behaved himself as roughly and unmannerly as the other bishop was to him soft and gentle. Whilst they were thus doing, All this, quoth the archbishop, needed not; I had myself done with this gear long ago. Last of all they stripped him out of his gown into a jacket, and put upon him a poor yeoman beadle's gown, full bare and nearly worn, and as ill-shaped as one might probably see, and a townsman's cap on his head, and so delivered him to the secular power.

After this pageant of degradation, and all was finished, then spake lord Bonner, saying to him, Now are you no lord any more: and so whenever he spake to the people of him, (as he was continually barking against him) he ever used this term, This gentleman here, &c.

And thus, with great compassion and pity of every man, man, in this evil favoured gown was he carried to prison. Whom there followed a gentleman of Gloucestershire, with the archbishop's own gown, who standing by, and being thought to be toward one of the bishops, had it delivered unto him; who by the way talking with him, said, the bishop of Ely protested his friendship with tears. Yet (said he) he might have used a great deal more friendship towards me, and never have been worse thought on, for I have well deserved it: and going up into the prison with him, asked him if he would drink. He answered him, saying, if he had a piece of salt fish, that he had a better will to eat: for he had been that day somewhat troubled with this matter, and had eaten little, but now that it is past, my heart (said he) is well quieted. Whereupon the gentleman said, he would give him money with all his heart, for he was able to do it. But he being doubtful of the law, and fearing Mr. Farmer's case, durst therefore give him nothing, but gave money to the bailiffs that stood by, and said that if they were good men they would bestow it on him (for my lord of Canterbury had not one penny in his purse to help him), and so left him, my lord bidding him earnestly farewell, commending himself to his prayers and all his friends. That night this gentleman was detained by Bonner and Ely, for giving him this money: and but for the help of his friends, he had been sent up to the council. Such was the cruelty and iniquity of the time, that men could not do good without punishment.

Mean time, while the archbishop was thus remaining in durance (whom they had kept now in prison almost the space of three years), the doctors and divines of Oxford busied themselves all that ever they could about Dr. Cranmer, to persuade him to recant, endeavouring by all the crafty practices and allurements they could invent to bring their purpose to pass. And to the intent they might win him the more easily, they entertained him in the dean of Christ-church's house, in the said university, where he lacked no delicate fare, played at bowls, had his pleasure for walking, and all other things that might bring him from Christ. And besides all this, they secretly suborned certain men, who when they could not prevail by arguments and disputation, should by intreaty and fair promises, or any other means, allure him to a recantation, perceiving otherwise what a great wound they should receive, if the archbishop had stood steadfast in this sentence; and again on the other side, what great profit they should get, if he, as the principal standard-bearer, should be overthrown. By reason whereof the wily priests flocked about him, with threatening, flattering, intreating and promising, and all other means; especially Henry Sydal, and Friar John de Villa Garcina, a Spaniard, to the end to drive him, to the uttermost of their possibility, from his former sentence to recantation.

First, they set forth how acceptable it would be both to the king and queen, and especially how gainful to him, and for his soul's health the same should be. They added moreover, how the council and the noblemen bare him good will. They put him in hope, that he should not only have his life, but also be restored to his ancient dignity, saying, it was but a small matter, and so easy that they required him to do, only that he would subscribe to a few words with his own hand; which if he did, there should be nothing in the realm that the queen would not easily grant him, whether he would have riches or dignity, or else if he had rather live a private life in quiet rest, in whatsoever place he liked, without all public ministry, only that he would set his name in two words to a little leaf of paper; but if he refused, there was no hope of health and pardon: for the queen was so purposed that she should have Cranmer a catholic, or else no Cranmer. Therefore he should chuse whether he thought it better to end his life shortly in the flames and fire-brands now ready to be kindled, than with much honour to prolong his life until the course of nature did call him: for there was no middle way.

Moreover, they exhorted him that he would look to his wealth, his estimation and quietness, saying, that he was not so old, but that many years yet remained in this his so lusty age; and if he would not do it in respect of the queen, yet he should do it for respect of his life, and not suffer that other men should be more careful for his health than he was himself; saying, that this was agreeable to his learning and notable virtues: which being adjoined with his life would be profitable both to himself and to many others: but being extinct by death, should be fruitful to no man: that he should take heed that he went not too far; yet there was time enough to restore all things safe, and nothing wanted, if he wanted not to himself. Therefore they would have him lay hold upon the occasion of his health while it was offered, lest if he would now refuse it, he might hereafter seek it when he could not have it.

Finally, if the desire of life did nothing move him, yet he should remember that to die is grievous in all ages, and especially in these his years and flower of dignity it were more grievous: but to die in the fire and such torments is most grievous of all. With these and like provocations these fair flatterers ceased not to solicit and urge him, using all possible means they could to draw him to their side; whose force his manly constancy did a great while resist. But at last when they made no end of calling and crying upon him, the archbishop being overcome, whether through their importunity, or by his own imbecility, or of what mind I cannot tell, at length gave his hand.

It might be supposed that it was done for the hope of life, and better days to come. But as we may since perceive by a letter of his sent to a lawyer, the greatest cause why he desired his time to be delayed, was that he would make an end of Marcus Antonius, which he had already begun: but howsoever it was plain to be against his conscience. The form of which recantation, made by the friars and doctors, whereto he subscribed, was this:

The COPY and WORDS of Dr. CRANMER's RECANTATION.

I THOMAS CRANMER, late archbishop of Canterbury, do renounce, abhor, and detest, all manner of heresies and errors of Luther and Zuinglius, and all other teachings which are contrary to sound and true doctrine. And I believe most constantly in my heart, and with my mouth I confess one holy and catholic church visible, without which there is no salvation; and thereof I acknowledge the bishop of Rome to be supreme head in earth, whom I acknowledge to be the highest bishop and pope, and Christ's vicar, unto whom all christian people ought to be subject.

And as concerning the sacraments, I believe and worship in the sacrament of the altar the very body and blood of Christ, being contained most truly under the forms of bread and wine; the bread through the mighty power of God being turned into the body of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and the wine into his blood.

And in the other six sacraments, also (like as in this) I believe and hold as the universal church holdeth, and the church of Rome judgeth and determineth.

Furthermore, I believe that there is a place of purgatory, where souls departed be punished for a time, for whom the church doth godly and wholesomely pray, like as it doth honour saints and make prayers to them.

Finally, in all things I profess, that I do not otherwise believe, than the catholic church and church of Rome holdeth and teacheth. I am sorry that ever I held or thought otherwise. And I beseech Almighty God, that of his mercy he will vouchsafe to forgive me, whatsoever I have offended against God or his church, and also I desire and beseech all christian people to pray for me.

And all such as have been deceived either by mine example or doctrine, I require them by the blood of Jesus

Jesus Christ, that they will return to the unity of the church, that we may be all of one mind, without schism or division.

And to conclude, as I submit myself to the catholic church of Christ, and to the supreme head thereof, so I submit myself unto the most excellent majesties of Philip and Mary, king and queen of this realm of England, &c. and to all other their laws and ordinances, being ready always as a faithful subject ever to obey them. And God is my witness, that I have not done this for favour or fear of any person, but willingly and of mine own conscience, as to the instruction of others.

This recantation of the archbishop was not so soon conceived, but the doctors and prelates without delay caused the same to be imprinted, and set abroad in all men's hands. Whereunto for better credit, first was added the name of Thomas Cranmer, with a solemn subscription, then followed the witnesses of his recantation, Henry Sydal, and friar John de Villa Garcina. All this time Cranmer had no certain assurance of his life, although the same was faithfully promised to him by the doctors: but after they had their purpose, the rest they committed to all adventure, as became men of that religion to do. The queen, having now gotten a time to revenge her old grief, received his recantation very gladly: but of her purpose to put him to death she would nothing relent.

Now was Dr. Cranmer in a miserable case, having neither inwardly any quietness in his own conscience, nor yet outwardly any help in his adversaries.

Besides this, on the one side was praise, on the other side scorn, on both sides danger, so that he could neither die honestly, nor yet honestly live. And whereas he sought profit, he fell into double disprofit, that neither with good men he could avoid secret shame, nor yet with evil men the note of dissimulation.

In the mean time while these things were doing (as I said) in the prison amongst the doctors, the queen taking secret council how to dispatch Cranmer out of the way (who as yet knew not of her secret hate, and not expecting death) appointed Dr. Cole, and secretly gave him in commandment, that against the 21st of March he should prepare a funeral sermon for Cranmer's burning, and so instructing him orderly and diligently of her will and pleasure in that behalf, sent him away.

Soon after the lord Williams, of Tame, and the lord Shandois, sir Thomas Bridges, and sir John Brown, were sent for, with other worshipful men and justices, commanded in the queen's name to be at Oxford on the same day, with their servants and retinue, lest Cranmer's death should raise there any tumult.

Dr. Cole having this lesson given him before, and charged by her commandment, returned to Oxford, ready to play his part: who as the day of execution drew near, even the day before, came into the prison to Dr. Cranmer, to try whether he abode in the catholic faith wherein before he had left him. To whom, when Cranmer had answered, that by God's grace he would be daily more confirmed in the catholic faith; Cole departing for that time, the next day following repaired to the archbishop again, giving no signification as yet of his death that was prepared. And therefore in the morning, which was the 21st day of March, appointed for Cranmer's execution, the said Cole coming to him, asked him if he had any money, to whom when he had answered that he had none, he delivered fifteen crowns to give to the poor to whom he would: and so exhorting him as much as he could to constancy in faith, departed thence about his business, as to his sermon appertained.

By this partly, and other like arguments, the archbishop began more and more to surmise what they were about. Then because the day was not far spent, and the lords and knights that were looked for were not yet come, there came to him the Spanish friar, witness of his recantation, bringing a paper with articles, which Cranmer should openly profess in his recantation before the people, earnestly desiring him that he would write the said instrument with the articles with his own hand, and sign it with his name: which when he had done, the said friar desired that he would write another copy thereof which should remain with him, and that he did also. But yet the archbishop being not ignorant whereunto their secret devices tended, and thinking that the time was at hand in which he could no longer dissemble the profession of his faith with Christ's people, he put his prayer and his exhortation written in another paper secretly into his bosom, which he intended to recite to the people before he should make the last profession of his faith, fearing lest if they heard the confession of his faith first, they would not afterwards have suffered him to exhort the people.

Soon after, about nine o'clock, the lord Williams, sir Thomas Bridges, sir John Brown, and the other justices, with certain other noblemen, that were sent of the queen's council, came to Oxford with a great train of waiting men. Also of the other multitude on every side (as is wont in such a matter) was made a great concourse, and greater expectation: for first of all, they that were of the pope's side were in great hope that day to hear something of Cranmer that should establish the vanity of their opinion: the other part, who were endued with a better mind, could not yet doubt, that he who by continual study and labour for so many years, had set forth the doctrine of the gospel, either would or could now in the last act of his life forsake his part. Briefly, as every man's will inclined, either to this part or to that, so according to the diversity of the desire, every man wished and hoped for. And yet because in an uncertain thing the certainty could be known of none what would be the end; all their minds were hanging between hope and doubt. So that the greater the expectation was in so doubtful a matter, the more was the multitude that was gathered thither to hear and behold.

During this great expectation, Dr. Cranmer at length came from the prison of Bocardo unto St. Mary's church, because it was a foul and rainy day, the chief church in the university, in this order. The mayor went before, next him the aldermen in their place and degree; after them was Cranmer brought between two friars, which mumbling to and fro certain psalms in the streets, answered one another until they came to the church door, and there they began the song of Simeon, Nunc dimittis; and entering into the church, the psalm-saying friars brought him to his standing, and there left him. There was a stage set over-against the pulpit, of a mean height from the ground, where Cranmer had his standing, waiting until Dr. Cole made ready for his sermon.

The lamentable case and sight of that man was a sorrowful spectacle to all christian eyes that beheld him. He that lately was archbishop, metropolitan, and primate of all England, and the king's privy counsellor, being now in a bare and ragged gown, and ill favourably clothed, with an old square cap, exposed to the contempt of all men, did admonish men not only of his own calamity, but also of their state and fortune. For who would not pity his case, and might not fear his own chance, to see such a prelate, so grave a counsellor, and of so long continued honour, after so many dignities, in his old years to be deprived of his estate, adjudged to die, and in so painful a death to end his life, and now presently from such fresh ornaments, to descend to such vile and ragged apparel?

In this habit, when he had stood a good space upon the stage, turning to a pillar near adjoining thereunto, he lifted up his hands to heaven, and prayed unto God once or twice, till at length Dr. Cole coming into the pulpit, and beginning his sermon, entered first into mention of Tobias and Zachary; whom after he had praised in the beginning of his sermon for their perseverance in the true worshipping of God, he then divided his whole sermon into three parts (according to the solemn custom of the schools), intending to speak first of the mercy of God: secondly, of his justice to be shewed: and last of all, how the prince's secrets are not to be opened. And proceeding a little from the begin-beginning, he took occasion by and by to turn his tale to Cranmer, and with many hot words reprov'd him, that he being one endued with the favour and feeling of wholesome and catholic doctrine, fell into a contrary opinion of pernicious error; which he had not only defended by writings, and all his power, but also allure'd other men to do the like, with great liberality of gifts, as it were appointing rewards for error; and after he had allure'd them, by all means did cherish them.

It were too long to repeat all things, that in long order were pronounced. The sum of his tripartite declaration was, that he said God's mercy was so tempered with his justice, that he did not altogether require punishment according to the merits of offenders, nor yet sometimes suffered the same to go altogether unpunished, yea, though they had repented. As in David, who when he was bidden to chuse of three kinds of punishment which he would, and he had chosen pestilence for three days; the Lord forgave him half the time, but did not release all: and that the same thing came to pass in him also, to whom although pardon and reconciliation was due according to the canons, seeing he repented of his errors, yet there were causes by the queen and the council at this time judged him to death: of which, lest he should marvel too much, he should hear some.

First, That being a traitor, he had dissolved the lawful matrimony between the king and queen, her father and mother; besides the driving out of the pope's authority, while he was metropolitan.

Secondly, That he had been an heretic, from whom as from an author and only fountain, all heretical doctrine and schismatical opinion, that so many years have prevailed in England, did first rise and spring; of which he had not been a secret favourer only, but also a most earnest defender even to the end of his life, sowing them abroad by writings and arguments, privately and openly, not without great ruin and decay of the catholic church.

And further, it seemed meet, according to the law of equality, that as the death of the late duke of Northumberland, made even with Thomas More, chancellor, that died for the church, so there should be one that should make even with Fisher, of Rochester: and because that Ridley, Hooper, and Farrar, were not able to make even with that man, it seemed that Cranmer should be joined to them to fill up their part of equality.

Besides these, there were other just and weighty causes, which appeared to the queen and council, which was not meet at that time to be opened to the common people.

After this, turning his tale to the hearers, he bid all men beware by this man's example, that among men nothing is so high that can promise itself safety on the earth, and that God's vengeance is equally stretched against all men and spareth none: therefore they should beware and learn to fear their prince. And seeing the queen's majesty would not spare so notable a man as this, much less in the like cause would she spare other men, that no man should think to make thereby any defence of his error, either in riches or any kind of authority. They had now an example to teach them all, by whose calamity every man might consider his own fortune: who from the top of dignity, none being more honourable than he in the whole realm, and next the king, was fallen into such great misery, as they might see, being a person of such high degree, sometime one of the chief prelates of the church, and an archbishop, the chief of the council, the second person in the realm a long time, a man thought in great assurance, having a king on his side; notwithstanding all his authority and defence, to be debased from high estate to a low degree, of a counsellor to become a caitiff, and to be set in so wretched a state, that the poorest wretch would not change condition with him; briefly so heaped with misery on all sides, that neither was left in him any hope of better fortune, nor place for worse.

The latter part of his sermon he converted to the archbishop, whom he comforted and encouraged to take his death well, by many places of scripture, as with these and such like; bidding him not to mistrust; but he should incontinently receive what the thief did, to whom Christ said, "This day thou shalt be with me in paradise:" and out of St. Paul he armed him against the terror of fire by this, "The Lord is faithful, which will not suffer you to be tempted above your strength:" by the example of the three children, to whom God made the flame to seem like a pleasant dew; adding also the rejoicing of St. Andrew on his cross, the patience of St. Laurence in the fire, assuring him, that God, if he called on him, and to such as die in his faith, either would abate the fury of the flame, or give him strength to abide it.

He glorified God much in his conversion, because it appeared to be only his work, declaring what travail and conference had been with him to convert him, and all prevailed not, till that it pleased God of his mercy to reclaim him, and call him home. In discoursing of which place, he much commended Cranmer, and qualified his former doings, thus tempering his judgment and talk of him, that all the time (said he) he flowed in riches and honour, he was unworthy of his life; and now that he might not live, he was unworthy of death. But lest he should carry with him no comfort, he would diligently labour (he said), and also did promise in the name of all the priests that were present, that immediately after his death there should be dirges, masses, and funerals executed for him in all the churches of Oxford, for the succour of his soul.

All this time with what great grief of mind Cranmer stood hearing this sermon, the outward shews of his body and countenance did better express, than any man can declare; one while lifting up his hands and eyes unto heaven, and then again for shame letting them down to the earth. A man might have seen the very image and shape of perfect sorrow lively in him expressed. More than twenty several times the tears gushed out abundantly, dropping down marvellously from his fatherly face. They that were present do testify, that they never saw in any child more tears than came from him at that time, during the whole sermon; but especially when they recited his prayer before the people. It is marvellous what commiseration and pity moved all men's hearts, that beheld so heavy a countenance, and such abundance of tears in an old man of so reverend dignity.

After Cole had ended his sermon, he called back the people to prayers that were ready to depart. Brethren (said he) lest any man should doubt of this man's earnest conversion and repentance, you shall hear him speak before you, and therefore I pray you, Mr. Cranmer, to perform that now which you promised not long ago; namely, that you would openly express the true and undoubted profession of your faith, that you may take away all suspicion from men, and that all men may understand that you are a catholic indeed. I will do it (said the archbishop), and that with a good-will; who, by rising up, and putting off his cap, began to speak thus unto the people.

Good christian people, my dearly beloved brethren and sisters in Christ, I beseech you most heartily to pray for me to Almighty God, that he will forgive me all my sins and offences, which be many without number, and great above measure. But yet one thing grieveth my conscience more than all the rest, whereof, God willing, I intend to speak more hereafter. But how great and how many soever my sins be, I beseech you to pray to God of his mercy to pardon and forgive them all. And here kneeling down he said the following prayer.

The PRAYER of Dr. CRANMER, Archbishop of CANTERBURY.

"O Father of heaven, O Son of God, Redeemer of the world, O Holy Ghost, three persons and one God, have mercy upon me, most wretched caitiff and miserable sinner. I have offended both against heaven and earth, more than my tongue can express. Whither then may I go, or whither shall I flee? To heaven I may be ashamed to lift up mine eyes, and in earth I find no place of refuge or succour. To thee therefore, O Lord, do I run; to thee do I humble myself, saying, O Lord my God, my sins be great, but yet have mercy upon me for thy great mercy. The great mystery that God became man, was not wrought for little or few offences. Thou didst not give thy Son (O Heavenly Father) unto death for small sins only, but for all the greatest sins of the world, so that the sinner return to thee with his whole heart, as I do at this present. Wherefore have mercy on me, O God, whose property is always to have mercy, have mercy upon me, O Lord, for thy great mercy. I crave nothing for mine own merits, but for thy name's sake, that it may be hallowed thereby, and for thy dear Son Jesus Christ's sake. And now therefore, O Father of heaven, hallowed be thy name," &c. And then he rising, said:

Every man (good people) desireth at the time of his death to give some good exhortation, that others may remember the same before their death, and be the better thereby: so I beseech God grant me grace, that I may speak something at this my departing, whereby God may be glorified, and you edified.

First, It is a heavy cause to see that so many folk so much dote upon the love of this false world, and be so careful for it, that of the love of God, or the world to come, they seem to care very little or nothing. Therefore this shall be my first exhortation: That you let not your minds overmuch upon this deceitful world, but upon God, and upon the world to come, and to learn to know what this lesson meaneth which St. John teacheth, "That the love of this world is hatred against God."

The second exhortation is, That next under God you obey your king and queen willingly and gladly, without murmuring or grudging; not for fear of them only, but much more for the fear of God; knowing that they be God's ministers, appointed by God to rule and govern you: and therefore whosoever resisteth them, resisteth the ordinance of God.

The third exhortation is, That you love altogether like brethren and sisters. For alas! pity it is to see what contention and hatred one christian man beareth to another, not taking each other as brother and sister, but rather as strangers and mortal enemies. But I pray you learn and bear well away this one lesson, To do good unto all men, as much as in you lieth, and to hurt no man, no more than you would hurt your own natural loving brother or sister. For this you may be sure of, that whosoever hateth any person, and goeth about maliciously to hinder or hurt him, surely, and without all doubt, God is not with that man, although he think himself ever so much in God's favour.

The fourth exhortation shall be to them that have great substance and riches of this world, That they will well consider and weigh three sayings of the scripture: one is of our Saviour himself, who saith, Luke xviii. "It is hard for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven." A fore saying, and yet spoken by him who knoweth the truth.

The second is of St. John, 1 John iii. whose saying is this, "He that hath the substance of this world, and seeth his brother in necessity, and shutteth up his mercy from him, how can he say that he loveth God?"

The third is of St. James, who speaketh to the covetous rich man, after this manner, "Weep you and howl for the misery that shall come upon you: your riches do rot, your clothes be moth-eaten, your gold and silver doth canker and rust, and their rust shall bear witness against you, and consume you like fire; you gather a hoard or treasure of God's indignation against the last day." Let them that be rich ponder well these three sentences: for if they ever had occasion to shew their charity, they have it now at this present, the poor people being so many, and victuals so dear.

And now forasmuch as I am come to the last end of my life, whereupon hangeth all my life past, and all my life to come, either to live with my master Christ for ever in joy, or else to be in pain for ever with wicked devils in hell, and I see before mine eyes presently either heaven ready to receive me, or else hell ready to swallow me up: I shall therefore declare unto you my very faith how I believe, without any colour of dissimulation; for now is no time to dissemble, whatsoever I have said or written in times past.

First, I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, &c. And I believe every article of the catholic faith, every word and sentence taught by our Saviour Jesus Christ, his apostles and prophets in the New and Old Testament.

And now I come to the great thing which so much troubleth my conscience, more than any thing that ever I did or said in my whole life, and that is the setting abroad of a writing contrary to the truth; which now here I renounce and refuse, as things written with my hand contrary to the truth which I thought in my heart, and written for fear of death, and to save my life, it might be; and that is, all such bills and papers which I have written or signed with my hand since my degradation, wherein I have written many things untrue. And forasmuch as my hand hath offended, writing contrary to my heart, therefore my hand shall first be punished, for when I come to the fire, it shall be first burned.

And as for the pope, I refuse him, as Christ's enemy and Antichrist, with all his false doctrine.

And as for the sacrament, I believe as I have taught in my book against the bishop of Winchester, which my book teacheth so true a doctrine of the sacrament, that it shall stand at the last day before the judgment of God, where the papistical doctrine contrary thereto shall be ashamed to shew her face.

Here the standers-by were all astonished, marvelled, and amazed, and looked upon one another, whose expectation he had so notably deceived. Some began to admonish him of his recantation, and to accuse him of falshood.

Briefly, it was strange to see the doctors beguiled of so great an hope. I think there was never cruelly more notably or better in time deluded and deceived. For it is not to be doubted, but they looked for a glorious victory, and a perpetual triumph by this man's retraction.

As soon as they heard these things, they began to let down their ears, to rage, fret, and fume; and so much the more, because they could not revenge their grief: for they could now no longer threaten or hurt him. For the most miserable man in the world can die but once: and whereas of necessity he must needs die that day, though the papists had been ever so well-pleased; being ever so much offended with him, yet could he not be twice killed by them. And so when they could do nothing else unto him, yet lest they should say nothing, they ceased not to object unto him his falshood and dissimulation.

Unto which accusation he answered, Ah, my masters. (quoth he), do you not take it so. Always since I lived hitherto, I have been a hater of falshood, and a lover of simplicity, and never before this time have I dissimulated; and in saying this, all the tears that remained in his body appeared in his eyes. And when he began to speak more of the sacrament and of the papacy, some of them began to cry out, yelp, and bawl, and especially Cole cried out upon him, Stop the heretic's mouth, and take him away.

And then Cranmer being pulled down from the stage, was led to the fire, accompanied with those friars, vexing, troubling, and threatening him most cruelly. What madness (say they) hath brought thee again into this error, by which thou wilt draw innumerable souls with thee into hell? To whom he answered nothing, but directed all his talk to the people, saying that to ease troubling him in the way he spake, and exhorted him to get him home to his study, and apply to his book diligently; saying, if he did diligently call upon God, by reading more he should get knowledge.

But the other Spanish barker, raging and foaming,

The Most Rev. DR THO^S CRANMER, Archbishop of Canterbury, pulled down from the Stage, by Fryars & Papists, for the True Confession of his Faith, in St. Mary's Church, Oxford, and led immediately from thence to the STAKE.

The Manner of BURNING ArchBishop CRANMER, at Oxford, in the Bloody Reign of QUEEN MARY.

be observed the statutes and customs made against the liberty of the church, except they cause the same to be put out of their records and chapters within two months after the publication thereof. Also we excommunicate the statute-makers and writers of those statutes, and all the potestates, powers, consuls, governors, and counsellors of places, where such statutes or customs shall be made or kept; and also that shall presume to give judgment according to them, or shall notify in public form the matter so adjudged."

Now by these laws, if the bishop of Rome's authority which he claimeth by God, be lawful, all your grace's laws and customs of your realm, being contrary to the pope's laws, be naught, and as well your majesty, as your judges, justices, and all other executors of the same, stand accursed amongst heretics, which God forbid. And yet this curse can never be avoided (if the pope hath such power as he claimeth) until such times as the laws and customs of this realm (being contrary to his laws) be taken away and blotted out of the law-books. And although there be many laws of this realm contrary to the laws of Rome, yet I named but a few; as to convict a clerk before any temporal judge of this realm for debt, felony, murder, or for any other crime; which clerks by the pope's laws are so exempt from the king's laws, that they can be no where sued, but before their ordinary.

Also the pope by his laws may give all bishoprics and benefices spiritual; which by the laws of this realm can be given but only by the king and other patrons of the same, except they fall into lapse.

By the pope's laws, his patronatus shall be sued only before the ecclesiastical judge; but by the laws of the realm it shall be sued before the temporal judge.

And to be short, the laws of this realm do agree with the pope's, like fire and water. And yet the kings of this realm have provided for their laws by the præmunire; so that if any man have let the execution of the laws of this realm by any authority from the see of Rome, he falleth into the præmunire.

But to meet with this, the popes have provided for their laws by cursing. For whosoever hindereth the pope's laws to have full course within this realm, by the pope's power standeth accursed: so that the pope's power treadeth all the laws and customs of this realm under his feet, cursing all that execute them, until such time as they do give place unto his laws.

But it may be said, that notwithstanding all the pope's decrees, yet we do still execute the laws and customs of this realm. Nay, not all quietly without interruption of the pope. And where we do execute them, yet we do it unjustly, if the pope's power be of force, and for the same we stand excommunicate, and shall do until we leave the execution of our own laws and customs. Thus we be well reconciled to Rome, allowing such authority, whereby the realm standeth accursed before God, if the pope have any such authority.

These things (as I suppose) were not fully opened in the parliament-house when the pope's authority was received again within this realm; for if they had, I do not believe that either the king or queen's majesty, or the nobles of this realm, or the commons of the same, would ever have consented to receive again such a foreign authority, so injurious, hurtful, and prejudicial, as well to the crown as to the laws and customs and state of this realm, as whereby they must needs acknowledge themselves to be accursed. But none could open this matter well but the clergy, and such of them as had read the pope's laws, whereby the pope had made himself as it were a god. These seek to maintain the pope whom they desired to have their chief head, to the intent they might have, as it were, a kingdom and laws within themselves, distinct from the laws of the crown, and wherewith the crown may not meddle; and so being exempted from the laws of the realm, might live in this realm like lords and kings, without damage or fear of any man, so that they please their high and supreme head at Rome. For this consideration (I think), some that knew the truth, held their peace in the parliament, whereas if they had done their duties to the crown and whole realm, they should have opened their mouths, declared the truth, and shewed the perils and dangers that might ensue to the crown and realm.

And if I should agree to allow such authority within this realm, whereby I must needs confess, that you ever continue accursed, until ye shall cease from the execution of your own laws and customs of your realm, I could not think myself true either to your highness, or to this my natural country, knowing that I do know Ignorance, I know, may excuse other men; but he knoweth how prejudicial and injurious the power and authority which he challengeth every where, is to the crown-laws and customs of this realm, and yet will allow the same, I cannot see in any wise how he can keep his due allegiance, fidelity, and truth to the crown and state of this realm.

Another cause I alledged, why I could not allow the authority of the pope, which is this: That by his authority he subverteth not only the laws of this realm but also the laws of God: so that whosoever be under his authority, he suffereth them not to be under Christ's religion purely, as Christ did command.

And for one example I brought forth, that whereas God's laws all christian people be bounden diligently to learn his word, that they may know how to believe and live accordingly, for that purpose he ordained holy days, when they ought, leaving apart all other business to give themselves wholly to know and serve God. Therefore God's will and commandment is, that when the people be gathered together, ministers should use such language as the people may understand and take profit thereby, or else hold their peace. For as an harp or lute, if it give no certain sound that men may know what is played, who can dance after it? for all the sound is in vain. So is it in vain, and profiteth nothing, if the Almighty God by the mouth of St. Paul, if the priest speak to the people in a language which they know not; "For else he may profit himself, but profiteth not the people," saith St. Paul. But herein I was answered thus; that St. Paul spake only of preaching, that the preacher should preach in a tongue which the people did know, or else his preaching availeth nothing: for if the preaching availeth nothing, being spoke in a language which the people understand not, how should any other service avail them, being spoken in the same language? And yet that St. Paul meant not only of preaching, it appeareth plainly by his own words. For he speaketh by name expressly of praying, singing, and thanking of God, and of all other things which the priests say in the churches, whereunto the people say Amen; which they use not in preaching, but in other divine service; that whether the priests rehearse the wonderful works of God, or the great benefits of God unto mankind above all other creatures, or give thanks unto God, or make open profession of their faith, or humble confession of their sins, with earnest request of mercy and forgiveness, or make suit or request unto God for any thing; then all the people understanding what the priests say, might give their minds and voices with them, and say, Amen, that is to say, allow what the priests say; that the rehearsing of God's universal works and benefits, the giving of thanks, the profession of faith, the confession of sins, and the requests and petitions of the priests and of the people, might ascend up into the ears of God altogether, and be as a sweet favour, odour, and incense in his nose: and thus was it used many hundred years after Christ's ascension.

But the foresaid things cannot be done when the priests speak to the people in a language not known, and so they (or their clerk in their name) say Amen, but they cannot tell whereunto. Whereas St. Paul saith, "How can the people say Amen to thy well saying, when they understand not what thou sayest?" And thus was St. Paul understood by all interpreters, both the Greeks and Latins, old and new, school authors and others that I have read, until above thirty years past. At which time one Eckius, with others of his sort, began to devise a new exposition, understanding St. Paul of preaching only.

But when a good number of the best learned men reputed within this realm, some favouring the old, some the new learning, as they term it, (where indeed that which they call the old is the new, and that which they call the new is indeed the old) but when a great number of such learned men of both sorts, were gathered together at Windfor for the reformation of the service of the church, it was agreed by both, without controversy (not one saying contrary) that the service of the church ought to be in the mother tongue; and that St. Paul in the fourteenth chapter to the Corinthians was so to be understood. And so St. Paul was understood in the civil law, more than a thousand years past, where Justinian, a most godly emperor, in a synod writeth in this manner: "We command that all bishops and priests celebrate the holy oblation and prayer used in holy baptism, not after a still and close manner, but with a clear loud voice, that they may be plainly heard by the faithful people, so as the hearers' minds may be lifted up thereby with the greater devotion, in uttering the praises of the Lord God. For so St. Paul teacheth also in the epistle to the Corinthians, If the Spirit do only bless (or say well) how shall he that occupieth the place of a private person say Amen, to thy thanksgiving? for he perceiveth not what thou sayest: thou dost give thanks well, but the other is not edified." And not only the civil law, and all other writers a thousand and five hundred years continually together, have expounded St. Paul not of preaching only, but of other service said in the church; but also reason saith the same, that if men be commanded to hear any thing, it must be spoken in a language which the hearers understand, or else (as St. Paul saith) what availeth it to hear? So that the pope giving a contrary commandment, that the people coming to the church shall hear they know not what, and shall answer they know not whereto, taketh upon him to command, not only against reason, but also directly against God.

And again I said, whereas our Saviour Christ ordained the sacrament of his most precious body and blood to be received by all christian people under the forms of bread and wine, and said of the cup, "Drink ye all of this:" the pope giveth a clean contrary commandment, that no layman shall drink of the cup of their salvation; as though the cup of salvation by the blood of Christ pertaineth not to laymen. And whereas Theophilus Alexandrinus (whose works St. Jerome did translate about eleven hundred years past) saith, That if Christ had been crucified for the devils, his cup should not be denied them; yet the pope denieth the cup of Christ to christian people, for whom Christ was crucified. So that if I should obey the pope in these things, I must needs disobey my Saviour Christ.

But I was answered hereunto (as they commonly answer), that under the form of bread is both Christ's flesh and blood: so that whosoever receiveth the bread, receiveth as well Christ's blood as his flesh. Let it be so, yet in the form of bread only, Christ's blood is not drank, but eaten; nor is it received in the cup in the form of wine, as Christ commanded, but eaten with the flesh under the form of bread. And moreover, the bread is not the sacrament of his blood, but of his flesh only; nor is the cup the sacrament of his flesh, but of his blood only. And so the pope keepeth from all lay-persons the sacrament of their redemption by Christ's blood, which Christ commandeth to be given unto them.

And furthermore, Christ ordained the sacrament in two kinds, the one separated from the other, to be a representation of his death, where his blood was separated from his flesh, which is not represented in one kind alone: so that the lay-people receive not the whole sacrament whereby Christ's death is represented as he commanded.

Moreover, as the pope taketh upon him to give the temporal sword, by royal and imperial power, to kings and princes; so doth he likewise take upon him to depose them from their imperial states, if they be disobedient to him, and commandeth the subjects to disobey their princes, assailing the subjects as well of their obedience, as of their lawful oaths made unto their true kings and princes, directly contrary to God's commandment, who commandeth all subjects to obey their kings, or their rulers under them.

One John, patriarch of Constantinople, in the time of St. Gregory, claimed superiority above all other bishops. To whom St. Gregory writeth, that therein he did injury to his three brethren, which were equal with him; that is to say, the bishop of Rome, the bishop of Alexandria, and of Antioch: which three were patriarchal sees, as well as Constantinople, and were brethren one to another. But (saith St. Gregory) if any one shall exalt himself above all the rest, to be the universal bishop, the same passeth in pride. But now the bishop of Rome exalteth himself not only above all kings and emperors, and above all the whole world, but takes upon him to give and take away, to set up and pull down as he shall think good. And as the devil, having no such authority, yet took upon him to give unto Christ all the kingdoms of the world, if he would fall down and worship him; in like manner the pope taketh upon him to give empires and kingdoms, being none of his, to such as will fall down and worship him, and kiss his feet.

And moreover, his lawyers and glossers so flatter him, that they feign he may command emperors and kings to hold his stirrup when he lighteth from his horse, and to be his footmen: and that if any emperor or king give him any thing, they give him nothing but what is his own, and that he may dispense against God's word, against both the Old and New Testament, against St. Paul's epistles, and against the gospel. And furthermore, whatsoever he doth, although he draw innumerable people by heaps with himself into hell, yet may not mortal man reprove him, because he being judge of all men, may be judged of no man. And thus he sitteth in the temple of God as if he were a god, and nameth himself God's vicar, and yet he dispenseth against God. If this be not to play Antichrist's part, I cannot tell what Antichrist is, which is no more to say, but Christ's enemy and adversary? who shall sit in the temple of God advancing himself above all other, yet by hypocrisy and feigned religion, shall subvert the true religion of Christ, and under pretence and colour of Christ's religion shall work against Christ, and therefore hath the name of Antichrist. Now if any man lift himself higher than the pope hath done, who listeth himself above all the world; or can be a greater adversary to Christ, than to dispense against God's laws; and where Christ hath given any commandment, to command directly the contrary, that man must needs be taken for Antichrist. But until the time that such a person may be found, men may very easily conjecture where to find Antichrist.

Wherefore seeing the pope thus to overthrow both God's laws and man's laws, taking upon him to make emperors and kings to be vassals and subjects unto him, especially the crown of this realm, with the laws and customs of the same; I see no reason how I may consent to admit his usurped power within this realm, contrary to mine oath, mine obedience to God's laws, mine allegiance and duty to your majesty, and my love and affection to this realm.

This that I have spoken against the power and authority of the pope, I have not spoken (I take God to record and judge) for any malice I owe to the pope's person, whom I know not, but I shall pray to God to give him grace, that he may seek above all things to promote God's honour and glory, and not to follow the trade of his predecessors in these latter days.

Nor have I spoken it for fear of punishment, and to avoid the same, thinking it rather an occasion to aggravate than to diminish my trouble; but I have spoken it for my most bounded duty to the crown, liberties, laws, and customs of this realm of England, but most especially to discharge my conscience in uttering the truth to God's glory, calling away all fear by the comfort which I have in Christ, who said, "Fear not them that kill the body, and cannot kill the soul, but fear him that can cast both body and soul into hell-fire." He that for fear of losing this life will forsake the truth, shall lose the life everlasting: and he that for the truth's sake will spend his life, will find everlasting life. And Christ promiseth to stand fast with them before his Father, which will stand fast with him here; which comfort is so great, that whosoever hath his eyes fixed upon Christ, cannot greatly set his heart on this life, knowing that he may be sure to have Christ stand by him in the presence of his Father in heaven.

And as touching the sacrament, I said; Forasmuch as the whole matter standeth in the understanding of these words of Christ, "This is my body, this is my blood;" then surely Christ in these words made demonstration of the bread and wine, and spake figuratively, calling bread his body, and wine his blood, because he ordained them to be sacraments of his body and blood. And where the papists say in those two points contrary unto me, that Christ called not bread his body, but a substance uncertain, nor spoke figuratively: herein I said, I would be judged by the old church, and which doctrine could be proved the elder, that I would stand unto. And forasmuch as I have alledged in my book many old authors, both Greeks and Latins, which above a thousand years after Christ continually taught as I do: if they could bring forth but one old author, that faith in these two points as they say, I offered six or seven years ago, and do offer yet still, that I will give place unto them.

But when I bring forth any author that faith in most plain terms as I do, yet faith the other part, that the authors meant not so; as much as to say, that the authors spake one thing, and meant clean contrary. And upon the other part, when they cannot find any one author, that faith in words as they say; yet say they, that the authors meant as they say. Now, whether I or they speak more to the purpose herein, I refer me to the judgment of all impartial hearers; yea, the old church of Rome, above a thousand years together, neither believed nor used the sacrament, as the church of Rome hath done of late years.

For in the beginning, the church of Rome taught a pure and a sound doctrine of the sacrament. But after that the church of Rome fell into new doctrine of transubstantiation; with the doctrine they changed the use of the sacrament contrary to that Christ commanded, and the old church of Rome used above a thousand years. And yet to deface the old, they say that the new is the old: wherein for my part I am content to stand to the trial. But their doctrine is so foolish and uncomfortable, that I marvel how any man would allow it, if he knew what it was. But howsoever they hear the people in hand, that which they write in their books hath neither truth nor comfort.

For by their doctrine, of one body of Christ is made two bodies: one natural having a distance of members, with form and proportion of man's perfect body, and this body is in heaven: but the body of Christ in the sacrament, by their own doctrine, must needs be a monstrous body, having neither distance of members, nor form, fashion, or proportion of a man's natural body. And such a body is in the sacrament (teach they), and goeth into the mouth in the form of bread, and entereth no further than the form of bread goeth, and tarrieth no longer than the form of bread is by natural heat in digesting. So that when the form of bread is digested, that body of Christ is gone. And forasmuch as evil men are as long in digesting as good men, the body of Christ (by their doctrine) entereth as far, and tarrieth as long in wicked men as in godly men. And what comfort can be herein to any christian man, to receive Christ's unshapen body, and it to enter no further than the stomach, and to depart by and by as soon as the bread is consumed?

It seemeth to me a more sound and comfortable doctrine, that Christ hath but one body, and that hath form and fashion of a man's true body: which body spiritually entereth into the whole man, body and soul: and though the sacrament be consumed, yet whole Christ remaineth, and feedeth the receiver unto eternal life, if he continue in godliness, and never departeth until the receiver forsake him. And as for the wicked, they have nor Christ within them at all, who cannot be where Belial is. And this is my faith, and (as I judge) a sound doctrine, according to God's word, and sufficient for a christian to believe in that matter. And if it can be shewed unto me that the pope's authority is not prejudicial to the things before mentioned, or that my doctrine in the sacrament is erroneous (which I think cannot be shewed), then I never was nor will be so perverse to stand wilfully in mine own opinion, but I shall with all humility submit myself unto the pope, not only to kiss his feet, but another part also.

Another cause why I refused to take the bishop of Gloucester for my judge, was the respect of his own person, being more than once perjured. First, for that he being divers times sworn never to consent that the bishop of Rome should have any jurisdiction within this realm, but to take the king and his successors for supreme heads of this realm, as by God's laws they are: contrary to that lawful oath the said bishop sat then in judgment by authority from Rome, wherein he was perjured, and not worthy to sit as judge.

The second perjury was, that he took his bishopric both of the queen's majesty and of the pope, making to each of them a solemn oath, which oaths are so contrary that the one must needs be perjured. And furthermore in swearing to the pope to maintain his laws, decrees, constitutions, ordinances, reservations, and provisions, he declareth himself an enemy to the imperial crown, and to the laws and state of this realm, whereby he declareth himself not worthy to sit as a judge within this realm. And for these considerations I refused to take him for my judge.

LETTER II.

From the SAME to the SAME.

I Learned by Dr. Martin, that on the day of your majesty's coronation, you took an oath of obedience to the pope of Rome, and the same time you took another oath to this realm, to maintain the laws, liberties, and customs of the same. And if your majesty did make an oath to the pope, I think it was according to the other oaths which he useth to administer to princes; which is, to be obedient to him, to defend his person, to maintain his authority, honour, laws, lands, and privileges. And if it be so, (which I know not but by report) then I beseech your majesty to look upon your oath made to the crown and realm, and to compare and weigh the two oaths together, to see how they do agree, and then do as your majesty's conscience shall direct you: for I am surely persuaded, that willingly your majesty will not offend, nor do against your conscience for any thing.

But I fear that there are contradictions in your oaths, and that those which should have informed your grace thoroughly, did not their duties therein. And if your majesty ponder the two oaths diligently, I think you shall perceive you were deceived; and then your highness may use the matter as God shall put in your heart. Furthermore, I am kept here from the company of learned men, from books, from counsel, from pen and ink, except at this time to write unto your majesty, which were all necessary for a man in my case. Wherefore I beseech your majesty, that I may have such of these as may stand with your majesty's pleasure. And as for my appearance at Rome, if your majesty will give me leave, I will appear there. And I trust that God shall put in my mouth to defend his truth there as well as here. But I refer it wholly to your majesty's pleasure.

LETTER III.

From ARCHBISHOP CRANMER, to Dr. MARTIN and Dr. STORY.

I Have me commended unto you. And as I promised, I have sent my letters unto the queen's majesty unsigned, praying you to sign them, and deliver them with with all speed. I might have sent them by the carrier sooner, but not surer. But hearing Mr. Bailiff say, that he will go to court on Friday, I thought him a safe messenger to send my letters by. For better is later and messenger, than sooner and never to be delivered. Yet one thing I have written to the queen's majesty inclosed and sealed; which I require may be so delivered without delay, and not to be opened until it be delivered into her grace's own hands. I have written all that I remember I said, except that which I spake against the bishop of Gloucester's own person, which I thought not meet to write. And in some places I have written more than I said, which I would have answered to the bishop, if you would have suffered me.

You promised I should see mine answers to the sixteen articles, that I might correct, amend, and change them where I thought good, which your promise you kept not. And mine answer was not made upon mine oath, nor repeated, nor made in judicio, but extra judicium, as I protested; nor to the bishop of Gloucester as judge, but to you the king and queen's proctors. I trust you deal sincerely with me, without fraud or craft, and use me as you would wish to be in like case yourselves. Remember, that what measure you mete, the same shall be measured to you again. Thus fare you well, and God send you his Spirit to induce you into truth.

THOMAS CRANMER.

Ye heard before how archbishop Cranmer in the month of February was cited up to Rome, and in the month of March next following was degraded by the bishop of Ely, and bishop Bonner. In time of which his degradation he put up his appeal.

In this his appeal, because he needed the help of some good lawyer, he writeth to a friend of his about the same: the copy of which letter I thought good here to insert as follows.

LETTER IV.

From ARCHBISHOP CRANMER to a LAWYER, for the Drawing out of his APPEAL.

THE law of nature requireth all men, that so far forth as it may be done without offence to God, every one should seek to defend and preserve his own life. Which thing when I about three days ago be thought myself of, and therewithal remembered how that Martin Luther appealed in his time from pope Leo the Tenth to a general council (lest I should seem rashly and unadvisedly to cast away myself), I determined to appeal in like sort to some lawful and free general council. But seeing the order and form of an appeal pertaineth to the lawyers, whereof I myself am ignorant, and seeing that Luther's appeal cometh not to my hand, I purposed to break my mind in this matter to some faithful friend, and skilful in the law, whose help I might use in this behalf, and you only among others came to my remembrance, as a man the most proper in this university for my purpose. But this is a matter that requireth great secrecy, so that no man know of it before it be done. It is so that I am summoned to make mine answer at Rome, the 16th day of this month, before which day I think it good, after sentence pronounced, to make mine appeal. But whether I should first appeal from the judge delegate to the pope, and so afterward to the general council, or else leaving the pope, I should appeal immediately to the council, wherein I stand in need of your counsel.

Many causes there are for which I think good to appeal. First, because I am by an oath bound never to consent to the receiving of the bishop of Rome's authority into this realm. Besides this, whereas I utterly refused to make answer to the articles objected unto me by the bishop of Gloucester, appointed by the pope to be my judge, yet I was content to answer Martin and Story with this protestation, that mine answer should not be taken as made before a judge, nor yet in place of judgment, but as pertaining nothing to judgment at all: moreover, after I had made mine answer, I required to have a copy of the same, that I might either by adding thereunto, or by altering or taking from it, correct and amend it as I thought good: which, though both the bishop of Gloucester, and the king and queen's proctors promised me, yet have they altogether broke their promise with me, and have not permitted me to correct my said answers according to my request; and yet notwithstanding have (as I understand) registered the same as acts formally done in place of judgment.

Finally, forasmuch as all this my trouble cometh upon me, for my departing from the bishop of Rome, and from the popish religion, so that now the quarrel is between the pope himself and me, and no man can be a lawful and indifferent judge in his own cause; it seemeth (methinks) good reason, that I should be suffered to appeal to some general council in this matter; especially seeing the law of nature (as they say) denieth no man the remedy of appeal in such cases.

Now, since it is very requisite that this matter should be kept as close as may be, if perhaps for lack of perfect skill herein you shall have need of further advice; then I beseech you even for the fidelity and love you bear to me in Christ, that you will open to no creature alive whose the case is. And forasmuch as the time is now at hand, and the matter requireth great expedition, let me obtain thus much of you, I beseech you, that laying aside all other your studies and business for the time, you will apply to this my matter only, till you have brought it to pass. The chief cause in very deed (to tell you the truth) of this mine appeal is, that I might gain time (if it shall so please God) to live until I have finished mine answer against Marcus Antonius Constantius, which I have now in hand. But if the adversaries of the truth will not admit mine appeal, as I fear they will not, God's will be done; I pass not upon it, so that God may therein be glorified, be it by my life, or by my death. For it is much better for me to die in Christ's quarrel, and to reign with him, than here to be shut up and kept in the prison of this body, unless it were to continue yet still a while in this warfare, for the advantage and profit of my brethren, and to the further advancing of God's glory. To whom be all glory for evermore, Amen.

There is also yet another cause why I think good to appeal, that whereas I am cited to go to Rome to answer there for myself, I am notwithstanding kept here fast in prison, that I cannot there appear at the time appointed: and moreover, forasmuch as the state I stand in, is a matter of life and death, so that I have great need of learned counsel for my defence in this behalf: yet when I made my earnest request for the same, all manner of counsel, and help of proctors, advocates, and lawyers, was utterly denied me.

Your loving friend,

THOMAS CRANMER.

LETTER V.

From Archbishop CRANMER, to Mrs. WILKINSON, exhorting her to fly in the Time of Persecution.

THE true Comforter in all distress is only God, through his Son Jesus Christ; and whosoever hath him, hath company enough if he were in a wilderness all alone: and he that hath twenty thousand in his company, if God be absent, is in a miserable wilderness and desolation. In him is all comfort, and without him is none. Wherefore I beseech you seek your dwelling there where you may truly and rightly serve God, and dwell in him, and have him ever dwelling in you. What can be so heavy a burden as an unquiet conscience, to be in such a place as a man cannot be suffered to serve God in Christ's religion? If you are loth to depart from your kindred and friends, remember that Christ calleth them his mother, sisters, and brothers, that do his Father's will. Where we find therefore God truly honoured according to his will, there we can want neither friend nor kindred.

If you be loth to depart for the slander of God's word, remember that Christ, when his hour was not yet come, departed out of his country into Samaria, to avoid the malice of the scribes and pharisees; and commanded his apostles, that if they were persecuted in one place they should fly to another. And was not Paul let down by a basket out at a window, to avoid the persecution of Aretas? And what wisdom and policy he used from time to time to escape the malice of his enemies, the Acts of the Apostles do declare. And after the same sort did the other apostles, although, when it came to such a point, that they could no longer escape danger of the persecutor of God's true religion, then they shewed themselves, that their flying before came not of fear, but of godly wisdom to do more good; and that they would not rashly, without urgent necessity, offer themselves to death, which had been but a temptation of God. Yea, when they were apprehended, and could no longer avoid, then they stood boldly to the profession of Christ; then they shewed how little they dreaded death; how much they feared God more than man; how much they loved and preferred the eternal life to come above this short and miserable life.

Wherefore I exhort you as well by Christ's commandment, as by the example of him and his apostles, to withdraw yourself from the malice of your's and God's enemies, into some place where God is most purely served; which is no slandering of the truth, but a preserving of yourself to God, and the truth, and to the society and comfort of Christ's little flock. And what you will do, do it with speed, lest by your own folly you fall into the persecutor's hands. And the Lord send his Holy Spirit to lead and guide you wheresoever you go, and all that be godly will say, Amen.

Unto these former letters of Dr. Cranmer, archbishop, written by him unto others, it seemeth to me not much out of place to annex withal a certain letter also of Dr. Taylor, written to him and his fellow prisoners; the tenor of which letter here followeth.

To my dear Fathers and Brethren Dr. CRANMER, Dr. RIDLEY, and Mr. LATIMER, Prisoners in Oxford for the faithful Testimony of God's holy Word.

RIGHT reverend fathers in the Lord, I wish you to enjoy continually God's grace and peace through Jesus Christ; and God be praised again for this your most excellent promotion, which you are called unto at this present, that is, that you are counted worthy to be allowed amongst the number of Christ's recorders and witnesses. England hath had but a few learned bishops, that would stick to Christ, ad ignem, inclusively. Once again I thank God heartily in Christ for your most happy onset, most valiant proceeding, most constant suffering of all such infamies, hissings, clappings, taunts, open rebukes, loss of living and liberty, for the defence of God's cause, truth, and glory. I cannot utter with pen how I rejoice in my heart for you three such captains in the foreward under Christ's cross, banner, or standard, in such a cause and skirmish, when not one or two of our dear Redeemer's strong holds are besieged, but all his chief castles, ordained for our safeguard, are traitorously assaulted. This your enterprize, in the sight of all that be in heaven, and of all God's people in earth, is most pleasant to behold. This is another manner of nobility than to be in the fore-front in worldly warfares. For God's sake pray for us, for we fail not daily to pray for you. We are stronger and stronger in the Lord, his name be praised, and we doubt not but you be so in Christ's own sweet school. Heaven is all and wholly of our side; therefore, rejoice always in the Lord: and again, rejoice and be glad.

Your assured in Christ,

ROWLAND TAYLOR.

The HISTORY of AGNES POTTEN, and JOAN TRUNCHFIELD, Martyrs, persecuted in Suffolk.

IN the history of Robert Samuel mention was made before of two godly women of the same town of Ipswich, who shortly after him suffered likewise, and obtained the crown of martyrdom: the name of the first was Agnes, the wife of Robert Potten; and another, wife of Michael Trunchfield, a shoemaker, both dwelling in one town: who, about the same time that the archbishop aforesaid was burnt at Oxford, suffered likewise in the aforesaid town of Ipswich, either in the same month of March, or (as some say) in the end of February before.

Their opinion or persuasion was this, that in the sacrament was the memorial only of Christ's death and passion: for (said they) Jesus Christ is ascended up into heaven, and is on the right hand of God the Father, according to the scriptures, and not in the sacrament, as he was born of the virgin Mary.

For this they were burnt. In whose suffering their constancy was worthy to be wondered at, who being simple women, so manfully stood to the confession and testimony of God's word and verity: inasmuch that when they had prepared and undressed themselves ready to the fire, with comfortable words of the scripture they earnestly required the people to credit and to lay hold on the word of God, and not upon man's devices and inventions, despising the ordinances and institutions of the Romish Antichrist, with all his superstitions and rotten religion; and so continuing in the torment of fire, they held up their hands and called unto God constantly so long as life did endure.

This Potten's wife, one night a little before her death, being asleep in her bed, saw a bright burning fire, right up as a pole, and on the side of the fire she thought there stood a number of queen Mary's friends looking on. Then being asleep, she seemed to muse with herself whether her fire should burn so bright or no; and indeed her suffering was not far unlike her dream.

This also I thought further to note, how these two being always together in prison, the one which was Michael's wife, seemed to be nothing so ardent and zealous as Potten's wife was, although (God be thanked) they did both stoutly stand to the confession of the truth; but when the said Michael's wife came to the stake, and saw nothing but present death before her, she much exceeded the other in joy and comfort; although both of them did so joyfully suffer, that it was marvelled at by those who knew them, and did behold their end. And thus these two martyrs ended their lives with great triumph: the Lord grant we may do the like, Amen.

The HISTORY of JOHN MAUNDREL, WILLIAM COBERLY, and JOHN SPICER, Martyrs, persecuted in the Diocese of Salisbury.

JOHAN MAUNDREL was the son of Robert Maundrel of Rowd, in the county of Wilts, farmer; he was from his childhood brought up in husbandry, and when he came to man's estate, he dwelt in a village called Buchampton, in the parish of Kevel, in the county aforesaid, where he lived in good repute with his wife and children. After the scripture was translated into English by William Tindal, this John Maundrel became a diligent hearer thereof, and a fervent embracer of God's true religion, so that he delighted in nothing so much, as to hear and speak of God's word, never being without the New Testament about him, although he could not read himself. But when he came into any company that could read, his book was always ready, having a very good memory, so that he could recite by heart most places of the New Testament; his life and conversation being very honest and charitable, as his neighbours could testify.

So it was, that in the days of king Henry the Eighth, at which time Dr. Trigonion and Dr. Lee did visit the abbey, the said John Maundrel was brought before Dr. Riggon at an abbey called Edyngton in Wiltshire; where he was accused that he had spoken against the holy water and holy bread, and such like ceremonies, and for the same did wear a white sheet, bearing a candle in his hand about the market, in the town of the Leazes, which is in the said county. Nevertheless his severity did not abate, but by God's merciful assistance took better hold, as the sequel thereof did declare. For in the days of queen Mary, when popery was re-establisht, and God's true religion put to silence, the said John Maundrel left his own house and went into Gloucestershire, and into the north part of Wiltshire, wandering from one to another to such men as he knew loved God, with whom, as a servant to keep their company, he there did remain with one John Bridges, or some other at Kingwood; but after a time he returned to his own country, and there coming to the Devizes a friend of his named Anthony Clee, had talk and conference with him in a garden, of returning home to his house.

And when the other exhorted him by the words of scripture, to fly from one city to another, he replied again by the words of the Revelations xxi. of them that are fearful, and faithful, that he must needs go home, and did. Where he with Spicer and Coberly used at times to resort and confer together.

At length upon the Sunday following they agreed together to go to the parish church, called Revel, where the said Maundrel, and the other two, seeing the parishioners in the procession following and worshipping the idol there carried, advised them to leave the same, and to return to the living God, particularly speaking to one Robert Barkdale, head man of the parish, but he paid no regard to their words.

After this the vicar came into the pulpit, who there being about to read his bead-roll, and to pray for the souls in purgatory; the said John Maundrel, speaking with an audible voice, said, that was the pope's pin-hole, the other two affirming the same. After which words, by command of the priest, they were had to the stocks, where they remained till the service was done, and then were brought before a justice of peace, and the next day were all three carried to Salisbury, and presented before bishop Capon, and William Gessrey, being chancellor of the diocese. By whom they were imprisoned, and oftentimes examined concerning their faith, in their houses, but seldom openly. And at the last examination these were the articles which the chancellor alledged against them, being accompanied by the sheriff of the shire, Mr. St. Johns, and other popish priests in the parish church of Fisherton Anger, demanding how they did believe.

They answered, as christian men should and ought to believe; and that they said, they believed in God the father, and in the Son, and in the Holy Ghost, the twelve articles of the creed, the holy scripture from the first of Genesis to the last of the Revelations.

But that faith the chancellor would not allow. Whereupon he proposed them in particular articles: First, whether they did not believe, that in the sacrament of the altar (as he termed it), after the words of consecration spoken by the priest at mass, there remained no substance of bread nor wine, but Christ's body, flesh and blood, as he was born of the virgin Mary. Whereunto they answered negatively, saying that the popish mass was a detestable idolatry, and injurious to the blood of Christ; but confessing, that in a faithful congregation, receiving the sacrament of Christ's body and blood, being duly administered according to Christ's institution, Christ's body and blood is spiritually received of the faithful believer.

Also, being asked whether the pope was supreme head of the church, and Christ's vicar on earth; they answered negatively, saying, that the bishop of Rome doth usurp over emperors and kings, being Antichrist, and God's enemy.

The chancellor said, Will you have the church without a head? They answered, Christ was head of his church, and under Christ the queen's majesty.

What, said the chancellor, a woman head of the church? Yea, said they, within her grace's dominions.

Also, whether the souls in purgatory were delivered by the pope's pardon, and the suffrages of the church.

They said, they believed faithfully that the blood of Christ had purged their sins, and the sins of them that were saved, unto the end of the world, so that they feared nothing of the pope's purgatory, nor esteemed his pardons.

Also, whether images were necessary to be in the churches, as lay-men's books, and saints to be prayed unto and worshipped.

They answered negatively, John Maundrel adding, that wooden images were good to roast a shoulder of mutton, but evil in the church; whereby idolatry was committed.

Those articles thus answered (for their articles were one, and their answers in manner alike), the chancellor read their condemnation, and so delivered them to the sheriff. Then spake John Spicer, saying, O master sheriff, now must you be their butcher, that you may be guilty also with them of innocent blood before the Lord. This was the 23d day of March, 1556, and the 24th day of the same month, they were carried out of the common gaol to a place between Salisbury and Wilton, where were two posts set for them to be burnt at: Which men coming to the place, kneeled down, and made their prayers secretly together, and then being unclothed to their shirts, John Maundrel spake with a loud voice, Not for all Salisbury. Which words men judged to be an answer to the sheriff, who offered him the queen's pardon if he would recant. And after that in like manner spake John Spicer, saying, This is the joyfulest day that ever I saw. Thus were the three burnt at two stakes: where most constantly they gave their bodies to the fire, and their souls to the Lord, for the testimony of his truth.

As touching William Coberly, this moreover is to be noted, that his wife also, called Alice, being apprehended, was detained in the keeper's house at the same time that her husband was in prison. Where the keeper's wife, named Agnes Penicote, had secretly heated a key fire-hot, and laid it in the grass in the back-yard. So speaking to Alice Coberly to fetch her the key in all haste, the said Alice went with all speed to bring it, and taking it up in haste did pitcously burn her hand. Whereupon she crying out on the sudden burning of her hand, Ah thou drab, quoth the other, thou that canst not abide the burning of the key, how wilt thou be able to abide burning thy whole body? and so she afterward revoked.

But to return again to the story of Coberly, who being at the stake, was somewhat long a burning as the wind stood: after his body was scorched with the fire, and his left arm drawn and taken from him by the violence of the fire, that the flesh being burnt to the white bone, at length he stooped over the chain, and with the right hand, which was less injured, knocked upon his breast softly, the blood and matter issuing out of his mouth. Afterward when they all thought he had been dead, suddenly he rose upright with his body again. And thus much concerning these three Salisbury martyrs.

An ACCOUNT of the DEATH of SIX other MARTYRS suffering at LONDON, whose Names follow.

ABOUT the 23d day of April, 1556, were burned in Smithfield, at one fire, these six constant martyrs of Christ, suffering for the profession of the gospel, viz. Robert Drakes, minister. William Tyms, carate. Richard Spurge, sheerman. Thomas Spurge, fuller. John Cavel, weaver. George Ambrose, fuller.

They were all of Essex, and so of the diocese of London, don, and were sent up, some by the lord Rich, and some by others at sundry times, unto Stephen Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, then lord chancellor of England, about the 22d day of March, 1555; who after a short examination, sent them, some unto the King's Bench, and others unto the Marshalsea, where they remained almost the whole year, until the death of the said bishop of Winchester, and had during that time nothing said unto them. Whereupon, after that Dr. Heath, archbishop of York, was chosen to the office of lord chancellor, four of these persecuted brethren, being now weary of this their long imprisonment, made their supplication unto the said Dr. Heath, requiring his favour and aid for their deliverance: the copy whereof here followeth.

To the Most Reverend FATHER in GOD, THOMAS, ARCHBISHOP of YORK, LORD CHANCELLOR of ENGLAND.

MAY it please your honourable good lordship, for the love of God to tender the humble suit of your lordship's poor petitioners, whose names are subscribed, who have lain in the Marshalsea for ten months or more at the commandment of the late lord chancellor, to their utter ruin, with their wives and children. In consideration whereof your lordship's said supplicants do most humbly pray and beseech your good lordship to suffer them to be brought before your honour; and there if any man of good conscience can lay any thing to our charge, we trust either to declare our innocence against their accusations, or if otherwise their accusations can be proved true and we faulty, we are ready (God helping us) with our condign punishments to satisfy the law according to your wise judgment, as we hope, full of fatherly mercy towards us and all men, according to your godly office, and in which we pray for your godly success to the good pleasure of Almighty God, Amen.

This supplication was sent (as is said) and subscribed with the names of these four under written:

RICHARD SPURGE. GEORGE AMBROSE.
THOMAS SPURGE. JOHN CAVEL.

RICHARD SPURGE.

UPON the receipt hereof, it was not long after, but sir Richard Reed, knight, then one of the officers of the court of Chancery, the 16th day of January, was sent unto the Marshalsea to examine the said four prisoners; and therefore beginning first with Richard Spurge upon certain demands, received his answers thereunto: the effect whereof was, that he with others were complained upon by the parson of Bocking, unto the lord Rich, for not coming to their parish church of Bocking, where they had inhabited; thereupon he was, by the said lord Rich, sent unto the late lord chancellor, about the 22d of March, 1555.

And farther, he said, that he came not to the church since the first alteration of the English service into Latin (Christmas day then a twelvemonth only excepted), and that because he disliked both the same and the mass also, as not consonant and agreeing with God's holy word.

Moreover he required that he might not be any more examined upon the matter, unless it pleased the lord chancellor that then was, to know his fault therein, which to him he would willingly utter.

THOMAS SPURGE.

THOMAS SPURGE being then next examined, made the same answer in effect that the other had done; confessing, that he absented himself from the church, because the word of God was not there truly taught, nor the sacraments of Christ duly administered in such sort as was prescribed by the same word. And being further examined of his belief concerning the sacrament of the altar, he said, that if any could accuse him thereof, he would then make answer as God had given him knowledge therein.

GEORGE AMBROSE.

THE like answer made George Ambrose, adding moreover; that after he had read the late bishop of Winchester's book, De vera Obedientia, with Bonner's preface thereunto annexed, inveighing both against the authority of the bishop of Rome, he did set much less by their doings than before.

JOHN CAVEL.

JOHN CAVEL agreeing in other matters with them, answered, that the cause why he did forbear coming to the church, was, that the parson there had preached two contrary doctrines. For first, in a sermon that he made at the queen's first entry to the crown, he exhorted people to believe the gospel; for it was the truth, and if they did not believe it, they should be damned. But in a second sermon, he preached that the Testament was false in forty places, which contrariety in him was a cause, amongst others, of his absenting from the church.

ROBERT DRAKES.

ABOUT the fourth day of March next after, Robert Drakes was also examined, who was parson of Thundersley, in Essex, and had there remained for the space of three years. He was first made deacon by Dr. Taylor of Hadley, at the commandment of Dr. Cramer, late archbishop of Canterbury. And within one year after (which was the third year after king Edward) he was, by the said archbishop and Dr. Ridley, bishop of London, admitted minister of God's holy word and sacraments, not after the order then in force, but after such order as was after established; and was presented to the said benefice of Thundersley by the lord Rich, at the suit of Mr. Causton and Mr. Treheron; and now notwithstanding was sent up by the said lord Rich, with the others before-mentioned: and at his coming to the bishop of Winchester, was by him demanded whether he could conform himself like a subject to the laws of this realm then in force. To whom he said, he would abide all laws that stood with the laws of God; and thereupon was committed to prison, where he, and the rest above-named did remain ever since.

The HISTORY of WILLIAM TYMS, Deacon, and CURATE of Hockley, in Essex.

IN the days of queen Mary there were two sermons preached in the woods at Hockley, which woods belonged to one Mr. Tyrel; one was called Plumborough Wood, and the other Beches Wood, and there was at the same sermons an honest man and his wife, whose name was John Gye, and servant to Mr. Tyrel at the farm called Plumborough. Shortly after it was known to Mr. Tyrel that his woods were polluted with sermons, which he took very ill, and much matter did arise about it as an unlawful assembly, which was laid to John Gye's charge, because he did not disclose that unlawful act to his master, being then in the communion of the parish, appointed at that time to keep down the gospel, which he did to the utmost, as it may appear by many of his acts.

Soon after Mr. Tyrel came to Hockley to sift out this matter, and to know who was at these preachings. And there were found many faulty; for it is supposed there were an hundred persons at the least. So it pleased Mr. Tyrel to begin first with John Gye, and asked where that naughty fellow was that served their parish, one Tims; for it is told me, said he, that he is the cause of these naughty fellows coming into the country. Therefore I charge thee, Gye, to fetch me this naughty fellow Tims; for thou knowest where he is. No, said Gye, I do not know. So in no wise could he make him fetch him.

Then stepped forth another of Mr. Tyrel's men, willing to please his master, whose name was Richard Sheriffs, and said to him; Sir, I know where he is. Well, said his master, go to the constables, and charge them to bring him to me.

So this Richard Sheriff being very diligent, made more work, and had him brought by the constables whose names were Edward Hedge and John James) before his master.

Then Mr. Tyrel commanded all the rest to depart; and it was wisely done, for he was not able to open his mouth against Tyms without reproach; and there he kept him about three hours. But there were some that listened at the walls, and heard Mr. Tyrel say thus to Tyms.

Methinketh, said he, when I see the blessed rood, it maketh me think of God.

Why, sir, said Tyms, if an idol that is made with man's hands doth make you remember God, how much more ought the creatures of God, as man being his workmanship, or the grass, or the trees that bring forth fruit, make you remember God?

So Mr. Tyrel ended his talk with Tyms, as it were in a heat, calling him a traitorous knave.

Why, sir, said Tyms, in king Edward's days you affirmed the truth that I do now.

Afirm! quoth Tyrel, nay, by God's body, I never thought it with my heart.

Well, said Tyms, I pray you, Mr. Tyrel, bear with me, for I have been a traitor but a while, but you have been a traitor six years.

After this Tyms was sent to London to the bishop, and from him to the bishop of Winchester, and so from him to the King's Bench, and then was Mr. Tyrel's age over with them that were in the woods at the sermons. So Mr. Tyrel took away Gye's coat, and gave it to John Traiford, and sent him to St. Tolics to see good rule kept there.

When Tyms came before the bishop of London, there was at that time the bishop of Bath, and William Tyms was examined of his faith before them both. So mightily God wrought with this true-hearted man, that he had wherewith to answer them both; for the constables said, that brought them before the bishop, that they never heard the like. Then the bishop (as though he would have had Tyms to turn from the truth) said to the constables, I pray you give him good counsel, that he may turn from his error. My lord, said the constables, he is at a point, for he will not turn.

Then both the bishops began to grow weary of him, for he had troubled them about six or seven hours. Then the bishops began to pity Tyms's case, and to flatter him, saying, Ah, good fellow, (said they) thou art bold, and thou hast a good fresh spirit, we would thou hadst learning to thy spirit. I thank you, my lords, said Tyms, and both you be learned, and I would you had good spirit to your learning.

So thus they broke up, and sent Tyms to the bishop of Winchester, and then were Edward Hedge and John James the constables aforenamed discharged, and Tyms was commanded to the King's Bench, where he was mightily strengthened with the good men that he found there.

And thus hitherto you have heard, first upon what occasion this William Tyms was apprehended, how he was treated by Mr. Tyrel the justice, and by him sent up to the ordinary of the diocese, which was bishop Bonner; who, after some talk, and debating with the said Tyms, at length directed him to the bishop of Winchester, being then lord chancellor, and was commanded by him upon the same to the King's Bench.

Here by the way is to be understood, that Tyms as he was but a deacon, so he was but simply, or at least not priestly apparelled, forasmuch as he went not in a gown, but in a coat; and his hose were of two colours, the upper part white, and the nether stocks of sheep's russet. Whereupon the prelate sending for him to come before him, and seeing his simple attire, began to mock him, saying, Ah, firrah, are you a deacon? Yes, my lord, that I am, quoth Tyms. So methinketh, said the bishop, you are decked like a deacon. My lord, said Tyms, my vesture doth not so much vary from a deacon: but methinketh your apparel doth as much vary from an apostle.

So then there spake one of the bishop's gentlemen, My lord, (said he in mockery) give him a chair, a toatt, and drink, and he will be luity. But the bishop ordered him away, and commanded him to come before him again the next day at an hour appointed.

But Winchester, forlack of leisure, or because of sickness growing upon him, or for what cause else I know not, either would not, or could not attend unto him, but returned him again to his ordinary bishop from whence he came. So William Tyms being put off again to bishop Bonner, was placed together and coupled with the other five martyrs above-named, and with them brought together to public examination before the bishop the 21st day of March, first in the bishop's palace of London, where the said bishop, after his accustomed manner proceeding against them, inquired of them their faith upon the sacrament of the altar. To whom they answered, that the body of Christ was not in the sacrament of the altar really and corporally, after the words of consecration spoken by the priest: of which opinion they had been a long time, some later, some sooner, even as God of his mercy did call upon them unto the knowledge of his gospel.

Then the bishop's chaplains began to reason with them, but with no great authorities either of the scriptures or of the ancient fathers, as other their large conferences with the learned do already declare.

Another EXAMINATION of W. TYMS and R. DRAKES, &c. before the Bishop of LONDON.

THE 23d day of the same month of March, the bishop sent again for Tyms and Drakes, and ex officio did object unto them certain articles, the sum and manner whereof were the same which before were objected to Whittle, Green, Tudson, &c. And the 26th day of the same month he sent for the other four, administering to them also the same general articles. Unto which they all in effect answered in matters touching their faith, as did the said Bartlet Green and the rest. Other appearings they had, as the bishop's common manner of proceeding was more (as I have often said) for order and form of law, than for any zeal of justice.

But in conclusion, the 28th day of the said month, William Tyms and Robert Drakes, with the other four above named, were brought to the open consistory in St. Paul's before the said bishop of London, to be condemned for heresy.

The bishop first began in this manner: Tyms, said he, I will begin with thee first, for thou art and hast been the ringleader of these thy companions, thou hast taught them heresies, and confirmed them in their erroneous opinions, and hast endeavoured as much as in thee lieth, to make them like unto thyself. If thy fault had not tended to the hurt of others, I would then have used thee more charitably, and not have brought thee to this open rebuke. I would, according to the rule of Christ, in the 18th of Matthew, have told thee thy fault between me and thee; if thou wouldest not have heard me, I would not so have left thee, but I, with two or three others, would have exhorted thee; if that would not have served, then would I have told the church, &c. But for that thy fault is open and manifest to the world, and thou thyself remainest stout in thine error, this charitable dealing is not to be extended towards thee: I have therefore thought good to proceed by another rule, whereof St. Paul speaketh, 1 Tim. v. "Such as sin, rebuke them openly, that others may fear." For this cause art thou brought before me in the face of this people to receive judgment according to thy deserts. Let me see what thou canst say, why I should not proceed against thee as thine ordinary.

My lord, quoth Tyms, will you now give me leave to speak? Yea, quoth the bishop. Then said Tyms, My lord, I marvel that you will begin with a lie. You call me the ringleader and teacher of this company, but how untruly you have said shall shortly appear: for there is none of all these my brethren, which are brought hither as prisoners, but when they were at liberty and out of prison, prison, they dissented from you and your doings, as much as they do at this present; and for that cause they are now prisoners.

So it is evident, that they learned not their religion in prison. And as for me, I never knew them, until such time as I, by your commandment, was prisoner with them; how could I then be their ringleader and teacher? so that all the world may see how untruly you have spoken. And as for my fault which you make so grievous, whatsoever you judge of me, I am well assured that I hold none other religion than Christ preached, the apostles witnessed, the primitive church received, and now of late the apostolical and evangelical preachers of this realm have faithfully taught; for which you have cruelly burnt them, and now you seek our blood also. Proceed on hardly, by what rule you will, I oppose not, neither refuse you for mine ordinary.

Then, said the bishop, I perceive thou wilt not be counted their ringleader. How sayest thou, wilt thou submit thyself to the catholic church as an obedient child? In so doing thou shalt be received, and do well enough, otherwise thou shalt have judgment as an heretic.

Then one of the prisoners (whose name is not certainly known) said, My lord, you are no upright judge, for you judge after your own lust. But if you will judge us according to the holy Testament of Christ, which is the word of truth, we will accord to your judgment; for unto that word we wholly submit ourselves. But as for your judgment without the truth, God shall condemn. This was very earnestly expressed, insisting that they should be judged by the word of God.

At this the bishop was offended, calling him busy knave, and commanded him to hold his tongue, or else he should be had away to a place of smaller ease.

Then Tyms answered and said, My lord, I doubt not but I am of the catholic church, whatsoever you judge of me. But as for your church, you have before this day renounced it, and by corporal oath promised never to consent to the same. Contrary to which you have received into this realm the pope's authority, and therefore you are falsely perjured and forsworn all the sort of you. Besides this, you have both spoken and written very earnestly against that usurped power, and now you burn men that will not acknowledge the pope to be supreme head.

Have I, quoth the bishop? where have I written any thing against the church of Rome?

My lord, quoth Tyms, the bishop of Winchester wrote a very learned oration, intitled, De vera Obedientia, which containeth worthy matter against the Romish authority: unto which book you made a preface, inveighing against the bishop of Rome, reproving his tyranny and falsehood, calling his power false and pretended. The book is extant, and you cannot deny it.

Then was the bishop somewhat ashamed, and looking upon those that were present, spake very gently, saying, Lo, here is a good matter indeed. My lord of Winchester being a very learned man, did write a book against the supremacy of the pope's holiness, and I also did write a preface before the same book, tending to the same effect. And thus did we because of the perilous times that then were. For then was it made treason by the laws of this realm, to maintain the pope's authority, and great danger it was to be suspected a favourer of the see of Rome; and therefore fear compelled us to comply with the time, for otherwise there had been no way but one. You know when any uttered his conscience in maintaining the pope's authority, he suffered death for it.

And then turning his tale upon Tyms, he said, But since that time, even since the coming in of the queen's majesty, when we might be bold to speak our conscience, we have acknowledged our faults, and my lord of Winchester shamed not to recant the same at Paul's Cross. And also thou thyself seest that I stand not in it, but willingly have submitted myself. Do thou also as we have done.

My lord, quoth Tyms, that which you have written against the supremacy of the pope, may be well approved by the scriptures. But that which you now do, is against the word of God, as I can well prove.

Then another, I suppose it was Dr. Cooke, said, Tyms, I pray thee let me talk with thee a little, for I think we two are learned alike. Thou speakest much of the scripture, and yet understandest it not. I will tell thee to whom thou mayst be compared: thou art like to one who intending to go a hunting, riseth up early in the morning, taketh his hounds, and forth he goeth up to the hills, and down into the valleys; he passeth over the fields, over hedge and ditch, he searcheth the woods and thickets; thus labourerth he all the whole day, without finding any game. At night home he cometh, weary of his travel, not having caught any thing at all; and thus fareth it by thee. Thou labourerest in reading of the scriptures, thou takest the letter, but the meaning thou knowest not, and thus thy reading is as unprofitable unto thee, as hunting was unto the man I spake of even now.

Sir, quoth Tyms, you have not well applied your similitude; for I praise God, I have not read the scriptures unprofitably: but God, I thank him, hath revealed unto me so much as I doubt not is sufficient for my salvation.

Then said the bishop, You brag much of knowledge, and yet you know nothing; you speak much of scripture, and you know not what scripture is. I pray thee tell me; how knowest thou that thing to be the word of God, which thou callest scripture?

To this answered Robert Drakes, that he knew it to be the word of God, because it shewed unto men their salvation in Christ, and doth revoke and call all men back from their wicked lives, unto a pure and undefiled conversation.

The bishop replied, that the heathen writers have taught precepts of good living, as well as the scripture, and yet their writings are not esteemed to be God's word.

Then said Tyms, The Old Testament beareth witness of those things which are written in the New; for (quoth he) there is nothing taught in the New Testament but it was fore-shewed in the law and the prophets.

I will deny all, quoth the bishop, I will deny all; what sayest thou then? Then Robert Drakes alleged a sentence in Latin out of the 59th chapter of Isaiah's prophecy; Spiritus meus qui est in te, &c. that is, "My Spirit which is in thee, and my words which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of the seed of thy seed from henceforth even for ever;" meaning thereby to prove, that he who had the Spirit of God, could thereby discern and judge truly which was God's word; but before he could explicate his mind, he was interrupted by the bishop, who spoke unto Dr. Pendleton, saying,

Mr. Doctor, I pray you say somewhat to these folks that may do them some good. Then Dr. Pendleton, leaning near the bishop, covered his face with both his hands, to the end he might the more easily devise what to say; but another conversation was presently brought forward, so that for that time he said nothing.

And thus much William Alsbury, witness hereof, being present thereat, so far as he heard, hath faithfully recorded and reported. What more was said, (for they had not yet made an end) because he departed then out of the house, he doth not know, nor did hear.

Then the bishop, after this, and such like communication, proceeded at length in form of law, causing both the articles and his answers to the same to be read and there openly read; the sum of which his confession recorded and left in his own hand-writing, is in effect as follows.

The ARTICLES for which WILLIAM TYMS, of Hockley, in Essex, was condemned in the Consistory of St. Paul's, the 28th of March, with his ANSWERS and CONFESSION upon the same.

FIRST, I did truly confess, and believe that I was baptized in the true catholic church of Christ; for when when I was baptized, there was the element and the word of God, according to Christ's institution. And my godfathers and godmothers did promise for me, that I should forsake the devil, and all his works, and that I should keep God's commandments, and believe all the articles of the christian faith; all which I do believe at this day, and with God's help I trust to do while I live; for it was not the wickedness of the minister that made the sacrament of none effect, &c.

Item, I confessed two sacraments, and but two in Christ's true church; that is, the sacrament of baptism, and the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, and that Christ is present with his sacraments, as it pleaseth him.

Item, I confessed, that Christ hath a visible church, wherein the word of God is truly preached, and the sacraments truly administered.

Item, I confessed the see of Rome to be as the late bishop of Winchester hath written in his book, De vera Obsequia, to which I said unto the bishop of London, that he had made a godly preface; and also John Bale hath plainly declared in his book, called, The image of both churches, even so much as I believe thereof.

Item, I confessed the mass to be blasphemy to Christ's death and passion.

Item, I confessed that in the sacrament of the altar, Christ is not present either spiritually or corporally; but as they use it, it is an abominable idol.

Last of all, I confessed the bishop of London to be mine ordinary.

After this the bishop fell to intreaty and persuasions, earnestly exhorted him to revoke his heresies as he termed them, and to reform himself unto the church of Rome, and not to stick so much to the literal sense of the scriptures, but to use the interpretations of the old fathers.

To which Tyms answered, I will not reform myself thereunto. And I thank God for this day; for I trust he will turn your curplings into blessings.

And furthermore, asking this question, he said; And what have you to maintain the real presence of Christ in the sacrament; but only the bare letter?

We have quoth the bishop) the catholic church.

No, said Tyms, you have the popish church of Rome for you, for which you are perjured and forsworn. And the see of Rome is the see of Antichrist; and therefore to that church I will not conform myself, nor once consent unto it.

Then the bishop seeing his constant boldness to be unmoveable, proceeding to his condemnation, pronounced the sentence definitive upon him, and gave him over to the secular power.

Afterwards calling for Robert Drakes, he used towards him the like manner of exhortation that he did before.

To whom Drakes replied, As for your church of Rome, I utterly defy and deny it, with all the works thereof, even as I deny the devil and all his works.

The bishop then using his accustomed order of law, with his like exhortations, at last gave him the like blessing that Tyms had, and so charged the sheriff with him.

Thomas Spurge being next demanded if he would return to the catholic church, said as follows; As for your church of Rome, I do utterly deny it: but to the true catholic church I am content to return, and continue in the same, whereof I believe the church of Rome to be no part or member.

Then in short, calling the rest in their turn, and upon the like demands receiving the like answers, the said bishop gave unto each of them their several judgments; and so ridding his bloody hands, committed them unto the custody of the sheriffs of London, who sent them unto Newgate, where they all went most joyfully, abiding there the Lord's good time, wherein they should seal their faith with the shedding of their blood; which they most stoutly and willingly performed, in the month of April.

No. 42.

L E T T E R I.

From WILLIAM TYMS to his faithful Sister in the Lord, AGNES GLASCOCK, Prisoner in the Town of Hockley.

THE grace, mercy, and peace of God our Father, through Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour, with the sweet comfort of his holy and mighty Spirit, to the performance of his will, to your everlasting comfort, be with you my dear sister Glascock, both now and evermore, Amen.

My most dear and entirely beloved sister, yea mother I might right well call you for the motherly care which you have always had for me, I have most heartily commended myself unto you, giving God most hearty thanks for you, that he hath given you so loving a heart to Christ's poor gospel, and his poor afflicted flock for the same: and as you have full godly begun, so I beseech God to give you power to go forward in the same, and never more to look back, fearing neither fire nor sword; and then I warrant you, you have not far to run.

And now (my dear heart) remember well what I have taught you when I was present with you, and also written being absent, and no doubt we shall shortly meet again with a most joyful meeting. I go on Friday next to the bishop of London's coal-house, which is the 20th day of March, where I think it will be hard for any of my friends to speak with me. However I trust I shall not long tarry there, but shortly after be carried up after my dear brethren and sisters, which are gone before me into heaven in a fiery chariot: therefore now I take my leave of you till we meet in heaven; and hallen you after.

I have tarried a great while for you, and seeing you are so long making ready, I will tarry no longer for you. You shall find me merrily singing, Hallelujah, Hallelujah, Lord God of Sabbath, at my journey's end. Therefore now (my dear heart) make good haste, and lo! a not by the way, lest night take you, and so you be shut out of the gate with the foolish virgins. And now (my sister) in witness that I have taught you nothing but the truth, here I write my name with my blood for a testimonial unto you, that I will seal the simple doctrine which I have taught you, with the rest. And thus fare you well: and God defend you from Antichrist, and all his ministers, the false priests, Amen.

These words following were written with his own blood.

Continue in prayer.

Ask in faith.

And obtain your desire.

By me W. TYMS, in

L E T T E R II.

From WILLIAM TYMS, comforting his Sister GLASCOCK, being in great Sorrow and Repentance for going to the Mass.

GOD be merciful unto you, pardon and forgive all your sins, and send you faith to believe the same, that you may be partaker of his heavenly kingdom, Amen.

My dear sister, I have me most heartily commended unto you; and as I have lamented your falling from God, by being partaker with that idolatrous priest; so have I, since I heard of your earnest repentance, very much rejoiced, and also praised Almighty God for his mercy shewed unto you, in that he hath not left you to yourself, but since your denial he hath shewed his mercy on you, by looking back on you as he did on Peter, and so caused you to repent as Peter did, and bitterly to weep for your sins: whereas if God had left you to yourself, you had run forward from one evil to another, till at length your heart would either have been hardened, or else you would have despaired of the mercy of

God.

God. And seeing that God hath been so merciful unto you as he hath been, be ye not unthankful unto him for the same. For I certify you that your sorrowful heart that you have had, doth declare unto me that God hath pardoned and forgiven all your sins for the blood shedding of that immaculate Lamb, Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour.

Therefore as Peter, after the time that Christ had forgiven him his sin, did boldly confess Christ before all his enemies; even so, my dear heart in the Lord, seeing that God hath so mercifully pardoned and forgiven you your sins, now cleave unto him, and be at defiance with his enemies the papists; and as they do bear witness with their father the devil, by going to the church; and shedding the innocent blood of those that will not go with them; even so do you bear witness with Christ, by not coming there: for all those that do go thither shall be partakers of their brethren's blood, that is shed for the testimony of Christ, except they repent and amend; which grace that they may so do, I beseech the eternal God for his Christ's sake, if it be his good will, to give them in his good time. And the same good God that hath been so merciful unto you to call you to repentance, him I beseech to keep you in his fear and love, that you may always have assistance in him, and evermore seek his honour and glory to your everlasting comfort in Christ, Amen. Thus fare you well. From the King's-bench, this 28th of August.

By me,
WILLIAM TYMS.

LETTER III.

From WILLIAM TYMS to certain godly WOMEN of his Parish, Followers of the Gospel.

GRACE, mercy, and peace from God the Father, through our Lord Jesus Christ, be with you both now and evermore, Amen.

Dear sisters, I have me most heartily recommended unto you, thanking you for the great kindness shewed unto me in this time of mine imprisonment, and not only unto me, but also unto my poor wife and children; and also for the great kindness that you shew unto all the living saints that are dispersed abroad, and are obliged to hide their heads for fear of this cruel persecution.

Dear sisters, when I do remember your constancy in Christ, I call to remembrance the constancy of divers godly women, as Susannah Judith, Esther, and the good wife of Nabal, that through her godly conditions saved both her husband's life, and all her household, when David had thought to have slain him for his churlish answer that he sent him. Also I do remember Rahab that lodged the Lord's spies, how God preserved her and her whole household for her faithfulness that she bare to God's people. So I do believe that when the Lord shall send his angel to destroy these idolatrous Egyptians here in England, and shall find the blood of the Lamb sprinkled on the door-post of your hearts, he will go by and not hurt you, but spare your whole households for your sakes. Also I remember Mary Magdalen, how faithful she was; for she was the first that preached the resurrection of Christ. Remember the blessed martyr, Anne Askew, in our time, and follow her example of constancy, and for the love of God take heed that in no case you consent to idolatry, but stand fast to the Lord, as the good woman did that had her seven sons put to death before her face, and she always comforting them, yea, and last of all suffered death herself, for the testimony of her God, which is the living God. Thus I beseech God to send you grace and strength to stand fast to the Lord, as she did, and then you shall be sure of the same kingdom that she is sure of; to which kingdom I pray God bring both you and me, Amen.

By me,
prisoner in the King's-bench,
WILLIAM TYMS.

LETTER IV.

From WILLIAM TYMS to his FRIENDS in Hockley.

THE grace of God the Father, through the merits of his dear Son Jesus, our Lord and only Saviour, with the continual aid of his holy and mighty Spirit, to the performance of his will, to our everlasting comfort, be with you my dear brethren, both now and evermore, Amen.

My dearly beloved, I beseech God to reward the great goodness that you have shewed unto me, seven-fold into your bosoms; and as you have always had a most godly love unto his word, even so I beseech him to give you grace to love your own souls, and then I trust you will flee from all those things that should displease our good and merciful God, and hate and abhor all the company of those that would have you to worship God any otherwise than is contained in his holy word. And beware of those masters of idolatry, that is, these papistical priests. My dear brethren, for the tender mercy of God, remember well what I have said unto you, and also written, which I am now ready to seal with my blood. I praise God that ever I lived to see the day, and blessed be my good and merciful God, that ever he gave me a body to glorify his name. And, dear hearts, I do now write unto you for none other cause, but to put you in remembrance that I have not forgotten you, to the end that I would not have you forget me, but to remember well what I have simply by word of mouth and writing taught you. Which although it were most simply done, yet truly, as your own conscience beareth me record: and therefore in any case take heed that you do not that thing which your own conscience doth condemn. Therefore come out of Sodom and go heavenward with the servants and martyrs of God, lest you be partakers of the vengeance of God that is coming upon this wicked nation, from which the Lord God defend you, and send us a joyful meeting in the kingdom of heaven; unto which God bring you all, Amen. Thus now I take my leave of you for ever in this world, except I be burned amongst you, which thing is uncertain unto me as yet.

By me in Newgate, your poorest and most unworthy brother in Christ, Newgate, April 12.

W. TYMS.

LETTER V.

From WILLIAM TYMS to his PARISHIONERS, giving Thanks for their Charity shewed to his Wife, being brought to Bed of a Child in his Captivity.

THE everlasting peace of our dear Lord and only Saviour Jesus Christ, with the sweet comfort of his holy and mighty Spirit, to the increase of your faith, to the performance of his will, and to your eternal comfort in the everlasting kingdom of heaven, be with you, my dear brethren and sisters, both now and ever, Amen.

My most dear brethren and sisters in our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, I have me most heartily commended unto you with hearty thanks for all the great liberality that you have shewed unto me, and especially now in the time of my necessity, when that God hath sent my poor wife a child in my captivity; which is no little care to me, so to provide, that I might keep both the child and my wife from the antichristian-church: which thing I thank my God, through his most gracious providence, I have yet done, though it be (as ye know) great charge, not to me, but to the congregation of God, and it grieveth me that I have been so chargeable to them as I have been, and especially you my dear brethren, I being so unworthy a member as I have been, and also of so small acquaintance: but such is the merciful goodness of God, so to move your hearts with charity towards me. And as he hath moved your hearts so to do, even so I beseech God to give you power to forsake and reject all things which are displeasing in his sight, and to do all things which are requisite to a christian brilliant; and send you grace to go forwards in the same, as you have godly begun, neither fearing fire nor sword. And, my most dear hearts, remember well the simple plain doctrine which I have taught you, and also written unto you, which was the truth, and for a testimony of the same I trust that you shall shortly hear, or else see that I will seal the same with my blood.

And in the mean time I desire you all to remember me in your prayers, as I know you do, and as with God's help I will do for you, that God, for his dear Son Christ's sake, will so finish the days of our pilgrimage, that we may rest together with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in the everlasting kingdom of heaven, to which beseech the eternal Lord for his Christ's sake to bring both you and all your's, Amen.

By me, WILLIAM TYMS.

LETTER VI.

From WILLIAM TYMS to his Sisters COLFOX and AGNES GLASCOCK.

GRACE and peace from God the Father of all mercy, through the merits of our dear Saviour Jesus Christ, be perceived and felt in the hearts of you, my dearly beloved sisters in the Lord, by the mighty working of the Holy Ghost the Comforter, both now and evermore, Amen.

My most dear and intirely beloved sisters in the Lord, after my most hearty commendations, according to my most bounden duty, I do as I am accustomed, at least ought to do, that is, I give you warning of your enemies, which are the priests, and take good heed of them, for they serve a crafty master; yea, and as St. Peter saith, He sleepeth not, but goeth about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour. For our old familiar friends, or worldly companions, when they see that you will not run into the idol's temples with them, it will seem a strange thing unto them, that ye run not to the same excess of riot, as St. Peter saith, and therefore they will speak evil of you, rail on you, and persecute you.

But, my dear sisters, let it not trouble you, for it is but to try you, and let it not seem a strange thing unto you. But when they do so, remember wherefore it is, and for whose sake, even because you will not forsake God as they do. For the hatred they bear you, is for the word of God, and then it is God's cause, and I tell you he will revenge it. And therefore if ye be railed on, and troubled for his sake, think yourselves most happy. For if you suffer with the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, then shall ye be sure to be partakers of the same joy that they are in. Yea, you have heard by the word of God, how cruelly the tyrants have always persecuted the true members of Christ, as he himself hath promised that they shall do unto the end of the world.

By the way I will bring to your remembrance the holy martyr St. Stephen, who for favouring, maintaining, and defending the same doctrine that we now suffer for, was called a blasphemer, and stoned to death at Jerusalem. And Christ's apostles were diversly afflicted over the world for the same by this viperous generation. Antipas the faithful witness of Christ was slain at Pergamus. Jason for receiving Paul and Silas, with other disciples and teachers of the gospel, was brought before the council at Thessalonica, and accused for a seditious traitor against Cæsar. No marvel therefore though at this day we are vexed on the same sort, maintaining the same cause, and favouring the teachers thereof.

Is there any other reward following the true servants of God now, than hath been aforesaid? No surely, for so hath Christ promised. And if they have persecuted him, they needs must persecute his members; they have called the Master of the house Beelzebub, will they do his household; "You shall be hated of men, (saith Christ) for my name's sake."

It is no new thing, my dear hearts, to see the true members of Christ handled as in our days they are, as it is not unknown to you how they are cruelly treated, and blasphemed without any reasonable cause. For heretics must they be taken, who follow not their traditions. And then they may as well call Christ an heretic, for he never went a procession with a cope, cross, or candlestick. He never sensed image, nor sang Latin service. He never sat in confession. He never preached of purgatory nor of the pope's pardons. He never honoured saints, nor prayed for the dead. He never said mass, matins, nor even-song. He never commanded to fast Friday nor vigil, lent nor advent. He never hallowed church nor chalice, ashes nor palms, candles nor bells. He never made holy water nor holy bread, with such like. But such dumb ceremonies, not having the express commandment of God, he calleth the leaven of the pharisees, and damnable hypocrisy; admonishing his disciples to beware of them. He curseth all those that add to his word such beggarly shadows, wiping their names clean out of the book of life. St. Paul saith, they have no portion with Christ, which entangle themselves again with such yokes of bondage.

Therefore, my dear hearts, seeing that our good God hath, by the light of his holy word, delivered us from all such dark, blind, dumb, beggarly traditions of men, stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made you free, bring not yourselves again into the yoke of bondage. But let us always be ready, looking for the coming of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, which, as St. Peter saith, "will come as a thief in the night." And our captain Christ saith, "If the good man of the house knew what hour the thief would come, he would surely watch."

Therefore, my dear hearts, be of good comfort, although the world rage ever so sore against you: And for your comfort mark well the great mercy of God, who according to his promise for the weakness of our nature hath so assuaged the heat of the fire, that our dear brethren that have gone before us, to the sight of all men, have found it rather to be joy than pain. And think you surely God will be as merciful unto you, as he hath been unto them; and say with St. Paul, Rom. viii. "Who shall separate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation, or anguish, or persecution, or hunger, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? as it is written; For thy sake are we killed all the day long," &c.

Therefore, my dear sisters, if to save your lives, any dissembling gospellers would have you to go to the idol's temple with them, say unto them, No; for my master Christ saith, Matth. x. "He that would save his life shall lose it." And in another place to comfort us, he saith, "There shall not one hair fall from your head, without it be your heavenly Father's will." And therefore say that you will not be of that sort, that be neither hot nor cold, lest God should spue you out of his mouth. But make them this answer, saying, St. Paul saith, 2 Cor. vi. "Bear no strange yoke with the unbelievers. For what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness, what company hath light with darkness, what concord hath Christ with Belial, or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? How agreeth the temple of God with images?" And ye are the temple of God, as God saith, "I will dwell among them, walk among them, and will be their God, and they shall be my people. Wherefore come out from among them, and separate yourselves, saith the Lord, and touch no unclean thing: so will I receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord."

Thus, mine own bowels in the Lord, as I began, so make I an end, bidding you beware of your enemies, and take up your cross, and follow your captain Christ in at the narrow gate here by persecution, and then you shall be sure to reign and rejoice with him in his everlasting kingdom, which he himself hath purchased with his own most precious blood: to whom, with the Father, and the Holy Ghost, be all honour both now and for ever, Amen.

By me, WILLIAM TYMS.

LETTER VII.

From WILLIAM TYMS, exhorting all GOD's faithful Servants to eschew the SOCIETY of IDOLATERS, and GOD's ENEMIES.

GRACE be with you, and peace from the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

I thank my God with all remembrance of you always in my prayers for you, and pray with gladness, because of the fellowship which ye have in the gospel, from the first day that I knew you, until this day; and I am surely certified of this, that he who hath begun a good work in you, shall go forth with it, until the day of Jesus Christ, as it becometh me to judge of you; whom I have in my heart, and as companions of grace with me, even in my bonds. And thus I pray, that your love may increase more and more in knowledge. Good brethren, I most heartily desire God, that as you have a willing mind to comfort my vile earthly body in this time of persecution, so he will strengthen you with his Holy Spirit, that my imprisonment do not discomfort, but rather strengthen and comfort you, to see the goodness of God shewed unto me, in that being a man without learning, and brought before three such bishops concerning worldly wisdom, he gave me both mouth and wisdom; inasmuch that the bishop of London went away in a great haste from me; and after that he sent his man with a Bible, turning to the 9th chapter to the Hebrews, and the bishop of Bath looking on it, said, What meaneth my lord? this maketh nothing for his purpose. Then I looked on it, and said, My lord seeth that I was weak, and therefore he hath holpen me; for here he hath condemned the sacrifice of your mass: for you say that you offer a daily sacrifice in your mass, both for the quick and the dead; and here St. Paul saith, "Without blood-shedding there is no forgiveness of sins;" therefore that is here condemned. He answered, Yea, saith he so? So say all such heretics, and so forth, with many like arguments, which my neighbours that heard them can declare, therefore I leave them. This have I written that you should not be afraid, but call upon God as he hath commanded us to ask and we shall have; seek and you shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you. Also he hath commanded us to call on him in the day of trouble, and he hath promised to hear us. Therefore if we have not mouth and wisdom at his hand, the fault is in us, that either we will not repent us of our wickedness, and amend our lives, or else we be unfaithful, and believe not the promises of God; and so we ourselves are the cause that this wisdom is lacking in us. Therefore let us repent and amend our lives, and God is merciful. And in any case, as I have always said unto you, since I first knew you, so say I now, beware of idolatry, and of your good intents; if not, mark what hath followed upon them that have left God's commandments, and done their own good intents. Remember when the children of Israel had made them a golden calf, did not God say they had marred all, and would have destroyed them, had not Moses earnestly prayed for them? I remember many other places alone that prove the wrath of God to come upon the people for idolatry: therefore as we will avoid the wrath of God, let us keep unstained from it. You have example out of the Old Testament, how loth the godly fathers were to be partakers with the wicked: and yet to see how little we regarded it, it would make any christian man's heart to weep. God send us more grace.

First look in the 11th and 12th of Genesis; Abraham, because he would not be partaker of their idolatry, fled from the people of Chaldea, being his native country. And in the 19th of Genesis, Lot at the commandment of the angels departed from Sodom, lest he tarrying with the Sodomites should have been consumed with them. In the 21st of Genesis, Sarah would not suffer Ishmael, who was given to mocking, to keep company with her son Isaac, lest he should also become a mocker. Look in the 16th of Numbers; Moses at God's appointment commanded the people to depart from the dwelling-places of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, lest they also should be all wrapped in their sins, and so perish among them. So do I, even as Moses commanded them that they should not keep company with those wicked people, lest the vengeance of God should light on them; so do I (I say) give you warning that you should not keep company with the idolaters, in their idolatrous temples, lest the wrath of God come upon you to destroy you.

Look what St. Paul saith in the second epistle, and the sixth chapter to the Corinthians: "Set yourselves (saith he) therefore at large, and bear no strange yoke with the unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? what company hath light with darkness? what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? How agreeth the temple of God with images? And ye are the temple of God, as saith God; I will dwell among them, and they shall be my people. Wherefore come out from among them, and separate yourselves, saith the Lord, and touch no unclean thing."

Good brethren, mark what cometh of keeping company with the wicked. Syrach saith, "He that toucheth pitch, shall be defiled therewith; and he that keepeth company with the proud, shall clothe himself with pride." Even so he that is familiar with idolaters, cannot be unstained with idolatry, except he do it to win them to Christ, as there be but a few that do. Yet, I may not be where idolatry is openly committed, as for an example; Peter, so long as he continued with Christ and Christ's disciples, continued in the truth, preached the truth, confessed openly Christ to be the Son of the living God, and promised that he would not only go to prison, but also to very death with him: but when he came once into the court of the bishop's house, he straitway was stricken with such fear, by a poor maiden, and a simple ruffian (such a one as my lord of London hath, that said, By God's blood, if I meet with any of these vile heretics, I will thrust an arrow in him) that when, I say, he was amongst them, he denied his master, swore that he never knew him, whom he, before he came there, boldly confessed before all men: and again, after that he had repented him of his wicked deed, he boldly preached to the unbelieving Jews, commanding them, among other his godly exhortations, to save themselves from that untoward generation. How many of our priests before this storm of persecution, when the gospel was truly preached, were bold, and could say, They would die rather than deny their master! but when they come once into the bishop's houses, they preach no more Christ, but utterly deny him: therefore I pray God keep them from thence, or else send them more grace and strength. It is needful to pray; therefore watch in prayer.

Paul, all the while he was among the bishops, was a cruel persecutor; but after he was called by God from the bishops, he became a true preacher: therefore God keep all christian men out of the hands of our bishops. St. Paul, in the fifteenth to the Romans, saith, I dare not speak any of those things that Christ hath not wrought by me. He saith also, Rom. xvi. "I beseech you, brethren, mark them that make division, and give occasion of evil, contrary to the doctrine that ye have learned, and avoid them: for they that are such serve not the Lord Jesus Christ, but their own bellies, and with sweet and flattering words deceive the hearts of the simple." Our master Christ himself hath given us warning which they be; for he hath set the plain mark on them, in the 24th of Matthew, "If they say, here is Christ, or there is Christ, believe them not. If they say he is in the desert, go not forth. If they say he is in the secret place, believe them not." And I pray you where can he be more secret, than in so small a piece of bread? For my lord of London, like a liar, said to me, that after the words be spoken, there remained neither bread nor wine. Then I asked him what he said to David, where he saith, "Thou shalt not suffer thy Holy One to see corruption." How say you to that? Will not the sacrament of the altar putrify or corrupt? He answered, Yes. I asked him, what it was that did corrupt, corrupt, if there were neither bread nor wine. He answered, and said the accidents. I said unto him, It was a mad accident without substance: for you say, there is neither bread nor wine, and then there is nothing to corrupt; with many such like arguments.

Therefore beware of them, for they go about to deceive you with such arguments. Say not but ye be damned, and a great deal the more worthy of your damnation, if they deceive you, because you have had so much warning. Repent ye betimes of your sinful lives, and amend, and then no doubt but God will either turn their hearts, or else take them away, or else he will give that which he promised to his disciples, if we be contented to take the same reward they had. And if we disdain the one, let us not look for the other. For he that will be the father's heir, must be contented to receive his father's correction. For St. Paul saith in the 12th to the Hebrews, "If we be not under correction, hereof all are partakers, then are we bastards and not sons."

And you know what belongeth to a bastard; he shall not be his father's heir. And if we remember our commandment, we shall find ourselves worthy to be corrected at his hand. If we refuse his correction, he will refuse us to be his sons. I pray you look what he promised to his disciples, and I pray you also look how willingly they received it: and so must we do if we will be partakers with them. First let us see what Christ promised to his disciples. Look in the tenth chapter of Matthew, and there shall you see these words, "Behold, I send you forth as sheep among wolves. Be wise therefore as serpents, and innocent as doves. Beware of men, for they shall deliver you up to the councils, and shall scourge you in their synagogues: ye shall be brought before the head-rulers and kings for my name's sake. But when they put you up, take ye no thought of what you shall speak: for it shall be given you in the same hour what you shall speak. For it is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of my Father," &c. Read the whole chapter, for it is very comfortable to a christian man; and mark it well, and you shall find what we ought to do in the time of persecution. Also look into the fourth chapter of the second epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, where it is said, "For we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus' sake, that the life also of Jesus might appear in our mortal flesh." Thus have you heard that St. Paul doth boast of persecution; even so should we, for it is the way to bring us to rest.

Therefore let us strive to enter in at the narrow gate, and let us remember the saying of St. Paul in the 21st chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, when he was going to Jerusalem. When he was in the house of Philip the evangelist, there came in a prophet, and took off his girdle, and bound his hands and his feet, saying, "Thus shall they do with the man that owneth this girdle, when he cometh to Jerusalem." When the disciples heard that, they would have persuaded him that he should not go thither. Here you shall see what answer this pastor made them; he was a faithful shepherd; "What do ye sleeping and breaking of my heart? I am not only ready to be bound, but also to die at Jerusalem, for the name of the Lord Jesus."

Yet I think there are some that will say, that I needed not to have been taken, if I would have kept me out of the way. But I say unto them, that the shrinking away of so many of our shepherds as are gone, maketh so many of the flock to scatter; which will be required at their hands, by the master of the sheep. What will he say to them on the day of account, when they shall come to receive their wages? He shall say to them, Depart from me ye wicked hirelings, for when ye saw the wolf come, ye ran away, and left my sheep in the wilderness. If you had been good shepherds, you would rather have lost your lives than have lost one sheep committed to your charge, through your fault. And I pray you, what case are the sheep in, when the shepherd runneth away from them? I need not tell you, you know the danger that followeth so well.

No. 42.

Therefore let us pray God to send us faithful shepherds, and also obedient sheep, that will not hear a stranger's voice. I would all men would mark well the saying of St. Paul in the eighth chapter of his epistle to the Romans, where he thus saith, "Who shall separate us from the love of God? Shall tribulation, or anguish, or persecution, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? As it is written, For thy sake are we killed all the day long, and are counted as sheep appointed to be slain: nevertheless, we overcome strongly through his help that loved us. Yea, I am sure, that neither death nor life, neither angels nor rule, nor power, nor things present, nor things to come, neither height nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God," &c. Also he saith in another place, "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution," 2 Tim. iii. Thus I prove it to be our heavenly Father's rod: therefore let us thankfully receive it like obedient children, and then our Father will love us.

Yet hear what St. Peter saith in his first epistle, and the fourth chapter, "Dearly beloved, (saith he) be not troubled in this heat which is now come among you to try you, as though some strange thing had happened unto you; but rejoice inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's passions, that when his glory appeareth you may be merry and glad. If ye be railed on for the name of Christ, happy are ye, for the Spirit of glory, and the Spirit of God resteth upon you. On their part he is evil spoken of, but on your part he is glorified." Here St. Peter saith, it is no strange thing; and that I have partly proved before, because we have nothing else promised us in this world.

Therefore let us call on God for grace. Be ye sure that they can do nothing to us, till God permit it. As for example, look in the first book of Samuel, chap. xix. you shall see how Saul persecuted David, purposing to kill him: but his labour was in vain.

Also in the 19th chapter of the first book of Kings, Jezebel threatened and sware to slay Elias, but the Lord preserved him. Also in the second chapter of Job, you see that Satan could do nothing to Job till God suffered him, neither exercise his cruelty any further than God had appointed him. The godly woman Susannah, through the false accusation of the wicked judges, was even at a point to die, yet God wonderfully delivered her. This have I written to put you in remembrance, that man can do no more than is the will of God: therefore let us not resist his will, but refer all to him: and let us be doing that thing that God hath commanded us in his holy word.

Dear brethren, for the blood of Christ refuse not the cross of Christ, but remember the saying of the godly man David in his 119th Psalm, where he saith, "It is good for me that I have been in trouble, that I may learn thy statutes." In the same place he saith, "Before I was in trouble I went wrong, but now I have kept thy word." Even so it is in trouble with us, for the word of God was never so sweet and comfortable as it is now that we are in trouble. Also St. Paul saith in the fifth chapter to the Romans, "We rejoice in tribulation: for we know that tribulation bringeth patience, patience bringeth experience, experience bringeth hope, and hope maketh not ashamed."

Also I pray remember the saying of St. Paul in the first chapter of the second epistle to Timothy, where he saith, "Be not ashamed to testify the Lord; neither be ashamed of me." Even so I say unto you, dear brethren, be not ashamed of my imprisonment, neither sorry, but rejoice with me, that it hath pleased God of his goodness to call me to such a dignity, as this shall be unto me, if I may have his grace to lose my life (which I regard as most vile) for his name's sake: for then I shall be sure to find it again with advantage. Therefore I desire you all that you will pray with me unto Almighty God, that he of his merciful goodness will send me his grace and strength, that I may continue unto the end; as I will pray for you, that God will preserve you from all the wicked ways of Antichrist, and strengthen and comfort you, if it be his good pleasure, that you shall suffer any thing for his name's sake, as he hath faithfully promised to do.

And I certify you, that if all men knew the comfort they should receive at the hand of God being in prison, I think there would come more to prison than there do. For surely we find such comfort at the hand of God since we have been in prison, that we had rather die than be abroad to see the idolatry that is committed among them that are abroad; beside the seeking of one another's blood, with other wickedness too much; God send me more grace. But I trust, among you there be none such: and if there be, repent and amend, lest it be verified in you, that which is spoken by the prophet Jeremy, the second chapter, where he saith, "My people hath committed too great evils: they have forsaken me the fountain of living waters, and digged them pits; pits (I say) that are broken, and can hold no water." Also in the seventh chapter he saith, "Hear not the words of the prophets that preach their own dreams." Good brethren, beware of those false prophets that I have given you warning of.

Dearly beloved, here I make an end for this time, desiring the same health both of body and soul unto you all that I would have myself, and I end with the same that St. Peter saith in the fifth chapter of his first epistle: "Submit yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you when the time is come. Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you. Be sober and watch, for your adversary the devil like a roaring lion walketh about seeking whom he may devour, whom resist stedfast in faith:" remembering that ye do but fulfil the same afflictions, that are appointed to your brethren that are in the world. The God of all grace that called you unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, shall himself, after you have suffered a little affliction, make you perfect, shall settle, strengthen, and establish you. To him be glory and dominion for ever, and while the world endureth, Amen.

Greet one another with an holy kiss of love. Peace be with you all which are in Christ Jesus. I pray you all say, Amen.

There are in the same prison where I am, the bishop of St. David's, Dr. Taylor, of Hadley, Mr. Philpot, and my singular good father Mr. Bradford, with five others, laymen of Suffex.

I desire some good brother to write this over again, for I wrote it (as I do many times) with fear. For if the keepers had seen me, they would have taken it from me, and my pen and ink also.

Good brethren, I am kept alone, and yet I thank God he comforteth me past all the comfort of any man: for I thank him, I was never merrier in Christ.

By me, prisoner in the King's-bench,
WILLIAM TYMS.

ABOUT this time certain commissioners, assigned by the queen and council, came to Norfolk, (as they did to other counties) to inquire after matters of religion; unto which commissioners there was a supplication then exhibited by some well disposed men dwelling about those parts. Which supplication, for the worthy matter contained in it, I thought proper here to insert.

The SUPPLICATION exhibited by certain INHABITANTS of the COUNTY of NORFOLK, proper to be read and observed by all MEN.

IN most humble and lowly wise, we beseech your honours, right honourable commissioners, to tender and pity the humble suit of us poor men, and true, faithful, and obedient subjects, who as we have ever heretofore, so intend we, with God's grace, to continue in christian obedience unto the end, and (according to the word of God) with all reverent fear of God, to do our bounden duty to all those superior powers, whom God hath appointed over us, doing as St. Paul saith, Rom. xiii. "Let every soul be subject to the superior powers. For there is no power but of God: but those powers that are, are ordained of God. Wherefore whosoever resisteth the powers, the same resisteth God, and they that resist get themselves judgment." These lessons (right honourable commissioners) we have learned of the holy word of God, in our mother tongue.

First, That the authority of a king, queen, lord, and other their officers under them, is no tyrannical usurpation, but a just, holy, lawful, and necessary estate for a man to be governed by, and that the same is of God, the fountain and author of righteousness.

Secondly, That to obey the same in all things not against God, is to obey God; and to resist them is to resist God. Therefore, as to obey God in his ministers and magistrates bringeth life; so to resist God in them bringeth punishment and death. The same lesson have we learned of St. Peter, 1 Pet. ii. saying, "Be ye subject to all human ordinances for the Lord's sake, whether it be to the king, as supreme, or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him, for the punishment of evil-doers, and for the praise of them that do well. For so is the will of God, that with well-doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men. As free, and not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but as the servants of God."

Wherefore considering with ourselves, both that the magistrates' power is of God, and that for the Lord's sake we are bound by christian obedience unto them, having now presently a commandment, as though it were from the queen's majesty; with all humble obedience due to the regal power and authority ordained of God (which we acknowledge to stand wholly and perfectly in her grace), and with due reverence unto her grace's commissioners, we humbly beseech you with patience and pity to receive this our answer unto this commandment, given unto us.

First, Right honourable commissioners, we have considered ourselves to be not only Englishmen, but also christians, and therefore bound by the holy vow made to God in our baptism, to prefer God's honour in all things, and that all obedience (not only of us mortal men, but even of the very angels and heavenly spirits) is due unto God's word; inasmuch that no obedience can be true and perfect, either before God or man, that fully and wholly agreeth not with God's word.

Then have we weighed the commandment concerning the restitution of the late abolished Latin service, given unto us to dissent and disagree from God's word, and to command manifest impiety, and the overthrow of godliness and true religion, and to import a subversion of the regal power of this our native country and realm of England, with the bringing in of the Romish bishop's supremacy, with all errors, superstitions, and idolatry, wasting of our goods and bodies, destroying of our souls, bringing with it nothing but the severe wrath of God, which we already feel, and fear lest the same shall be more fiercely kindled upon us. Wherefore we humbly protest, that we cannot be persuaded, that the same wicked commandment should come from the queen's majesty, but rather from some other, abusing the queen's goodness and favour, and studying to work some mischief against the queen, the crown, and the realm, to please with it the Romish bishop, at whose hands the same thinketh hereafter to be advanced.

As the Agagite Haman wrought maliciously against the noble king Ahasuerus, and as the princes of Babel wrought against the good king Darius; so think we the queen's most gentle heart to be abused by some, who seeking themselves and their own vain glory, procure such commandments as are against the glory of God. For we cannot have so evil an opinion of her majesty, that she should subvert the most godly and holy religion (so accordingly to God's word set forth by the most noble, virtuous, and innocent king, our late most dear king Edward, her grace's brother) except she were wonderfully abused; who, as hating reformation, will rather the destruction of all others, than acknowledge their errors, and to be according to God's word reformed. For truly, the religion lately set forth by king Edward ward, is such in our consciences, as every christian is bound to confess to be the truth of God, and every member of Christ's church here in England must needs embrace the same in heart, and confess it with mouth, and (if need require) lose and forsake, not only goods, and possessions, riches, wife, children, and friends; and also (if God will so call them) gladly to suffer all manner of persecution, and to lose their lives in the defence of God's word and truth set out amongst us. For our Saviour Christ requireth the same of us, saying, "Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and my word before this adulterous and sinful generation, the Son of man will also be ashamed of him, when he shall come in the glory of his Father with the holy angels." And again he saith, "Whosoever will confess me before men, I will confess him before my Father which is in heaven. And whosoever will deny me before men, I will also deny him before my Father that is in heaven. And whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever shall rail against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him."

We humbly beseech the queen's majesty, and you her honourable commissioners, be not offended with us, for confessing this truth of God, so straitly given us in charge of Christ; neither bring upon us that great sin that never shall be forgiven, and shall cause our Saviour Jesus Christ, in the great day of judgment, before his heavenly Father and all his angels, to deny us, and take from us the blessed price and ransom of his blood wherewith we are redeemed.

For in that day, neither the queen's highness, nor you, nor any man shall be able to excuse us, nor to purchase a pardon of Christ for this horrible sin and blasphemy of casting aside and condemning his word. We cannot agree nor consent unto this so horrible a sin; but we beseech God for his mercy to give us and all men grace, most earnestly to flee from it, and rather (if the will of God be so) to suffer all extremity and punishment in this world, than to incur such damnation before God.

Manasses, who restored again the wickedness of idolatrous religion, (before put down by Ezechias his father) brought the wrath of God upon the people: so that the scripture saith, 2 Kings xxiii. "Notwithstanding the reformation made by Josias, the Lord turned from the fierceness of his great wrath wherewith he was angry against Judah, because of the provocation wherewith Manasses provoked him. And the Lord said, Even Judah will I cast away from my presence, as I have cast away Israel: and I will cast away this city of Jerusalem, and the house whereof I said, My name shall be there." Jeroboam, who at Bethel and Dan erected a new-found service of God, and not only sinned himself, but also made all Israel to sin with him, so that not only was he damned for commanding, but the wrath of God came upon all Israel for obeying that his godly commandment: yet was it not so heinous an offence to bring in an idolatry never yet heard of, as after reformation made by the godly kings and princes, by the virtuous and holy bishops, by the prophets and servants of God, to reject and cast off the word and religion of God, and to receive again a blasphemous impiety.

This most heinous offence is now offered unto us, though the same be painted and coloured with the name of reformation, restoring of religion, ancient faith, with the name of the catholic church, of unity, catholic faith, and with the cloak of feigned holiness. These are sheep skins, under which (as Christ saith) ravening wolves hide themselves. But Christ willeth us to look upon their fruits, whereby we may know them; and truly that is no good fruit to cast aside God's word, and banish the English service out of the churches, and in the place of it to bring in a Latin tongue unknown to the people. Which as it edifieth no man, so it hath been occasion of all blindness and error among the people. For before the blessed reformation begun by our most noble prince of godly memory, the queen's good father; and by our late holy and innocent king, our good brother, finished; it is not unknown what blindness and error we were all in; when not one man in all this realm, unlearned in the Latin, could say in English the Lord's prayer, or knew any one article of his belief, or rehearse any one of the ten commandments. And that ignorance, the mother of mischief, was the very root and well-spring of all idolatry, Sodomitical monkery, and whorish chastity of unmarried priests, of all whoredom, drunkenness, covetousness, swearing, and blasphemy, with all other wicked sinful living. These brought in the severe wrath and vengeance of God, plaguing them with famine and pestilence; and at last the sword consumed and avenged all their impiety and wicked living. As it is greatly to be feared the same or more grievous plagues shall now again follow.

We cannot therefore consent nor agree that the word of God and prayers in our English tongue, which we understand, should be taken away from us, and for it a Latin service, we know not what, (for none of us understand it) to be again brought amongst us, especially seeing that Christ hath said, "My sheep hear my voice, and follow me, and I give to them everlasting life." The service in the English teacheth us that we are the Lord's people, and the sheep of his pasture, and commandeth that we harden not our hearts, as when they provoked the Lord's wrath in the wilderness, lest he swear unto us, as he did swear unto them, that they should not enter into his rest.

The service in Latin is a confused noise; which if it be good (as they say it is), yet unto us that lack understanding, what goodness can it bring? St. Paul commandeth, that in the churches all things should be done to edifying, which we are sure is God's commandment. But in the Latin service nothing is done to edifying, but contrarily all to destroy those that are already edified, and to drive us from God's word and truth, and from believing of the same, and so to bring us to believe lies and fables, that tempting and provoking God, we should be brought into that judgment that blessed Paul speaketh of, saying, "Antichrist shall come according to the working of Satan, with all manner of power and signs, and lying wonders, in all deceivableness of unrighteousness in those that perish: because they have not received the love of the truth, that they might be saved. And therefore God will send them strong delusion, that they should believe lies and be damned, as many as have not believed the truth, but have approved unrighteousness."

Thus; altogether drawn from God, we shall fall into his wrath through unbelief, till he swear unto us as he did unto the unfaithful Jews, that such infidels shall not enter into his rest.

In the administration of the Lord's supper, which we confess to be the holy communion, and partaking with Christ and his holy congregation, we have learned God's holy commandments, and at the rehearsal of every one of them to ask God mercy for our most grievous transgressions against them, and to ask grace of God, to keep them in time to come, that the same may not only outwardly sound in our ears, but also inwardly by the Holy Ghost be written in our hearts.

We have learned also the holy prayer made for the queen's majesty: wherein we learn that her power and authority is of God; therefore we pray to God for her, that she, and all magistrates under her, may rule according to God's word, and we, her subjects, obey according to the same.

Truly, most honourable commissioners, we cannot think these things evil, but think them most worthy to be retained in our churches, and we should not think ourselves to have true subjects hearts, if we should go about to put away such godly prayers; as put us perpetually in memory of our bounden obedience and duty to God and our rulers. For, as we think, at this present the unquiet multitude had more need to have these things more often and earnestly beaten and driven into them, (especially given in many places to stir and trouble) than to take from that blessed doctrine, whereby only they may, to their salvation, be kept in quiet.

Furthermore, we cannot forsake that blessed partaking of the body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ's institution, tution, ministered with such godly prayers, exhortations, and admonitions, teaching us the knowledge of God, the exceeding love and charity of our loving Redeemer Christ, breaking his body upon the cross for our sins, and shedding his most precious blood for our redemption: which we, in eating of that blessed bread, and drinking of the blessed cup, assuredly believe that we receive, and are perfectly joined with Christ in his holy catholic church into one body, and into one unity and brotherly love, whereby every member faithfully embraceth each other. We must needs confess this institution of Christ to be most holy and godly, wherof we have the only comfort in conscience against sin and damnation, with the assurance of salvation, and whereof hath ensued reformation of many heinous sins, much lawing, strife, and contention being ended; drunkenness, whoredom, and other vices in some reformed; goodness and virtue increased and nourished.

In the Latin mass we never had any such edifying, but only we saw a great many ceremonies and strange gestures; as turning of the priest, crossings, blessings, breathings, washing of hands, and spreading abroad of his arms, with like ceremonies that we understand not. And concerning the Latin tongue, wherein the priest prayeth, we know not whether he blesteth or curseth us. We are not partakers of the sacrament, as Christ's institution appointeth we should be.

In the ministering of the sacrament, the priests alter the institution of Christ, committing theft and sacrilege, robbing us of the cup of Christ's blood, contrary to Christ's commandment, saying, Drink ye all of this.

They rob us also of God's word, speaking all things in Latin, which nothing edifieth us either in faith or manners. Christ commandeth not that his supper should be administered in an unknown tongue: but forasmuch as faith cometh by hearing, and hearing cometh of God's word, how can we believe Christ's word and promise made unto us in the holy sacrament, saying, "This is my body broken for you, and this is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for you, for the remission of sins;" if the same promises of Christ either be not at all recited, or else so recited in Latin, that the congregation understandeth not, or heareth not what is spoken? St. Paul saith thus, reciting the saying of Isaiah, "As truly as I live, saith the Lord, all knees shall bow unto me, all tongues shall give praise unto God." Also he saith, "All tongues must confess that Jesus Christ is the Lord, unto the glory of God the Father." The Holy Ghost came upon the apostles in fiery tongues, so that they spake the tongues of all nations under heaven. St. Paul ministered to the Corinthians, and preached to them in their own mother-tongue, and rebuked the bringing in of strange tongues into the congregations. We cannot think that to be right, which so holy an apostle rebuked. And whatsoever virtue the Latin tongue hath to such as understand it, to us Englishmen not understanding it, it is altogether without virtue and edification, and therefore unmeet for our churches.

The priests complain that we laymen love them not, nor have them in honour, but it is their own fault: for how should we love them that only seek to keep us in blindness and ignorance, to damn our souls, to destroy our bodies, to rob and spoil our goods and substance under a colour of pretended holiness? We know (right honourable commissioners) what honour is due to such wolves, and how by the authority of God's word such are to be avoided as pestilences to the Lord's lambs, whom they miserably murder daily.

But we have rather chosen, by this our meek supplication, humbly to desire the queen's majesty, and you her honourable commissioners, to restore God's word again unto the churches, and to permit us freely to enjoy the same. For we certainly know, that the whole religion lately set out by the holy saint of God, our late most dear king Edward, is Christ's true religion written in the holy scripture of God, and by Christ and his apostles taught unto his church. Wherefore we cannot allow with safe consciences this refusal of it, and casting of it out of our churches; forasmuch as to refuse, cast off, and to reject it, is to cast off Christ himself, and to refuse our part in his blessed body broken for our sins, and his blood shed for our redemption. Which thing whoso doth, the same without repentance can look for no sacrifice for his sins, but must fearfully wait for the judgment, and for that vehement fire that shall destroy Christ's adversaries. For if he that despiseth the law of Moses, without mercy put to death under two or three witnesses, how much more grievous torments shall he suffer that treadeth under foot the Son of God, and esteemeth the blood of the Testament (whereby he was sanctified) as a profane thing, and contumeliously useth the Spirit of grace?

Wherefore we most humbly pray and beseech the queen's gracious majesty to have mercy and pity upon us her poor and faithful subjects, and not to compel us to do the thing that is against our consciences, and so incurably wound us in heart, by bringing into the church the Latin mass and service that nothing edifieth us, and by casting out Christ's holy communion and English service, so causing us to sin against our redemption. For such as wittingly and willingly against their consciences shall so do, (as it is to be feared many a one doth) they are in a miserable state, until the mercy of God turn them; which if he do not, we certainly believe that they shall eternally be damned: and as in this world they deny Christ's holy word and communion before men, so shall Christ deny them before his heavenly Father and his angels.

And whereas it is very earnestly required, that we should go in procession (as they call it), at which time the priests say in Latin such things as we are ignorant of, the same edifieth nothing at all unto godliness, and we have learned that to follow Christ's cross is another matter, namely, to take up our cross, and to follow Christ in patient suffering for his love, tribulations, sickness, poverty, prison, or any other adversity, whensoever God's holy will and pleasure is to lay the same upon us. The triumphant passion and death of Christ, whereby in his own person he conquered death, sin, hell, and damnation, hath most lively been preached unto us, and the glory of Christ's cross declared by our preachers; whereby we have learned the causes and effects of the same more lively in one sermon, than in all the processions that ever we went in, or ever shall go in.

When we worshipped the Divine Trinity kneeling, and in the Litany invoking the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, asking mercy for our sins, and desiring such petitions as the need of our frail state and this mortal life required, we were edified, both to know unto whom all christian prayers should be directed, and also to know that of God's hand we receive all things, as well to the salvation of our souls, as to the relief of our mortal necessities. And we humbly beseech the queen's majesty, that the same most holy prayers may be continued amongst us; that our ministers praying in our mother tongue, and we understanding their prayers and petitions, may answer, Amen, unto them. At evening-service we understood our ministers praying, we were taught and admonished by the scriptures then read; which in the Latin even-song is all gone.

At the ministrations of holy baptism, we learned what league and covenant God made with us, and what vows and promises we upon our part had made, namely, to believe in him, to forsake Satan and his works, and to walk in the way of God's holy word and commandments.

The christian catechism continually taught and called to remembrance the same, whereas before no man knew any thing at all. And many good men of forty years, that had been godfathers to thirty children, knew no more of the godfather's office, but to wash their hands ere they departed the church, or else to fast five Fridays with bread and water.

O merciful God, have pity upon us. Shall we be altogether cast from thy presence? We may well lament our miserable state, to receive such a commandment, to reject and cast out of our churches all these most godly prayers, instructions, admonitions, and doctrines.

and thus to be compelled to deny God, and Christ ouraviour, his holy word, and all his doctrine of our salvation, the candle to our feet, and the light to our steps, the bread that cometh down from heaven that giveth life, which whoso eateth, it shall be to him a well-spring of life, which whoso drinketh, it shall be to him a well-spring of life; whereby we have learned all righteousness, all true religion, all true obedience towards our governors, all charity one towards another, all good works that God would have us to walk in, what punishment abideth the wicked, and what heavenly reward God will give to those that reverently walk in his ways and commandments.

Wherefore, right honourable commissioners, we cannot without impiety refuse and cast from us the holy word of God which we have received, or condemn any thing set forth by our late godly king Edward and his virtuous proceedings, so agreeable to God's word. And our most humble suit is, that the commandment may be revoked, so that we may not be constrained thereunto. For we protest before God, we think if the holy word of God had not taken some root amongst us, we could in times past have done that poor duty of our's, which we did in assisting the queen, our most dear sovereign, against her grace's mortal foe, that then sought her destruction. It was our bounden duty, and we thank God for the knowledge of his word and grace, that we then did some part of our bounden service.

And we meekly pray and beseech the queen's majesty for the dear passion of Jesus Christ, that the same word may not be taken away out of our churches, nor from her loving, faithful, and true subjects; lest if the necessity should hereafter chance, (which God for his mercy's sake forbid, and ever save and defend her grace, and us all) the want of knowledge and due remembrance of God's word may be occasion of great ruin to an infinite number of her grace's true subjects. And truly we judge this to be one subtle part of the devil's enemy to all godly peace and quietness) that by taking God's word from among us, and planting ignorance, he may make a way to all mischief and wickedness; and by withering the holy gospel of peace he may bring upon the heavy wrath of God, with all manner of plagues; death, strange sickness, pestilence, murrain, most terrible uproars, commotions, and seditions. These things did the Lord threaten unto the Jews for refusing his word, saying, "Go, and thou shalt say unto this people, Ye shall hear indeed, but ye shall not understand, ye shall plainly see, and not perceive. Harden the heart of this people, stop their ears, and shut their eyes, that they see not with their eyes, hear not with their ears, understand not with their hearts, and be converted and healed. And I said, How long, Lord? And he answered, Until the cities are destroyed, utterly wasted without inhabitants, and the houses without men, till the land also be desolate, and lie unbuilded." And the prophet Micah in the seventh chapter, considering the contempt of God's word among the Israelites, threatened them thus, "When the day that thy preachers shall come, thou shalt be wasted away. And let no man believe his friend, or put confidence in his brother. Keep the door of thy mouth from her that lieth in thy bosom: for the son shall put his father to dishonour, and the daughter shall rise against her mother, the daughter-in-law against the mother-in-law; and a man's foes shall be even they of his own household." The same plague Christ threatened unto the Jews, for refusing his peace proffered them in the gospel, and he wept on the city of Jerusalem which murdered the prophets, and stoned such as were sent unto her.

The same plagues, we are afraid, will also fall upon us. For whereas heretofore with the receiving of Christ's word and peaceable gospel, we had great benedictions of God, especially this christian concord and holy peace, so that all were at a full and perfect stay in religion, and no man offended with another, but as the sons of peace, each of us with christian charity embraced other: now, alas, for pity, the devil (riding upon the red horse, renewed unto St. John in the Revelations) is come forth, and power is given unto him to take peace from the earth. For now a man can go to no place, but malicious busy bodies curiously search out his deeds, mark his words, and if he agree not with them in despising God's word, then will they spitefully and hatefully rail against him and it, calling it error and heresy, and the professors thereof heretics and schismatics, with other odious and spiteful names, as traitors and not the queen's friends, nor favourers of the queen's proceedings; as if to love God's word were heresy, and as though to talk of Christ were to be schismatic; as though none could be true to the queen that were not false to God; as though none were the queen's friends, but such as despitefully rail on her grace's father and brother, and on God's word that they set forth; as though none favoured the queen's majesty, but such as hate all godly knowledge.

And in very deed these things that all this turmoil is made for, are mere inventions of popes, brought into the church of their own imaginations, without commandment or example either of Christ or of his apostles; and there is not one word in the Bible, that being truly alledged, maintaineth them, nor any doctor of antiquity before St. Augustine's days, as it hath been divers times sufficiently proved before all the whole parliament and convocation of this realm. Yet these being mere traditions of bishops, are set out for God's commandments; and the queen's authority (given to her of God to maintain his word) must be abused to put down God's word. And you, right honourable justices, and keepers of laws and righteousness, are also abused and made the bishops' apparators, to set forth such Romish trash as is to Christ's dishonour, and against the supreme authority of the regal state of this realm. And we poor subjects, for speaking of that which is truth, and our bounden allegiance, are daily punished, railed upon, and noted for seditious, and not the queen's friends.

But God (who is blessed for ever) knoweth that they slander us, and pull the thorn out of their own foot, and put it in our's: for the searcher of hearts knoweth, that we bear a faithful and true heart unto her grace, and unto all her proceedings, that are not against God and his holy word. And we daily pray unto the heavenly Father, to enlighten her grace's royal heart with the glorious light of the gospel, that she may establish and confirm that religion, which her grace's brother, our most dear king, did set amongst us; and so governing and ruling this her realm in the fear and true way of God, she may long live, and with prosperity, peace, and honour reign over us.

But we cannot think that those men do seek either God's honour, or her grace's prosperity, or wealth of the realm, that take from her grace's faithful subjects God's word, which only is the root of all love and faithful obedience under her grace, and of all honesty, good life, and virtuous concord among her commons. And this we fear lest the root being taken away, the branches will soon wither and be fruitless. And when the Philistines have stopped up the well-spring, the fair streams that should flow shall soon be dried up. All our watchmen, our true preachers have taught us, that as long as we retained God's word, we shall have God our gracious merciful Father; but if we refuse and cast off the Lord's yoke of his doctrine, then shall we look for the Lord's wrath and severe visitation to plague us, as he did the Jews for the like offences. And Paul saith, Rom. ii. "God gave them the spirit of unquietness and uproar, eyes wherewith they should not see, and ears wherewith they should not hear, until this day:" and as David said, Psalm lxxix. "let their table be made a snare to catch them, and a stumbling-block to fall at. Let their eyes be blinded that they see not, and bow thou down their backs always."

O merciful God, all this is now come upon us, and daily more and more increased, and we fear at last it will so bow down our backs, that we shall be utterly destroyed; the troublesome spirit of uproars and unquietness daily troubleth men's hearts, and worketh such unquietness in all places, that no man that loveth quietness can tell where to place himself. Men have eyes, and see not how grievous an offence it is to cast off the yoke of God's doctrine, and to bear the heavy burden that unfaithful hypocrites lay upon us. We have ears, and hear not the warning of God's word calling us to true repentance, nor his threats against our impiety. Our most sweet table of Christ's word and most holy communion is taken away, and turned to a most perilous snare, through the brawling disputations of men. And as the idol of abomination betokened final subversion unto the Jewish nation, so we fear this setting aside of the gospel and holy communion of Christ, and the placing of a Romish religion, betokeneth the desolation of this noble realm of England to be at hand.

For the plagues of hunger, pestilence, and sword, cannot long tarry; but except we repent and turn again to the Lord, our backs shall be so bowed, that the like horrible plagues were never seen. And no marvel: for the like offence was never committed, as to reject and cast off Christ and his word, and in plain English to say, We will not have him to reign over us. O Lord, how terrible is that which followeth in the gospel? "Those mine enemies that would not have me to reign over them, bring them hither, and slay them before me," Luke xix. God be merciful to us, and move the heart of the queen's majesty, and the hearts of her honourable council, and your hearts (right worshipful commissioners), to weigh these dangers in due time; and to call God's word into your council, and then you shall see how it agreeth with this unreasonable commandment; and to be as wary to avoid the contempt of the eternal God, and dangers of the same, as you are prudent and wise in matters of this world, lest, if the Almighty be contemned, he stretch forth his arm, which no man can turn, and kindle his wrath, which no man can quench.

We have humbly opened to you our consciences, doubtless sore wounded and grieved by this commandment; and we meekly pray and beseech the queen's majesty, for the precious death and blood-shedding of Jesus Christ our Saviour, to have mercy and pity upon us her grace's poor commons, faithful and true subjects, members of the same body politic, whereof her grace is supreme head. All our bodies, lands, goods, and lives, are ready to do her grace faithful obedience, and true service of all commandments that are not against God and his word: but in things that import a denial of Christ, and refusal of his word and holy communion, we cannot consent nor agree unto it. For we have bound ourselves in baptism to be Christ's disciples, and to keep his holy word and ordinances. And if we deny him before men, he will deny us before his heavenly Father and his holy angels in the day of judgment: which we trust her benign grace will not require of us.

And we humbly beseech her majesty, that we be not enforced unto it; but as we serve her grace with body and goods, and due obedience, according to God's commandment; so we may be permitted freely to serve God and Christ our Saviour, and keep unto him our souls, which he hath with his precious blood redeemed, that so (as Christ teacheth) we may render to Cæsar that which is due to Cæsar, and to God that which is due to God.

For we think it no true obedience unto the queen's majesty, or to any other magistrate ordained of God under her to obey in things contrary to God's word, although the same be ever so straitly charged in her grace's name. The bishop of Winchester hath truly taught in this point, in his book of true obedience, that true obedience is in the Lord, and not against the Lord: as the apostles answered before the council at Jerusalem, commanding them no more to preach in the name of the Lord Jesus: "Judge you (said they) whether it be right in the sight of God, to hear you rather than God." And again they said, "We must obey God rather than man." Wherefore we learn, that true obedience is to obey God, King of all kings, and Lord of all lords, and for him, in him, and not against him and his word, to obey princes and magistrates of this world, who are not truly obeyed when God is disobeyed, nor yet disobeyed when God is faithfully obeyed.

Tobias disobeyed not his king, although contrary to his commandment, and contrary to the usage of all others, when they went to Dan and Bethel, he went unto Jerusalem, and worshipped in the temple of the Lord. The three young men in Babylon, refusing Nebuchadnezzar's commandment, pleased God more than the whole multitude that obeyed. And Daniel that prayed to the God of heaven, contrary to king Darius's commandment, bare a more true and faithful heart to the king, than those wicked counsellors that procured that wicked law, or those that for fear or flattery obeyed it. Which two pestilences (fear and flattery) have ever destroyed true obedience to God and man, where wicked men (that care not if the devil were worshipped) so they might get and obtain riches, promotions, dignity, and worldly glory) turn to and fro as every wind bloweth; and weak and frail men, fearing loss of goods, punishment, or death, do outwardly in body that thing which their hearts and consciences inwardly abhor, and so outwardly disobey God, and in heart dissemble with man, which dissimulation we think worthy the hate of all men, and most uncomely for christian men.

Wherefore we humbly beseech the queen's majesty with pity and mercy to tender the lamentable suit of her poor subjects, which be by this commandment sore hurt, and wounded in our consciences, and driven to many miseries, and by the malicious attempt of wicked men suffer great wrongs and injuries, slanders, loss of goods, and bodily vexations. We think not good, by any unlawful stir or commotion to seek remedy; but intend, by God's grace, to obey her majesty in all things, not against God and his holy word. But unto such ungodly commandments as are against God, we answer with the apostles, "God must be obeyed rather than man." If persecution shall ensue, which some threaten us with, we desire the heavenly Father, according to his promise, to look from heaven, to hear our cry, to judge between us and our adversaries, and to give us faith, strength, and patience to continue faithful unto the end, and to shorten these evil days for his chosen sake; and so we faithfully believe he will.

Notwithstanding, we trust the queen's gracious and merciful heart will not suffer such tyranny to be done against her poor, innocent, faithful, and obedient subjects, that daily pray unto God for her; which have remedy in this world but to sue unto her highness, our most gracious and benign sovereign; whom we pray beseech, for the dear blood of Christ, to pity our lamentable case and hurt of conscience, and to call back such commandments as are against God's honour, as the good king Darius, Ahasuerus, Trajan, Theodosius, and divers others have done, and permit the holy word of God and true religion (set forth by our most holy innocent king Edward) to be restored again unto our churches, to be frequented amongst us. So shall we grow and increase in the knowledge of God and Christ, in true repentance and amendment of life: shall we exhibit true obedience to our lawful magistrates and all superiors ordained of God: so shall love and charity (of late through this commandment so decayed) be again restored, the honour of her regal estate be more confirmed and established; and godliness and virtuous life among her loving subjects increased and maintained.

And we most heartily pray you (right honourable commissioners) to be means unto the queen's highness and to her honourable council, that this our humble suit may be favourably tendered, and graciously heard and granted. And we shall not cease day and night to pray unto the heavenly Father, long to preserve her grace, and all other magistrates, in his fear and love, and in prosperous peace and wealth, with long life and honour, Amen.

The HISTORY of JOHN HARPOLE of ROCHESTER, and JOAN BEACH, Widow, of TUNBRIDGE, Martyrs.

TOUCHING the examination of Joan Beach, widow, and of John Harpole, within the diocese of Rochester, by Maurice, bishop of the said diocese, mention was made before in the history of Nicholas Hall, wherein were declared the four articles consistorial of the bishop, objected and laid, as unto the said Nicholas Hall and his company, so also to this Joan Beach, widow: whereof the first was this;

1. That she was of the parish of Tunbridge, in the diocese of Rochester.

2. Item, That all persons who preach, teach, believe, or say otherwise or contrary to that their mother holy catholic church of Christ doth, are excommunicate persons and heretics.

3. Item, That the said Joan Beach hath, and yet doth affirm, maintain, and believe contrary to the said mother church of Christ, namely, that in the blessed sacrament of the altar, under the form of bread and wine, there is not the very body and blood of our Saviour in substance, but only a token and memorial thereof; that the very body and blood of Christ is in heaven, and not in the sacrament.
